by English Scots, and having entered into divers other devices, they would have provided for the safety of the Queen, a number of her Subjects (the Earl of Leicester being the foremost) men of all ranks and conditions, bound themselves mutually to each other by their Oaths and Subscriptions, to perforce all those to the very death, that should attempt any thing against the Queen; which League of theirs they called the Association.

The Queen of Scots, who presently apprehended, that this Association was entered into for her destruction; making this proposition by means her Secretary, to the Queen and the Council; That if she might have her liberty granted, and be assured of the Queen's love, she would enter a strict League and Amity with her, and putting all matters of opinion, esteem and honor above all the Princes of the Christian world 2 years, and (saving the ancient Leagues, under Francis and Scotland) would the same liberty to be comprehended in the Association, and a League defensive, against all that should go about to injure the Queen. Herewith Queen Elizabeth was wonderfully pleased, and at that time certainly had an inclination to grant her freedom.

But see what malice can do; for many in England, but especially the Scots of the adverse party, endeavoured by all means to hinder it; explaining, That the Queen should be no longer in safety, if the Queen of Scots were set at liberty; That both Kingdoms were utterly undone, if the were admitted into the joynt Government of the Kingdom of Scotland, and that the reformed Religion lay a bleeding, if Papists were admitted within the Court walls; nor was this all; but the Scottish Ministers in their Pelts, loaded the Queen of Scots with all manner of contumacies, branding the King himself, and his Council in the most bitter manner; and being cited to appear before him, refused, saying; That the Papists were exempted from all Regal Authority and that Ecclesiastical persons were not to be confin'd by the Prince, but by their own Convent (directly against the Laws made the year before in Parliament) whereby the Kings Authority over all persons, whether Ecclesiastical or Secular, was confirm'd; and namely, That the King and his Council were Supreme Judges in all Causes; and that whatever refused to be try'd by them, should be held guilty of High Treasons, all Presbyters and Lay-conventicles forbidden, Parity of the Clergy taken away, and the Authority of Bishops restored, while Calling the Presbyters had condemned as wicked and Antichristian; And lastly, all scurrilous Libels against the King and his Mother prohibited; namely, the Scotsish History of George Buchanan, and his Dialogus de Jure Regii et Sedis.

At this time, upon her Advertisements suggestion, the Queen of Scots is taken from the Earl of Shrewsbury, and committed to the custody of Sir Ainslie潘特 and Sir Drury Drury, and that on for purpose (as some were pervert'd) to drive her into abrupt and desperate attempts; and indeed upon this, she grew more important with the Pope and King of Spain, to hasten their tendance, whatever became of her, as ill indeed was like to become of her, if it be true (as some said) that Leicester sent out squabines to meet her, that Bemerton detected the villainy, and would grant them no access.

And now to alienate Queen Elizabeth utterly from her, it is suggested to her, That Allen for the Catholics of the Clergy, Ingledish for the Late, and the Bishop of Rothe for the Queen of Scots, with content of the Pope and King of Spain, had joynly combined to depose her, and to bar the King of Scotland from his hereditary Right to the Crown of England; and to marry the Queen of Scots to an English Nobleman of the Romish Religion, and him the English Catholics should choose King of England, and the Pope confirm the Election; and all this upon the credit of Hart the Priest; but who this English Nobleman should be that should marry the Queen of Scots, could not be found, though Waddington were but to search it out; the fame went upon Henry Howard the Duke of Norfolk, Brother, who was a single man, a great Papist, and of high estimation among the Catholics.

This year died in Exile and misty Charles Nevill, who was in the Rebellion in the North, the Earl of Westmorland of this Family; a house from whence descended many Noble Personages, six Earls of Westmorland, two Earls of Salisbury and Warrick, an Earl of Kent, a Margrave of Montfort a Duke of Bedford, Baron Ferrers of Osney, the Lord Latimer, the Lord of Abingdon, one Queen, & five Dutchesses (to let pass Conroy and Baroneffes) an Archbishop of York, and a numerous company of other Lords. In England died none of reckoning this year, but only Plundes the famous Lawyer, but in France, the Duke of Anjou died of grief; and in Holland, William Prince of Orange, shot into the body with three Bullets, by one Beysheur Gerard, a Burgundian.

It was now the year 1584, and the 28th. of Queen Elizabeth Reign, when to the French King more nearly to her, whom the year before she had receiv'd into the number of the Knights of the Garter, the next the Earl of Derby into France, to invest him with the Robes and Ornaments, according to the due solemnity; which he kindly accepted, and at Evening Prayer was invested with them.

At this time a Parliament was assembled at Westminster, wherein William PARRY a Welshman, a but as he was taking Shipping by his own servants to carry he was discovered, apprehended, and laid in the Tower.

At the same time lay in the Tower Henry Percy, Earl of Northumberland; a man of a lofty spirit, being suspected by reason of secret confutations with Turogma, the Lord Pope and in the Tower, or found dead in his bed.

After the landing of the Queen, her Padre, and all that attended her, the Jew, the Popish Priest, and all that should receive or relieve them, These Laws were carried by Sir Thomas Bodley, and in the two hundred and twenty, he thereupon wrote a Letter to the Queen, That for the service of God, and his Souls health, he purposed to leave his Country, but not his loyal affection towards her;
joined with them about eight thousand men. The Earl of Arran hearing hereof, makes haft to the King, and accuses Patrick Gray as Author of this comotion; but whilst Arran was making provision for defence of the Town, the eneemies were ready to scale the Walls: whereupon Arran being advised, that onely his life was sought, gets secretly away with onely one Servant, the rest betook themselves to the King in the Caffle. The Rebels get into the Marketplace, and display their Banners against the Caflle: The King lends Gray to know the reason of their coming; they answer, to submisselves, and in humble manner to kifs the Kings hands: The King offereth restitution of all their Goods, if they would depart; They desire to be admitted to his Presence, which upon these conditions the King granted. That they should not attempt any thing against his life, or those he should nominate, nor make any innovation in the Government. They protest, They are ready to sacrifice their Lives for his safety and innovation, they had not formed a thought, They only request to have their adversaries, and the Fortifications of Scotland delivered up into their hands. Hereupon after a dayes Consiliation, they are admitted into the Kings Presence, and forthwith the Earls of Mount-Rooff, Crawford and RobJay; Colonel Steward, Donn, Arran's Brothers, and others, were delivered to them; The Earl of Arran, who was fled into the Western Islands, is home: The Assaulters were pardoned, and pronounced good Subjects. Hamilton is set over Dumfrinet Caffle; Goldingkillole over Eden-burgh; the Earl of Angus over Tantallon; the Earl of Moray over Steriha; and Glames is made Captain of the Guard. Upon this, all Pro\ncipulations and Out-lawries against all Persons, since the Kings Inauguration (having some few procribed for the murder of the Kings Father) are called in, and many Impositions, done by the Earl of Pert, the Treaty of a League with the Queen of England is agreed upon, and Delegates nominated to that purpose.

In Ireland likewise was a Conbussion this year, first the Barkes (defecanded of the ancient Family of the Burroughs in England) provoked by the vvere Government of Richard Bingham Governor of Connaght, raise Rebellion; but this was soon suppressed, for Thomas Bark dyed fighting; Meyler and Theobold Bark were taken and hanged. After this the Clan Gibbons, Clan Donells and Joyce, combined together in great numbers, and say plainly, They will have a Mac-William of their own, one of the Barkes to rule over them, or some other Lord out of Spain;
they will admit of no Sheriff into their Country,
nor appear before the English Courts of Justice;
and thereupon harned all the Country with Fire and Sword, and neither by the perturbations of the Arms nor by the intreaties of the Earl of Clanricard (the chief of the House of the Barkes) would be quieted, till John Bine-han the Presidents Brother, following them into the Woods, drive away five thousand head of their Cattell, so as after forty days, half starved, they came forth and submitted themselves. But this was not yet an end; for now the President underwood, That two thousand Scottish Islanders were landed, and ready to break into Connaght; whereupon he orders his men to give them battle, but they flying to Bogs and Woods, he retires back, as though in fear, thereby to draw them from the Bogs to firm ground, and then with his whole forces set up on them, flew three thousand of them (indeed all but fourscore) amongst whom were Donell Garvey and Alexander Garvey, the Sons of James Mac-Conel, who had long disquituated this part, and those Barkes who were the first Authors of this Rebellion.
This was a famous Victory, for the good of the present and future times; for hereby the name of the Mac-Williams in Connaght was utterly extinct, and the insolent attempts of the Scottish Islanders absolutely crushed.

In the Low-Countries at this time the States were very hard beft, as so they held a Confutation, whither to file for Proteftion, either to the French King, or to the Queen of England. Monfieur Franck the French Ambadchodzą between the parties to induce them to the reasons why they should fie rather to the French King, or to Engliſh on the other fide, allged many Reasons why they should fie rather to the Queen of England; but in conclusion, they have firft recourse to the King of France, and afterward being by him neglected, to the Queen of England. But then in England it was confulted, Whether it were meet to protect them; wherein the Counsel was divided; Some were of Opinion, That it were good to receive and aid them, left the Spaniard first conquer them, might have the better way to annoy England; others again thought, They were to be held no better than Rebels to their lawful Sovereign, and therefore unworthy of alliftance. After long debating the matter, the Queen refufed to take them into Protection, much lefs to exercise Sorvraignty over them. Nevertheless to rife the Siege of Amnwerp, which was then beleaged by the Prince of Orange, &c. it was convenient to supply them with four thousand Soldiers, fo as the Town of Slauand the Ordinance belonging to it, were given up into their hands: but while this matter was discussing, the Town of Anmwerp was fain to yield it felf.

But the Queen better bethinking her felf,partly as fearing the growth of the King of Spain's Power, and partly, as commiffirating the affliction of her own Religion, at left resolves to undertake their protection, upon condition of her part, to supply them with five thousand Foot, and a thousand Horfes, under a fufficient General, pay-ning them during the War; and afterward the expences to be payed back, upon condition on their part, by way of Pledge, to deliver Fifeing and the Forts of Armneck, the Town of Briel, with the two neighboring Forts; and for the justifiing of this har action, the fet forth a large Declaration. And knowing that herein the incensed the King of Spain, the thought bet that his anger further from home, and therupon sent out Sir Francis Drake and Christopher Cardyle, with a Navy of one and twenty Ships (wherein were two thousand Volunteers and Marines) towards the West-Indies; who first surprized the Town of St. Jaffe, afterward St. Dominick (where five and twenty thousand Crowns were given them, to spare the Town from burning) afterward

Carragen.
The Reign of Queen Elizabeth.

Cartagena, which they held seven weeks, till the Spaniards redeemed it for a hundred and ten thousand Crowns. After this, the Calentures waxing hot, and diminishing their Forces, they returned homewards, falling by Virginia, a Colony which Sir Walter Raleigh had there planted; from whence Drake brings home with him Ralph Lane, who was the first that brought Tobacco into England, which the Indians take against estates of the Stomach. At this Expedition were left about seven hundred men, who for the most part died of Calentures: their Boat amounted to the value of three thousand pounds Sterling, besides two hundred and forty Bears and Iron Pieces. These things were done under the Torrid Zone in America; when in the mean while, Captain John Davis, with two Ships (at the charges of William Sanders, and other Citizens of London) found out a way to the East Indies, by the highest part of America, under the Frigid Zone.

At the end of this year, the Earl of Leicester is sent General of the Queens Forces into Holland, accompanied with the Earl of Essex, the Lords Audley, and North, Sir William Rust, Sir Francis Sherley, Sir Arthur Bart, and Gentlemen, who, being by Sir Philip Sidney, Clifton and divers other Knights, besides five hundred Gentlemen, Landing at Flushing, he was first by Sir Philip Sidney the Governor his nephew, after by the Towns of Zealand and Holands, entertained in most magnificent manner, and coming to the Hague in January, the States by Patent committed to him the command and absolute authority over the united Provinces, with the Titles of Governor and Captain General of Holland, Zealand, and the Confederated Provinces: So as being now saluted with the Title of his Excellency, he began to assume unto him Princely Spirts: But the Queen took him soon off from further aspiring, writing unto him in most peremptory manner; That the wonder how a man who had rased out of theduit, could so contemptuously violate her commands, and therefore charged him upon his Allegiance, to put in execution the Instructions given him by His Highness Vice-Chamberlain Withall, in Letters apart, the expostulation with the States, that to her great disparage ment, they had cast upon the Earl of Leicester her Subject, the absolute command over the united Provinces, without her privity, which she herself had utterly refuted; and therefore willeth them to desist from that absolute authority, to whom she had set bounds, which he should not pass. The States return Answer, That they are heartily sorry they should incur her displeasure by conferring upon the Earl that absolute Authority, not having first made her acquainted, but therefore befeech her to consider the necessity of it; seeing, that for avoiding of confusion, that Authority must needs be cast upon some one other; Neither was there any great matter in the word Absolute, seeing the Rule and Dominion reigned still in the people. By these Letters and Leicester's own submitive writing, the Queen was soon satisfied; Leicester all this while receiveith Contributions and Rewards from all Provinces maketh martial Laws, and endeavouring likewise to raise new Cuffians upon Merchandises, incurred great dislike among the common people. His first Service was to relieve Grave a Town in Brabant, which the Prince of Parma, by Count Mannfeld had besieged: Either he sent the Count Holben a German, and Norris General of the English Foot, but notwithstanding all the great Service they did there, the Town in the end was taken, but Henri, the Governor, for his cowardly yielding it up, lost his head. From hence the Prince of Parma march ed into Gelderland, and pitched his Tents before Venloo, where Skenich Frieslander, and Roger Williams Vodfjoman performed great service, yet that Town in a short time was taken also; But in the mean while the Lord Willoughby Governor of Bergen op Zoom, cut off the enemies Convoys, and took away their Vittuals; and Sir Philip Sidney and Maurice the Prince of Orange, Son upon a sudden onset, took Aazle, a Town in Flanders. From Venloo the Prince of Parma goes to Berke, where there were twelve thousand English, under the command of Colonell Morgan: he notwithstanding his Siege to the Town, which the Earl of Leicester came to raise, but finding his Forces too weak to take it, he seeks to divert it, by beleagueri ng Deniburg, which before the Prince of Parma could come to relieve, he took. And now the Prince of Parma, fearing lest Zypern should again come into the hands of the English, he carried thither, which the Spaniards, carrying along in a siege, the English by chance lighted on them, vanquished a Troop of their Horse, flew Hannibal Untergasic and divers others, but then on the English side was one slain, more worth than all the English and Spaniards put together, Sir Philip Sidney, who having his Horse slain under him, and getting upon another, was shot into the thigh, and 25 days after, in the flower of his age, dyed: A Man of so many excellent parts of Art and Nature, of Valour and Learning, of Wit and Magnanimity, that as he had equalled all those of former Ages, in future Ages will hardly be able to equal him. His Funerals were in sumptuous manner solemnized at St. Paul's Church in London. James King of Scotland made his Epitaph, and both Universities celebrated his death with Funeral Vows.

After this Leicester assaulted Zypern, where fe tting upon a Fort, he takes it in this manner: Edward Stanley (of the Stanley of Eiford) catching hold of a Spaniard Luuan, which was bandashed at him, held it so fast, that by it he was drawn into the very Fort, whereupon the Spaniards being affrighted (as thinking all the enemies were coming up) forsooke the place; Leicester, Knighted Stanley for this Act, gave him forty Pounds in present money, and a yearly Pension of an hundred Marks during his life. And now though in this forwardness to win the Town, yet Winter being already come on, he thought it un advantageous to besiege it any longer (especially so many English Garrisons lying round about it, which were in the nature of a Siege) but returned to the Hague, where the States entertain'd him with complaints, that their money was not carefully husbanded, that the number of the English fapphires were not full, that foreign Soldiers were counted under the command of the Vittuals to be used, and new devices for contribution invented; for all which evils, they intreated him to provide some present remedy. To which complaints (having a purpose to go for England) he gave a friendly answer; lury of a good Family in Devonshire, Charles Tiley one of the Queen Pensioners, Chyldock Tichburn of Hampshire, Edward Ainslie, whose Father was Confessor to the Queen; Robert Gage of Surrey, John Travurs, and John Chanruck of Lancashire, John Jones, Savage formerly spoken of, Barnabé of a noble Family in Ireland, and Henry Donne a Clerk in the Office of Fruits and Tenths; one Poole also confined himself into their company, a fellow thoroughly acquainted with the affairs of the Queen of Scots, who was thought to have revealed all their Conclusions to Walsingham day by day. To these Gentlemen, Babington communicateth his affairs, but not every particular to every one, but to Ballard, Tichborn, and Dannes, he shewed the Letters which passed between him and the Queen of Scots; with Tiley and the rest, he dealteth as being their agents, of whom, some at first loath, at last consented, and in a foolish vain-gloriousmanner, as Picture of the Affiliates was made to the life, and Babington in the midst, with these words, "Quam est habeas proprioam?" This Picture (which the Earl of Essex) was gotten and privately shewed to the Queen, who knew none of them by face but only Barnwell, (who had oftentimes came to her in the caufes of the Earl of Kildare, whose servant he was,) Certain it is, that the Queen one day walking abroad, spied this Barnwell, and turning to Haigton, said, Am not I well Guarded, that have not so much as one man in the company with a word by his side? Thus much Barnwell himself told the rest of his Confederacy, and how easie a matter it had been to have dispatched her at that time, if the rest had been present. The chief discoverer of the Plot, was the aforesaid Gifford: This man was a Gentleman of a good House at Chelbington in Staffordshire, not far from Charity, where the Queen of Scots was kept prisoner, and was now sent by the English Fugitives in France, under the counterfeit name of Lafo, to put Savage in mind of the Vow he had made, and to convey Letters between them and the Queen of Scots. But he, whether pricked in Conscience, or known none in minds, came to Walsingham privately, revealing who he was, and for what end, and by whom sent into England; Walsingham courteously entertained him, and sent him down into Staffordshire, to do the work he had undertaken. Here Gifford bribing the Brewer of the house, where the Queen of Scots lay, contrived the matter in such sort with him, that by a hole in the Wall, in which a loose stone was put, he should give in, and receive forth Letters, the which by meffengers purposely laid by the way, came evermore to Walsingham hands, who broke them open, copied them out, and by the rare cunning of one Thomas Philips, found out the meaning of the private Characters, and by the singular Art of Arthur Gregory, sealed them again curiously, that no man would imagine they have been opened, and ever sent them to the parties, to whom the supercription directed them. In like manner were the former Letters from the Queen of Scots to Babington intercepted; as also other Letters written at the same time to Mendez, the Spanish Ambassador, Charles to the Lord Paget, the Archbishops of Gales, and Francis Englishfield. The Queen as soon as the under-
The Reign of Queen Elizabeth.

The Queen of Scots hath her Clothes broken open, and her Boxe barricaded.

The Queen of Scots, with any Papers in them, they set them on fire, and sent them to the Court: In which, being but open before the Queen, were found a number of Letters from Foreign parts, the Copies like wise of Letters sent to several Persons, and therefore Alphabets at leaf of private Characters; as also, Letters to her from some of the English Nobility, containing great prizes of Love and Service, which the Queen notwithstanding took no notice of, but passed over in Silence, according to her Motto, Vide & Tacis, I see, and say nothing. Gifford now, who had all this while served their turn, is sent into France; but ere he went hence, left an Indenture with the French Ambassador here in England, with Instructions that he should deliver no Letters to the Queen of Scots, or the Fugitives in France; but to him that exhibited an Indenture matching with that, the which he sent under-hand to Sir Francis Walsingham.

The twelfth of September, seven of the Fourteen of the Court Privy Council were Arraigned and hanged. But is discovered and taken.

The twenty second of September, seven of the Fourteen of the Court Privy Council were Arraigned, and hanged.
Councils were not all of one mind; some conceived, that it were not good to take any rigorous course against her, but only to hold her in full custody; both for that this was, not Author of the Treason, but only conscious to it, and because she was craze, and not likely to live long. Others, out of a care of Religion, were of opinion, to have her forthwith Arraigned and put to death according to Law; Leisler thought it better to have her poiyoned and sent a Divine to Wol Jung bead to prove it lawfully, but Wol Jung beard protected against that course. A difference then arose amongst them, by what Law to proceed against her; Whether by the Law of the 25. of Edward the Third, (In which they are pronounced guilty of Treason, who plot the destruction of the King or Queen, raffe War in his Dominions or adhere to his Adversaries) Or else by the 27 of the Queen Enacted a year since; Their opinion at last prevailed, who thought best to proceed against her by this later Law, as being indeed in this case provid ed. Whereupon, divers of the Lords of the privy Council, and others of the Nobility, are Authorized by the Queens Letters, to enquire by virtue of that Law, and passe sentence against all such as raised Rebellion, invaded the Kingdom, or attempted any Violence against the Queen. The Commissioners therefore in the eleventh day of October repaired to Fotheringay Castle in North hamptonshire, where the Queen of Scots was then held prisoner; and the next day, sent unto her Walter Midlam, Pawlt and Edward Barker, publick Notary; who delivered her the Queen’s Letters; which having with a fet led countenance read, she said, It seems to me strange, that the Queen should lay her Command upon me, to hold up my hand at the Bar, as though I were a Subject, seeing I am an abso quire Government, no lefe than her self; but how ever, I will never do any thing prejudicial to Princes of my degree, nor to my Son the King of Scotland. After many meetings, the banding all upon her innoc ency, and upon her exemption from answering, as being an absolute Prince, and specially for yealding to be tried by the English Laws of which, One (he said) had lately been made of purpose for her de stead. Her Advice was, that the Lord Chancellor and Treasurers, That if the refused to answer to such crimes as should be objected, they would then proceed against her, though she were absent. Being brought at least with much ado to content, the Commissioners came together in the Presence Chamber; a Chair of Este tate was set for the Queen of England, in the upper end of the Chamber under a Canopy; beneath over against which, was placed a Chair for the Q. of Scots; on both sides of the Cloth of Este tate foids were set, upon which, on the one side sat the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Treasurers, the Earls of Oxford, Kent, Derby, Worcelft. Rutland, Cumberland, Warwick, Pembroke, Lincoln, and Vichount Mountains; On the other side sat the Lords Arran, Montrose, Zouch, Moray, St. John of Sleifs, Comyn, and Cherse; Next to these sat the Knights that were Privy Commissioners, Sir James Crofts, Sir Christopher Haunts, Sir Francis Mount, Sir Robert Keddie, Sir Philip Midlam, and Sir Amias Pauley; Forward he fore the Earls, sat the two Chief Justices, and the Lord Chief Baron; on the other side, the two Barrons, and the other Justices; Dole and Ford, Doctors of the Civil Law, at a Table in the mids, Pagham the Queen’s Attorney General, Egerton her Solicitor, Gondie her Serjeant at Law, the Clerk of the Crown, and two Notaries. When the Queen of Scots was come, and had placed her self, silence being made, Bramly Lord Chancel lor turning towards her, said, That the Queen had appointed these Commissioners, to hear what she could answer to Gondie laid to her charge, a furing her, That nothing would be cause of more joy to the Queen, than to hear that she had pro voked her innocent. Upon this she rising up, said, That although, being an absolute Prince, she could not be compelled to appear before the De legates, yet to manifest her innocence, she was now content to appear. Then Gondie opened every specialty of the Law lately made (against which she had taken Exception) writing by Ba bington, Scheme of Letters, by Letters passed between them, by the confessions of Bellard and Savage, by the Confessions of her Secretaries, and Curie, that she was pray to their Treasons, and confented to the Invasion of England, and def truction of the Queen. To which she an fwered, That Letters might be counterfeited, her Secretaries might be corrupted, the rest, in hope of life, might be drawn to confefs that which was not true; In this the flood peremptorily, That she never confented to any attempt against the Queen Perfon; though for her own delivery, she confessed the did. After many other charges by the Commissioners, and replies by the Queen of Scots; At last, she requifted, that he might be heard in a full Parliament, or before the Queen her self, and her Council. But this requifition prevailed not, for on the Twenty fith day of Octo ber following, at the Star Chamber in Westminster, the Commissioners met again, and there pronounced sentence against her; Ratifying by their Seals and Subscriptions, that after the first day of June, in the teven and twentieth year of our Sovereign Lady Queen Elizabeth, divers matters were composed and imagined in this Kingdom, by Anthony Babington and others, with the privity of many Quire of Scots, pretending Title to the Crown of England, according to the hurt, death, and detraction of the Royal Person of our said Sovereign Lady the Queen.

Barons, and the other Justices; Dole and Ford, Doctors of the Civil Law, at a Table in the middle, Pagham the Queen’s Attorney General, Egerton her Solicitor, Gondie her Serjeant at Law, the Clerk of the Crown, and two Notaries. When the Queen of Scots was come, and had placed her self, silence being made, Bramly Lord Chancellor turning towards her, said, That the Queen had appointed these Commissioners, to hear what she could answer to Gondie laid to her charge, assuring her, That nothing would be cause of more joy to the Queen, than to hear that she had provoked her self innocent. Upon this she rising up, said, That although, being an absolute Prince, she could not be compelled to appear before the Delegates, yet to manifest her innocence, she was now content to appear. Then Gondie opened every specialty of the Law lately made (against which she had taken Exception) writing by Babington, Scheme of Letters, by Letters passed between them, by the confessions of Bellard and Savage, by the Confessions of her Secretaries, and Curie, that she was pray to their Treasons, and consented to the Invasion of England, and destruction of the Queen. To which she answered, That Letters might be counterfeited, her Secretaries might be corrupted, the rest, in hope of life, might be drawn to confess that which was not true; In this the flood peremptorily, That she never consented to any attempt against the Queen Perfon; though for her own delivery, she confessed she did. After many other charges by the Commissioners, and replies by the Queen of Scots; At last, she requifited, that he might be heard in a full Parliament, or before the Queen her self, and her Council. But this requifition prevailed not, for on the Twenty fifth day of October following, at the Star Chamber in Westminster, the Commissioners met again, and there pronounced sentence against her; Ratifying by their Seals and Subscriptions, that after the first day of June, in the seven and twentieth year of our Sovereign Lady Queen Elizabeth, divers matters were composed and imagined in this Kingdom, by Anthony Babington and others, with the privity of many Queen of Scots, pretending Title to the Crown of England, according to the hurt, death, and destruction of the Royal Person of our said Sovereign Lady the Queen.

After a few days, a Parliament was holden at Westminster, which was begun by Authority from the Queen, derived to the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Treasurer, and the Earl of Derby; and the same, nor without some Prejudices. At this Parliament, the Prorogation of the Lord Page, Charles Page, Francis Ingfield, Francis Throgmorton, Anthony Babington, Thomas Salkbury, Edward Jones, Chyduck Fischborn, Charles Tilney, and other the Complexes, was confirmed, and their goods and possessions adjudged confiscate. Also the Peers of the Kingdom, with an unanimous consent, exhibit a Petition to the Queen by the Lord Chancellor, That for the preservation of the true Religion, and safety of the Queen, of themselves, and their Posterity, the Sentence pass’d against Mary Queen of Scots, might according to Law be presently promulged: They put the Queen in mind of the fearful Examples of Gods Judgments extant in Scripture, upon King Sals, for sparing of Agag.
The Reign of Queen Elizabeth.

A while after, the Queen treated the Lords to think of some ways, by which the Queen of Scots life might be saved, and her own not endangered.

The Lords return Answer: That no way can be no way of her safety, but the Queen of Scots death.

and upon Abbe, for not putting Benhaddad to death. But the Queen answered them to this effect: First, acknowledging Gods miraculous preservation of her, and then their constant affection towards her, for whose sake only the duties to live: Otherwise, when the calls to mind things past, beholds the present, and expects what may happen in time to come, that the accounts them most happy, who go soonest forth. That the Law lately made, by which the Queen of Scots is condemned, was not made (as some maliciously have imagined) to enfrain her, but contrariwise, to forewarn and deter her from attempting any thing against it, which though it had not been made, yet were there other ancient Laws enough to condemn her. Nothing could have been more grievous to me, than that a Prince, and one so near allied unto me, should deserve the sentence pronounced against her; and seeing the matter is of rare example, and of a very weighty consequence, I hope you will not expect, that I should at this present determine any thing; yet that there may be no danger in delay, I will in due time frame my mind unto you; and in the mean time, would have you expect from me, whatsoever good Subjects look for from a Gracious Prince.

A few days after, having deeply weighed the matter in her mind, she sent the Lord Chancellor to the Peers, and Puckering to the Lower-House, entreating them to advise more diligently concerning so weighty a matter, and to be themselves of some wholesome remedy, by which the life of the Queen of Scots might be spared, and their security also provided for. They, when they had a long time in a most serious manner deliberated hereof, return at last this Verdict, That the Queen's life could not be in safety, while the Queen of Scots lived, unless the either repented and acknowledged her Crimes, or were kept in straight custody, or bound by her Oath and Obligations, or gave hostages; or lastly, departed the Kingdom. And seeing none of these were likely to be remedies, it remained, that only her death would be a remedy. Repentance in her they could little hope for, who would not to so much as acknowledge her self faulty: Close Imprisonment, Obligations, Oath, and Hostages, they accounted as nothing, which all vanished, if the Queen's life were once taken away; and if she departed the Kingdom, they feared she would straightway go to invade it again. These things the Lord Chancellor, and Puckering the Speaker of the Lower House, declared to the Queen at large, and urged her in their names, to have the Sentence put in execution. Hereupon the Queen after a short pause, spoke at left to this effect: I protest, my chief desire hath been, that for your security, and my own safety, some other way might be devised, than that which is now proposed; but seeing it now evident and certain, that my safety without her dejection, is in a more deplorable estate, I am most grievously affected with inward sorrow; that I, who have pardoned to many Rebels, have neglected to many Treasons (either by connivance, or silence), should now at last execute cruelty upon a Prince so nearly allied to me. As for your Petition, I beseech you to rest in an Answer, without an Answer: If I say I will not grant your Petition, I shall hereby say what I meant not; If I should say, I will grant it, then call I my self into destruction by my own, whose safety you so earnestly desire. And that I know, you in your Wisdom would not I should do.

After this, the Parliament was prorogued; and then were the Lord Buckhurst and Bent sent to the Queen of Scots to let her understand that the Sentence was pronounced against her, and confirmed by Parliament, and that the execution of it was earnestly desired by the Nobility and the Commons; and therefore perverted her, that before her death, she would make acknowledge- ment of her offences, against God and the Queen. Intimating, that if she lived, the Religion received in England, could not subsist. Hereupon, she was taken with an unwaited alacrity, and seemed to triumph for joy, giving God thanks, and gratulating her own felicity. That she should be accounted an Infrument, for establishing Religion in this Island; and therewith requested, she might have some Catholic Priest to administer the Sacrament to her; but was denied, which some deemed, not inhuman only, but tyrannical and heathenish. The Bishop and the Dean, whom for this cause they commended to her, the latter rejected, and jeered at the English Nation; whereas the English were ever and always wont to maintain their own Kings, and therefore no marvel, they should now trust after her de- formation. In December following the Sentence against her was proclaimed in London first, and after over all the Kingdom, wherein Queen Elizabeth seriously protested, that this Promulgation of the Sentence was extorted from her, to her great grief, by the importunity of the whole body of the Kingdom. The Queen of Scots being told hereof, seemed not a whit deceived with it; but writing to the Queen, never made intercession for her self, nor expostulated her death, but only makes three small requites; one, That she might be buried in France by her Mother; another, That she might be put to death privately, but his serv- ants to be present; the third, That her servants might freely depart, and enjoy such Legacies as she had given them. Of which Requites, the fairest the Queen to voice them an answer; but whether this Letter ever came to Queen Elizabeth, is uncertain.

This condemnation of the Queen of Scots, as a thing strange, and scarce credible, was soon spread far and near; so as intercensions came thick in her behalf to Queen Elizabeth, but specially from the King of Scots, and the King of France, who sent their several Ambassadors, using all the reasons that natural affection in the one, and likelihood of condition in the other, could urge, for sparing of her life; but when the necessity of the State, seemed to obstruct all ways of clemency, the French Ambassador L'Aubeuip, falled from reasons toection, and thinketh no way so effe- ctual for saving of the Queen of Scots life, as to take away Queen Elizabeths life; and thereupon, first, he dealt covertly with William Stafford, a young Gentleman, and prone to embrace hopes (whose Mother was of the Bed-chamber to Queen Elizabeth, and his Brother at that time, Ambas- sador Liger in France) and afterward, more openly by Trapp his Secretary, to murder the Queen. Staffords, though not daring to act such a villany himself himself, yet commended one Moody to him, a resolute fellow, and one that for money would be sure to do it. Upon this, Stafford brings Trappe to Moody, being then in the common Goal, who upon Trappe's offer, undertakes it: But then the consiluation was, by what way it should be done? Moody propounded poxion, or else to lay a bag of Gunpowder under the Queen's Bed, and suddenly fire it. But Trappe liked of neither of these ways, but would rather have it done, as was done to the Prince of Orange. But while they are thus confiluating about the way of doing it, Stafford discovers all to the Lords of the Council. Whereupon Trappe who was now bound for France, was apprehended, and being examined, confessed the whole matter: Upon this, the Ambassador himself was sent for to Cecil's house, the twelfth of January, where met him by the Queen's appointment, Cecil, Lord Treasurer, the Earl of Leicestier, Sir Christopher Hatton Vice-Chamberlain, and Davison one of her Secretaries; who declare to the Ambassador every particular which Stafford, Moody, and Trappe his Secretary had confessed. Alison as Stafford was brought forth, and began to speak, the Ambassador interrupted him, and reviling him, made accusation, that Stafford first propounded it; when Stafford falling on his knees, made full and most improper excuses, that the Ambassador first propounded it himself. But whatsoever propounded it (faith Burleigh) it appears, that you were, made acquainted with the matter. To which he presently replied; That if he had known of any such thing yet, being he was an Ambassador, he could not give notice of it, but to his own King. After much reasoning in this manner, the Lord Burleigh admonished him to beware how he offended herself in this kind, and let him know, That he is not quitted from the offence though for this time the Queen be pleased to forbear him.

But upon this Treaty, the Queen of Scots Adversaries put many terrors into Queen Elizabeth's mind, giving out, That the Spanish Navy was come to Mistiff Haven, That the Scots were broken into England; That the Duke of Guise with a great Army was landed in Saffex; That the Queen of Scots was cleared of Prisone, and had gotten a Company up in Arms, and many other fresh reign'd suggestions; Through which, at length they drew the Queen to this: That the sealed Letters, for executing the Sentence against the Queen of Scots, and one of her greatest per- fiders to it (as the Scots reported it) was one whom the King of Scots had sent to diftribute her from it, namely Patrick Grey, who founded often in her cause, Mortua non mordere; when she is dead, she cannot bite; The Queen notwithstanding, began to weigh with her self, whether it were better to rid her out of the way, or else to spare her; and many great reasons offered themselves on both sides, but where only speculative reasons presented themselves for sparing her; many prudential reasons, and those prefled both by Courtiers and Preachers, were prefled to her; so as long holden in fuf- pence, she would oftentimes fit speciously, and her countenance cast down. At last, her fear prevaling, the delivered to Secretary Davison, Letters under her hand and Seal, to get the Com- mission made under the Great Seal of England, for the Execution of the Queen of Scots, which might be in a readiness upon any fear of danger; charg- ing him not to divulge the matter to any whom ever. But the next day her mind was altered and sent Sir William Killewrite to Davison, to contamand the making of the Commission. Whereupon Davison goes to her, and lefths her know, That the Commission was already made and the Seal put to it; Whereat, the Queen extremely angry, rebuketh him sharply for his haffinefs; yet Davison imparte the matter to Proxy Commissioners, and persuades them. That the Queen commanded, the Commission should be put in execution. Hereupon, Beatle Clerk of the Council, is sent down with Letters, wherein authority is deputed to the Earls of Shrewsbury, Kent, Derby, Cushernald, and others, that she should be put to death according to the Law, with which proceeding, the Queen was not once made acquainted; and more than this, although she had intimato Davison, That she would take some other order concerning the Queen of Scots, yet did not he lay Beatle from going.

And now comes in the last Act of the Queen of Scots Tragedy; for as soon as the Earls were come to Petheringham; they, together with Sir Amias Pauley, and Sir Dryn Droiti, with whom she was then in custody; go unto her, and reading the Commission, signifie the cause of their coming; and in a few words, admonish her to prepare which she doth, rather for death, for that the might die the next day. Whereof, without any change of countenance, or token of pain or dejection, made her answer; That she did not think that my Sister the Queen would have contended to my death, who am not subject to your Laws; but since it is her pleasure, death shall be to me most welcome. Then the Queen told her, that she might confer with her Confessor, and Melby, her Steward, which would not be granted; The Bishop or Dean of Peterborough they offered her, but them she refused. The Earls being departed, she gave order that Supper should be hainted, where she eat (as she used to do) loberly, and sparingly; and perceiving her men and women servants to lament and weep, the comforteth them, and bid them rejoice together, that she was now to depart out of a world of misery. After Supper, the looketh over her Will, read the In- ventory of her Goods and Jewells, and writ their names severally by them, to whom she gave any of them; after her wonted hour she went to bed, and after a few hours sleep, awakening, spent the rest of the Night in her devotion. And now the fatal day being come, which was the Eighth of February, the gretteth up, and makes her ready in her best Apparel, and then betook her self in her Cloke; to Almighty God, imploring his affi- nance with deep sighs and groans; untill Tho- mas Andrews, Sheriff of the County gave notice, that it was time to come forth, and then with a Princeely Majesty, and Chiarful Countenance the came out, her heart covered with a linnen Vail, and carrying an Ivory Crucifix in her hand. In the Gallery the Earls met her, and the other Gentlemen, where Melby her Servant upon his bended knees, deplored his own fortune; that he should be the messenger to carry this sad news into Scotland; whom the comforted, say- ing, Do not lament Melby. Than shalt by and by see Mary Stewart freed from all cares. Then turning turning her self to the Earls, she requested that her Servants might stand by her at her death, which the Earl of Kent was very loth to grant, for fear of superflition; to whom she said, Fear nothing, these poor wretches desire only to give me my last farewell. I know the Queen my Sitter would not deny me so small a request. After this, the two Earls, and the Sheriff of the County leading the way, she came to the State-Hall, which was set up at the upper end of the Hall, where was a Chair, a Curtain, and a Black, all covered with Mourning. Then the Dean of Peterborough going to Prayers, she falling upon her knees, and holding up the Crucifix in both her hands, prayed with her Servants in Latin, out of the Office of the blessed Virgin. Prayers being ended, she kissed the Crucifix, and signing her self with the Sign of the Cross, said, As thy Arms, O Christ, were spread forth upon the Cross, so embrace me with the open arms of thy mercy, and forgive me my sins. Then the Executioner asking her pardon, she forgave him. And now her women helping off her outer Garments, and breaking forth into thrieks and cries, she kissed them, signed with them the Cross, and willed them to leave lamenting, for now an end of her forrowes was at hand; and then shadowing her face with a linnen cloth, and lying down on the Black, she repeated the Psalm, In te Domine speravi, ut confiderer in aeternum, which words the flitching forth her Body, her head at two blows was taken off. Her Body was afterward Royally buried in the Cathedral Church at Peterborough; but first that her Noble Son James, King of Great Britain, ered a Royal Monument for her, in King Henry the Seventh's Chapel at Westminister. That end had Mary Queen of Scots, in the six and fortieth year of her age, and of her Imprisonment in England the eighteenth; a Lady to compleat in all excellent parts of body and mind, that it must needs have made her a happy Woman, if she had not been a Queen; and perhaps a happy Queen too, if she had not been Heir to the Crown of England: For why did all her Endeavours wantuccels, but only from the fear of that Succession? and no innocence of hers could be a Defence, where the fury of Jealousie made the Affait.

As soon as it came to the Queen's knowledge, that the Queen of Scots was put to death, her Countenance grew dejected, and her speech failed her; insomuch that all in mourning weeds, she gave her self over to pressing, commending her Person to her Preference, and caused Davison to be cited to the Star-Chamber. And as soon as grief would suffer her, she wrote a Letter with her own hand to the King of Scots, and sent it by Sir Robert Cary, to this Effect; That her mind was infinitely disquieted, in regard of this lamentable event, against her meaning and intent; entreating him to believe, That if she had commended it, she would have never denied it, and withall protesting her true affection towards him, and her affidious watchfulness for the prospering of his affairs.

While Cary was on his journey, Davison is cited to the Star-Chamber before the Delegates, Sir Christopher Wray, Chief Justice of the Kings-Bench, for that time made Lord Privy Seal, the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, the Earl of Worcesterv, Cumberland, and Lincoln, the Lords Gray, and Lumley, Sir James Crofts, Comptroller of the Quean Houle, Sir Walter Mildmay, Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Edmund Anderson, Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and Sir Roger Manwood, Lord Chief Baron (where note, that Bromley Lord Chancellor, first Lord Treasurers, Lechsetter, and Hauen, were indeed more guilty of the fault than Davison; were none of the number,) Before these Delegates, P. Thuan the Queen's Attorney brought to Davison's charge Contempts of the Queens Majesty, violating of his truft, and neglect of his duty, laying open all particulars of his fault, which after Egerston the Queens Solicitor, Goudy, and Puckering, Serviants at Law, urged also against him with great aggravation: To which Davison and his and any mildly answered, That he would not conteft with the Queen; only Protested, That if he had done any thing otherwise than he ought, it was out of ignorance and mistaking, and not out of any purpose, to disobey her Majesty. It seems the Queen had carried her self, as one that would have it done, and yet was loath to do it, scarce knowing her own mind, and yet would have another know it; meaning to make it the work of mistaking, rather than of Purpose, that to at least she might leave some place of satisfaction to her self, that it was not absolutely of her doing.

The pleadings ended, the Commissiouns went to confer, Manwood began, and gave his Opinion, That Davison for the unconsideracion of his fault, and should be fined ten thousand pounds, and Imprisonment during the Queens pleasure, the ret went on in that Sentence, only the Lord Grey excused Davison to far, That he thought him worthy of reward rather than punishment. The conclusion was, the first Sentence for his Fine and Imprisonment, was by Royer Keeper of the Priwy Seal confirmed; and Davison never after recovered the Queens favour, though the relieved him sometimes in his necessity. A man ingenious indeed, but not thoroughly acquainted with the ways of the Court; and thought have been raised to this place, of purpose to act this part, and for nothing else.

By this time Sir Robert Cary, Son to the Lord Hunsdon, who was sent to excuse the Queen, was come to the Boudens; but being come thither; was not suffered to set foot in Scotland; The King would have hear him by another, and with much ado received his Letters. He called home his Ambassadors out of England, and thought of nothing but the Queen's death.

But the Queen still laying the fault upon Davison, and the undisavowed credulity of her Counsellors, by little and little affayeth his passion; and expecting till time had somewhat assuaged his grief, that it would indure to be rushed, at length by her Agents in Scotland, and soon after the Lord Hunsdon Governor of Berwick, the admonished him, How dangerous it would be for him, to break out into War against England, and what little help he could justly expect from either Spain or France; but if he persisted in anity with England, he might be sure the Queen of England would most lovingly account him for her Son. And to the end that he should assure himself, that the Queen his Mother was put to death without her privity, he sent him the sentence against Davison;
The Reign of Queen Elizabeth.

... under the Seals of all the Delegates, and attainted under the Great Seal of England, and another Infrument like that was engrossed with the hands of the Judges of England; in which they aver, That the Sentence against the Queen of Scots could in no wise be prejudice to his right in the Succession.

Having now by these and the like coures somewhat aliasaged the King of Scots indignation; to prevent the War which they foresaw was imminent from the King of Spain, they send forth Drake with four of the Queens Ships and others, into the Coaft of Spain, to fet upon their Ships in the Havens, and to intercept their Munition, Drake entering into the Port of Cadiz, funk, took, and fired about an hundred Ships, wherein was great force of Munition and Victuals: Then returning to the Cape of St. Vincent, he fet upon three Floets, and compelled them to yield, Thence putting fail to the Western Ilands, called Azores, under the great Meridan; by great good fortune he happened upon a huge and wealthy Carack, called St. Philip, retuming from the English Indies, and easily vanquished it; Whereupon the Mariners on both sides, from the name of Philip, portended no good like to Philip King of Spain.

And the like also did Thomas Cavendish of Suffolk, in the other part of the World, who two years before had sent fail from England with three Ships, passing through the Straights of Magellan, in the Coaft of Chilis, Peru, and Nova Hispania, fired a great number of Spanish Towns, took and pillaged Nineteen great Ships, and amongst them a wealthy Ship of the Kings migh to Caliborning, in North America; and to the Philippine Isles, the Molucces, the Cape de Ben Eperance, and the Island of St. Heleia, returned home the next year, being the third after Magellan, that failed about the World.

As Drake and Cavendish at this time gained great fame and renown; to two other men in the Netherlands (Stanley and York) purchased as great infamy and disgrace: This York was a Lowmaner, a bold fellow, and of loose behaviour; famous for bringing hurt into England, that effect of turning his point upon the Adversary in single Combats, whereas the English till this time, were wont to be armed with Bucklers and Swords, and to strike with edge, and it was held no manhood to turn the point, or strike below the girdle. He suffered some affront from the Earl of Leicester, red away, and for a time, served under the Spaniards in the Netherlands (Stanley and York) purchased as great infamy and disgrace: This York was a Lowmaner, a bold fellow, and of loose behaviour; famous for bringing hurt into England, that effect of turning his point upon the Adversary in single Combats, whereas the English till this time, were wont to be armed with Bucklers and Swords, and to strike with edge, and it was held no manhood to turn the point, or strike below the girdle. He suffered some affront from the Earl of Leicester, red away, and for a time, served under the Spaniards in the Netherlands, till at length being reconciled to Leicester, he was sent over the Port near Zutphen; but being bribed, he not only yielded up the place to the Enemy, but drew to the like villany one Stanley, who with great valour had served in an Irish Expedition, to yield up Dublin to the Spaniards, a Wealthy and well fortified Town. But what got they by their treachery? The Spaniards set York and Stanley at variance, they poison York, and seize upon his goods, his Circuit was three years after digged up by the States Commandment, and hanged upon a Gibbet till it rotted away; Stanley went into Spain, where there was no credit given to him, for the Spaniards have a saying, It is lawful to give honour to a Traitor sometimes, but never to trust him.

These late Trescheries wrought the Earl of Leicester some Envoy with the Confederated Netherlands, because the Traysors were very intimate with him, whereupon the States in large letters to the Queen, accuse Leicester for all manner of the Weal publick, in the matter of money, Merchandize, and Military affairs; and to his credulity, they impute the harm which accused by York and Stanley. The Queen, for the narrow shifting of the matter, and composing it; sent thither Thomas Buckhurft, Lord Buckhurst (latey taken into her Privy Council in Leicesters absence) Norris, and Bartolomew Clerk: But when the officious diligence of Buckhurst was seen to trench upon Leicesters Reputation; his grace with the Queen proved to forbel, that Buckhurst at his return, was for certain months confined to his house.

Afterward since being beleaguered by the Prince of Parma, Leicesters was by the States sent out for of England, to encour the Town was furiously affaulted with Seventeen thousand great floor, and a mighty breach was made into it; which nevertheless Roger Williams, Francis Vinc, Nicholas Basgwill, the Garrison of the English Wallons, vanquished bravely for a while, but at last was forced to make good their retreat to the point that came to relieve it, finding himself too weak for the Besiegers, being gone away. And indeed, the States would not commit any great Army to his Command; who (they knew) had a determination to seize Leyden, and some other Towns in to his own hands, and had a purpose to surprize the absolute Government. Whereupon the States used means, that Leicesters was called home; give up the Government to the States, and in his room succeede Maurice of Nassau Son to the Prince of Orange, being now but twenty years of age. Peregrine Lord Willoughby, was by the Queen made General of the English Forces in the Low-Countries, to whom the give command to reduce the English Jactions into the States obedience; the which, with the help of Prince Maurice, was easily effected.

Leicester being now come home, and perceiving that an Accusatian was proouched against him by Buckingham, and others, for having managed of Affairs in Holland; privately with teas he cast himself down at the Queens feet, entreatiing her, that she should not receive him with disgrace at his return, whom she had lent forth in honour; and so far prevailed with her, that the next day being called to examination before the Lords, he took his place amongst them, not kneeing down at the end of the Table, as the manner of Delinquents is; and when the Secretary began to read the heads of his accusation, he interrupted him, saying, That the publick Infractions which he had received, were limited with private restraint; and making his appeal to the Queen, eluded the whole crimination, with the secret indigation of his Adveraries.

This Year was famous for the Death of many great Perfonages: In the moneth of February, dyed Henry Nevil Lord of Abington, a Grandchild to Edward Nevil, who in the Reign of King Henry the Sixth got his Title in the right of his Wife, only Daughter and Heir to Richard Beauchamp Earl of Pembroke, and Lord of Abing-

Upon the complaint of the States, against the Earl of Leicester, the Lord Buckhurst is sent to examine his doings.
The Reign of Queen Elizabeth:

In which right, when as the only Daughter of this Henry, Wife to Sir Thomas Eustace, challenges the Title of Baronets of Albemarle, a memorable Contention arose concerning the Title between her, and the next Heir Male, to whom by Will (and the same confirmed by Authority of Parliament) the Castle of Albemarle was bequeathed. This question being a long time debated; at last in a Parliament held in the Second year of King James, the matter was tried by Voyces, and the Heir male carried the Lordship of Albemarle; and the Barony Le Difpen-cery, was ratified to the Female. This year also in the month of April, dyed Sir Ralph Sadler, the last Chancellor of England.

Sir Christopher Hatton was made Lord Chancellor, who though he was a Courier, yet the Queen knowing him to be an honest man, thought him not unfit for the Place, where Confidence hath, or should have more place than Law: Although some were of Opinion, that it was not so much the Queens own choice, as that she was prevailed to it by some that wiffht him not well; both thereby to be a cause of abating him from the Court, and thinking that such a sedentary place, to a corpor-ticks, dyers, of great age.

England.

In the time of a Treaty of Peace between England and Spain the King sends his great Armado against England.

The English found it no hard matter to van- quish, by reason of their unskilfulness in Arms, eight hundred, and five hundred Horse, was held an invincible Army; but after Percy command, they were exercised in Feats of Arms, and taught to discharge Muskets at a Mark, and in the Low- Countries learnt the Art of Fortification, they held the English better to it, and were not so easily overcome.

And now we are come to the one and twentieth year of Queen Elizabeth Reign, being the year 1588, long before spoken of by Astrologers, to be a wonderfull year, and even the Climatie-cal year of the World. And yet the greatest Wonder that happened this year, was but the wonderful Fleet that Spain provided for invading of England, if the defeat of that wonderfull Fleet were not a greater Wonder.

It is true, there was at this time a Treaty of Peace between England and Spain; and the Earl of Derby, the Lord Cobham, Sir James Crofts, Dale and Roger Doctors of Law, Commissioners for the Queen, for the Prince of Parma, the Count Aurenberg, Champigny, Richardes, Mait, and Garveyr, Doctors, had many meetings about it, next to Officers; but it seemed on the part of Spain, rather to make the English secure, that they should not make provision for War, than that they had any purpose of real proceeding facing they accepted not of any reasonable Conditions that were offered, but trilled out the time, till the Spanish Navy was come upon the Coaft, and the Ordinance heard from Sea, and then dismissed the English Delegates.

The Spanish Navy consisted of one hundred and thirty Ships; whereas Galleys and Gal-ons feventy two, goods Ships, like to floating Towers, in which were Southerns 15620, Mariners, 8530; Gallys, 2080; Great Ordnance, 2630; For the greater holiness of their Action, twelve of their Ships were called the twelve Apostles. Chief Commander of the Fleet was Don Alphonfo, Duke of Medina; and next to him, John Martine Records, a great Sea-man.

The twentieth of May they weighed Anchor from the River Tags, but were by Tempet to miserably dispers'd, that it was long ere they met again; but then they went before to the Prince of Farnia. That he with his Forces, consisting of fifty thousand old Southerns, should be ready to join with them, and with his Shipping conduct them into England, and to land his Army at the Thames Mouth.

The Queens Preparation in the mean time was this; The Lord Charles Howard, Lord Admiral, with all her Navy, and Sir Francis Drake Vice Admiral, were to be ready at Plymouth; and the Lord Henry Seymour, (Second Son to the Duke of Somerset) with forty English and Dutch Ships, to keep the Coafts of the Netherlands, to hinder the Prince of Parma's coming forth. Then for Land Service, there were laid along the Southern Coaft, twenty thousand Souldiers, and two Armies besides of Trained men were levied; over one of which, consisting of a thousand Horse, and two and twenty thousand Foot, the Earl of Lee-corder commanded, and pitched his Tents at Til-tury, near the Thames mouth: Over the other, appointed to guard the Queens Person, and consembling of four and twenty thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse, was Generally. Arthur Lord Grey, Sir Fransc. Knollys, Sir John Norris, Sir Richard Bingham, Sir Roger Williams, and other Military men, were chosen to make a counsel of War, and consult how the Land Service should be ordered. These declared amongst other things, That the places which lay fittest for the Enemies landing, as Milford-haven, Fa-mouth, Plymouth, Portland, the Isle of Wight, Ports mouth, the Downs, the Thames mouth, Har-

wich, Yarmouth, Hull, and such other, should be fortified with Works and Garrisons; the Trained Souldiers of those Shires, which lye near the Sea Coaft, should defend those places, and be ready at the Alarm to hinder the Enemy from Landing; but if he did land, then to spoil the Country round about, that he might find no Food; and by continual crying, Arm, Arm, give the Enemy no rest, but yet should not give Battel, till good Store of Commanders were come together.

At this time many fearing the Papists at home, no lefe than the Spaniards abroad, persuaded the Queen to take off the heads of some of the great-toff them; but the detesting such cruelty, order only, That some of them should be committed to custody to Whiby Cally.

And
And now all things on both sides prepared, the Spanish Navy set forth out of the Gross in May, but was dispersed and driven back by weather. The English fleet, set forth somewhat later, out of Poimout and bearing towards the Coast of Spain, but partly by occasion of contrary winds, partly by advertisement that the Spaniards were gone back, and upon some doubt also that they might put by towards the Coast of England, whilst they were seeking them afar off, they returned to Poimout. At which time, a confident (though false) advertisement came to the Admiral, that the Spaniards could not possibly come forward that year. Whereupon the English Navy was upon the point of disbarding, and many of the men were gone on shore, when suddenly the Spanish Navy was upon the point of dispersing, the whole of the incivility Armada (for so it was called in a Spanish estimation) was discovered upon the Western Coast, whereof the Lord-Admiral being informed, had much ado to get the Queen's Navy out of the Haven (the wind being contrary) yet at length he hasted it forth. The next day, the English beat the Spanish Ships, in height like to Cattles, sayling lowly along, when they could not possibly pass by, that they might have the benefit of the wind to follow after. The one and twentieth day of July, the Admiral of England sent a Pinnace before, called The Defiance, which by a great shot, challenged the Spaniards to fight, and by and by, for they fell to it. Then Drake, Hawkins, and Forester, fly light against the outmost Squadron, which Raleigh commanded, making him glad to fly to their main Navy for succour. The night following, a mighty Bysea of Owend's (in which the King of Spain's Treasure was) was by chance fired with Gun-powder, but was timely quenched by other Ships sent to her succour, one of which Ships, was the Galeone of Don Pedro, whom Sir Francis Drake, took Prisoner, and sent him to Dartmouth. The Bysea fell by the (the Treasure being taken out by the Spaniards) they left behind them, which the English brought into the Haven of Plymouth. The three and twentieth day of this month they had a second fight, in which most of the Spanish shot flew over the English Ships, and never hurt them; Only Cock an English man, being with his little Vessel in the middle of the Enemies, died valiantly. The four and twentieth day they refought on both sides; in which time the Lord Admiral ranked his whole Fleet into four Squadrons: The first he ruled himself, Drake the second, Hawkins the third; and Forester the fourth. The five and twentieth day (which was Saint James's day) they fell to it the third time; in which fight, the English had again the better, so as after this time, the Spaniards would no more turn upon the English, but holding on their course, dispatched a Meffengers to the Prince of Parma; requiring him forthwith to join himself to the King's Fleet, and withall to send them Bullets. The day following, the Lord Admiral Knighted Thomas Howard, the Lord Sheffield, Roger Townsends, John Hawkins, and Martin Forester; and holding a Council of War, they decreed not to rest again upon the Enemy, till they came to the Strait of Cadiz, where the Lord Henry Seymour and Sir William Winter waited for their coming. And now to the English being terrified with this invincible Navy, that many of the Nobility and other of special note, hired Ships at their own charges, and came to the Admiral; as the Earls of Oxford, Northumberland, Cumberland, Thomas and Robert Cecil, Henry Brooke, Sir Charles Blount; Sir Walter Raleigh, Sir William Hasting, Sir Robert Carys, Sir Ambrose Willoughty, Sir Thomas Gerard, Sir Arthur Gorge, and others. The seven and twentieth of July, towards the Evening, the Spaniards cast Anchor near unto Cadiz, and not far from them rode the English Admiral, within shot of a great Ordinance, to whom Seymour and Winter joined themselves: for by this time there were in the English Navy a hundred and forty Ships, nimble and serviceable for fighting or saying, yet only Fifteen of them bore the Viscount of the Battell. And now again the Spaniards sent Post after Post to the Prince of Parma to send them forty Fly-boats, without which they were not able to skirmish with the English, by reason of the greatness and weight of their Ships; and of the Spaniards, he prepared his Fleet presently to set to Sea with his Army; but he was unprepared, and his Flat-bottomed Boats were full of chinks, and leked; and besides, the Holofiders hovered before the Ports of Dunkirk and Newports, in such fort that he durst not look forth. The eight and twentieth day, the Lord Admiral made ready eight of his own Ships, on the out-side dawed with Wilde-fires, Rozin and Bumflame, within full of combustible matter, and under the Conduit of Young and Promes, sent them down with the wind in the silent time of the night, towards the Spanish Fleet; the which when the Spanish did approach them, and the Sea as it were all on a light fire; imagining with all, that these Fire-ships might carry in them some muttering Engine; they made a hideous noise, took up Anchors, cut Cables, spread Sails, and betook themselves to the Oars, but more to the Light. Only one of the Spanish Galeons fled at it, at Her Rudder, and floating up and down, was held in fight by Amias Prestyn, Thomas Gerard, and Harvye, who slew Captain Hugh Mondach, the Souldiers over board, and carried away a great deal of Gold, but the Vessel and Ordinance was wrecked to the Governor of Cadiz. Drake and Fenner in the mean while perceiveing the Spanish Fleet to gather together again before Graveling, set upon them with great violence, to whom straightways Fenner, Southwell, Belfion, Crayton, and Riman join themselves, and soon after the Admiral himself, Sir Thomas Howard, and the Lord Sheffield; the Galeone called Saint Matthew, was sorely battered by Seymour and Winter, driven toward O fend, and set upon again by the Zeelander, and at last was taken by the Flagoniers. And now the Spanish Navy having want of many necessaries, and no hope of the Prince of Parma's coming, they resolved to return Northward for Spain, in which passage they left both many Ships and men, the English Navy still following them close, till they were fain to give them over for want of Powdery. Whilest these things paffed at Sea, the Queen in Person came to Tilbury, to view the Army and Camp there, where the Spanish Navy returns home, The Queen in person comes to Tilbury to view the Army.

where the heaved such undaunted Courage and Resolution, that it wonderfully animated the spirits of all. And thus this Navy, which was three whole Years in preparing, in the space of a Moneth was often beaten, and at length put to flight, many of their men being slain, more than half of their Ships taken and sunk (of the English not above a hundred at the most missing, nor so much as a Ship, but Cocks little Vessels) and saying about all Britain by Scotland, the Orkneys and Ireland, they returned into Spain with as much dishonour as they came out with boating, for indeed Attendees in France by a Book in Print, triumphed before the Victory.

For the happy successse of this Action, Queen Elizabeth appointed Prayers and Thanksgiving over all the Churches in England, and the (as it was in Triumph) came in Perion, attended with a great Troop of Nobility into the City, and went into the Cathedral Church of St. Paul (where the Banners taken from the Enemy were placed in view) and there in most humble manner gave thanks to Almighty God: And that which increased the publick joy, was the News which Sir Robert Sidney brought out of Scotland, That the King had no overt all injuries, was largely as-\ndrew toward the English and designed to impose sincere and perfect amity with the Queen. For as for the King of Spain, he wittily told the Embassador, thit he expected no other carthesie from him, but such as Polyspermous promiseduffle, that he should be the last whom he would de-\navour.

peculiar Prayers for his own private use. Being demanded whether he were guilty of these things; turning himself to the Judges, he asked them these questions: First, whether it was lawful to hlep up to so many Crimes together in one Bill of Indictment? They answered, that it was: Then whether Arguments taken from presumptions were of force? They answered, that it was law-\nful for him to interpose exceptions, if he saw cause. Then again, if he might be Accused for those things which were Capabl by the Law made the thirteenth year of the Queen, after that the time expressed in the Act was expired? They promisst, they would proceed against him by no Law, but the old Statute of Tretation, made in the Reign of King Edward the third. But now again asked if he were guilty or not? he pleaded, Not Guilty; whereupon Puckering the Queens Sergeant at Law, Popham Attorney-General, Shuslie worh Sergeant at Law, and Egerion the Queens Solicitor, in their turns, urged and proved the Crimes objected: some whereof he denied, some he extenuated; but in conclusion, was by his Peers found guilty, and condemned; yet the Queen spared his life, and was content with thus much done in terror to the People.

It concerns the state of England, to look at this time into the state of France, for while those things were in doing between Spain and England, the Popish Princes of France, under pretence of the Catholick Religion, entered into a Commodation, which they called, The holy League: The purpose whereof was, to root out the Protestants, and to divert the Right of Succession to the Crown of France; For they bound themselves to each other by Oath, to suffer no per son but a Catholick to be King of France; which was directly to exclude the King of Navarre, and the Prince of Condé, if the present King without foime male should fall. The head of this League was the Duke of Guise, who having given some over in to the Forces of England, the King of France in aid of the Protestants, was immen-turly extolled by the Clergy and others; and grew to such a height of reputation, that entering into Paris, he made the King glad to leave the City, and in an Assembly at Biéges, to make him great Master of the French Cavallery, and to con-Jent by Edux, to the cutting off the Protestants.
So as the King standing now in fear of him, used meanest left, even in the very Court, to have him murdered; and soon after, the Cardinal his Brother to be strangled. Hereupon so great a confusion followed, that the people every where distroyed the Magistrates, and ipoyled the Kings Great Palace at Paris. Some Cities affected a Democracy, others an Anarchy, but few liked of a Monarchy. The Confederates in the mean while made a new Seal, and supped the Royal Authority, and seized into their hands the best fortified places, intercept the Kings Revenues, call in Spanish of the Souldiers; and in all places denounced the King, and the Cardinal his Brother as being forced to fly to the Protestants for succour, they then most wickedly, by one James Clement a Monk, made him away. The King being ready to die, Declared the King of Navarre to be his lawful Successor.

The King is murdered by a Monk.

Being ready to die, he declared the King of Navarre to be his lawful Successor.

The Cardinal of Renuer is proclaimed
King of France, and as the fame some also, the King of Navarre.

The King of Navarre being thus raised in Dignity, but weak in means, implored Aid of the Queen of England, offering to make a League Offensive and Defensive; the Queen out of a pious respect to a King of her own Religion, gave him presently two and twenty thousand pounds sterling in Gold (such a sum of Gold, as he professed he had never seen at one time before) and withall supplied him with four thousand Souldiers, under the Command of Peregrine Lord Mildoughly; for Colonels, the appointed Sir Thomas Hinford, who was made Marital of the Field, John Borough, Sir William Drury, and Sir Thomas Bakersly, and gave them a moneths pay in hand. Hereupon the Confederates (whom the King had vanquished a little before at Argus beyond all expectation) began to quits, and the day before the arrival of the English, they vanished away: with this addition of Forces, the King marcheth to Paris, and being ready to enter the City, caused a retreat to be founded, as leath to have spoile made of a City, which he hoped shortly should be his own. Afterwards by the affiance of the English he won many Towns, and then having marched at least five hundred miles on foot, he met the Aldermen of a long winter service, to return into England. In which Voyage of men of note, died Captain Hunning, but of a natural death, also Stubbs (he whose right hand was cut off for writing the Book against the Queens marriage) and Sir William Drury slain by Mafter Borough in a fingle Combat, where the quarrel was, that he being but a Knight, would take place of Borough that was the younger Son of a Baron, contrary to the Laws of the English Gentry.

About this time, James King of Scots (with Queen Elizabeths good liking) espoused Anne Daughter of the second King of Denmark, by his Deputy; but the afterward saying for Scotland, was by tempest cast upon Norway, and there, through continual storms forced to play, so as the King in the Winter-fason set tayl that the marriage according to his vow might be accomplished within the year; some were of opinion, that these storms were caused by with-craft, and was confirmed indeed by some Witches taken in Scotland; who confessed they had raised these storms to keep the Queen from landing in Scotland, and that the Earl Buckingham had asked Counsell of them concerning the Kings end; who was thereupon cast into prison, but in a short time breaking loose, occasioned new flirns in Scoces; Countres of Suffolk, Sitter to Sir Henry Sidney, urer of the Exchequer, William Somerset Earl of Worceser, so numerous in his off-spring, that he could reckon more children of both Sexes than ton, Henry Lord Compton, and at Bruxelles the Lord Paget.

At this time, the Queen who was always frugal, strained one point of Flegality more than ever he had done before; for upon the information of one Carman, (though Littler, Burleigh, and Walsingham were offended, that credit should
should be given to such a one, and themselves neglected the raised Thomas Smith the Cus- tomer from thirteen thousand pounds yearly, to two and forty thousand pounds, & at last to fifty thousand.

It was now the year 1590, and the three and thirtieth of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, in which the Earl of Cumberland made a Voyage to the Indies, where he laid level to the ground the Port of the Isle of Fife, and brought away eight and fifty Pieces of Great Ordnance.

This year was fatal to many Noble personages; first dyed Ambrose Dudley Earl of Warwick, (Son to John Duke of Northumberland without issue. After him Sir Francis Walsingham Secretary, a man more skilful in the Politicks, than in the Oceonics; more cunning in managing matters of the publick State; than of his own private estate, which he left to mean, and dyed to much indebted, that he was fain to be buried by night, without any Funeral pomp, in the Cathedra Church of Saint Paul; leaving behind him one only Daughter, famous for her three Husband, all of them the goodliest men of their time; the first, Sir Philip Sidney; the second, Robert Earl Eves: the third, Richard Burgh Earl of Claricard, by King Charles made Earl of Saint Al- bany. Within two Months after Walsingham, di- ed Sir Thomas Cavendish, who had been fourteen times sent in Embassy to several Princes, yet was never rewarded with any greater dignities, than the Chamberlainship of the Exchequer, and the Palmamaterhip of England. Soon after him dyed Sir John Crofts, who had done good service in Scotland, in Edward the Sixths time, in Queen Mary's time was commended of High Treason, in Queen Elizabeth time fet at liberty, and made Comptroller of her house. After him died George Talbot, the seventh Earl of Shrewsbury of this House; He was made Earl-Marshal of England, and left behind him a memorial of Wisdom and Integrity. Lastly died Thomas Lord Went- worth, the last of the Earls that had been Gov- ernor of Calice.

In Ireland at this time Hugh Geaves (so called, because he had been long kept in Petters) the natural Son of Clan O Neale, accused Hugh Earl of Tyrone, for holding private consulta- tions with certain Spaniards, who in 88 were by Ship-wreck cast upon the coast of Ireland: Tyr- one to prevent the Accumulation, took the said Hugh, and when others related to do it, took a cord, and with his own hands strangel'd him. Here- upon the Earl was sent for into England, and by pardon obtained, jealously undertook in pre- sence of the Queen at Greenwich, to maintain the peace with Turagh Lyney; Not to suft up the Title of O Neale, nor any authority over the Gentry about him; to reduce the Territory of Tyrone to the form of a County, and civil behai- viour; and many such matters; giving Hoiages for his true performance; and indeed for a time he observed all things very duly. This trouble allayed, another arose; for soon after this, Hugh Roe Mac-Mahon, a Patriciate in the Territory of Monangan, compelled those under his jurid- cition to pay him Tribute; whereupon the De- puty cauht him to be taken, and tried by a Jury of common-Soldiers, and then to be hanged up, dividing his lands amongst certain English, and some of the Mac-Mahons, retaining a certain yearl Rent to the Crown of England, by this means thinking to extinguish the Power and Ti- tle of Mac-Mahon. But hereupon, O Rock fearing that he should be fared in like manner, took up Arms against the Queen, whom Stignams President of Connaught soon disfitted, and drove into Scotland, and at the Queen's request was by the King delivered up into his hands.

It was now the year 1591, and the four and thirtieth of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, when the careful left Britany should come into the Spaniards hands, sent Edmund York into France, to adverce the King to take care thereof; and promising to lend him Forces to that end, if he would name some Towns, where they might be in safety. Hereupon he named Clerkew; Gran- vite or Brest, as the fittest; and it was agreed, that three thousand English should be sent into Britany and Picard: but in the mean time, Henry Palmer was sent to Sea with certain Ships, who feized upon thirteen Spaniards Ships, as they were returning from Nova Francia. And now Roger Williams, with a Company of fix hundred Soldiers, paffeth over to Dyss in Normandy, and Sir John Norris, with the ret of the Forces, hated into Britany soon after. Roger Williams with his own fix hundred, and the help of Char- ter Governour of Dyss, put to rout the Confe- ders, that had block'd up the paffages; whole value, the Frank King in his Letters to the Queen, highly extolled. Whereupon growing more and more, and not finding his Charge, which was to lay at Dyss, he accompanied the King to the very Suburbs of Paris, where, in ho- nor of his Nation, he sent a Challenge to the Spaniards, to encounter two hundred Pikemen of the Englis, and a hundred Musque-teers, with as many Spaniards, in open Field.

After this, the King of France acquainted the Queen, that he had a purpoe to fet upon Roan or Neu- beu, before the Prince of Parm should come into France, and thereupon request- ed her, to fend four thousand English into Nor- mandy, which upon certain conditions the wil- lingly did, and sent them under the Command of Robert Earl of Essex, accompanied with Sir Thomas Leighton and Sir William Killegrew as his Counsellors. When the Earl came into France, he found the King was at Lyon, and in Nor- mandy no preparation for the War at all, which seemed strange, and much troubled him; but by and by Sir Roger Williams comes to him from the King, requiring him to come to Lyon, that they might confer concerning a course of War. Thither the Earl made a tedious journey, and being come thither, the King told him, he was now of necessity to go himself into Champagne; but promiseth to fend Marjall Biron, and the Duke of Montfanger forthwith to him, to lay Siege to Roan. Hereupon the Earl returned to his Tents, expeciting their coming, but neither of them came, which troubled the Earl more than before; for as being weary now of doing nothing, he made himself one approach to Roan, where his Brother Walter Dearent was unfortunately flain. Indeed the affairs of the King of France were at this time upon so uncertain terms, that before he could act what he had resolved, something full intervened, that diverted him; for which, by his Letters he excused himself to the Queen.

Queen of England, and by the mediation of the Earl, and Marquis Lord du Prieff, whom to that end he sent into England, obtained new supplies, and then befugued oan.

At this time was memorable the prodigious carriages of one Hacket, born at Oundle in Northamptonshire, a mean fellow of no learning, whose first prank was this; That when, in shew of Reconciliation to one with whom he had been at variance, he imbraced him, he bit off his nose, and the man defiritg to have his nose again, that it might be bowed on, while the wound was green, he most villanously cut it up, and swallowed it down before his face. After this, all on a sudden, he took upon him a shew of wonderful holines, did nothing but hear Sermons, and getting Scriptures by heart, and counterfeiting Revelations from God, and an extraordinary calling, grew to be magnified by certain zealous Miniters, and especially of one Edward Copping, (a Gentleman of a good House) and one Arthington, a great admirer of the General Discipline; that they accounted him as sent from Heaven, and a greater Prophet than Moses or John Baptist; and finally, that he was Christ himself, come with a fan in his hand, to judge the World. And this they proclaimed in Chesterfield, giving out that Hacket participated of Christ's glorified body, by his especial Spirit, and was now come to propagate the Gospel over Europe, and to settle a true Discipline in the Church of England; and that they themselves were two Prophets, the one of Mercy, and the other of Judgment; with many other such incredible Blasphemies, whereupon Hacket was apprehended and arraigned; and at last, hanged, drawn and quartered, continuing all the time, and at his death, his blasphemous Assertions, Copping a while after flared himself to death in Prion, Arthington repented, and made his Recantation in a public writing.

Besides these, others also at this time opposed the established Government of the Church of England, crying down the calling of Bishops, with whom sied some Common Lawyers also, affirming, that the Queen could not depurate, nor these men exercise any such Ecclesiastical Judisdiction, and that the Oath of Office was unchristian. But the Queen conceiving, that through the sides of the Prelates, the her self was shot at, captivated them what the count, and maintained the Government formerly established.

About this time, the Lord Thomas Howard, six of the Queens ships having waited at the Azores fix whole Moneths, for the coming of the Spanish Fleet from America, was at last set upon by Alphonfo Basfano, with three and fifty ships, sent out for the Convoy of the American Fleet, where Richard Greenevo Vice-Admiral, being in the Revenge, and seperated from his company, was to hemmed in by the Spanish ships; and so battered with great shot, that most of his men being slain, his Main-wheel cut off, himself fore wounded in the head, he commanded to sink the Ship, that it might not come into the Spaniards hands; but this being counterfeited by moat voyns, it was agreed, to yield it to the Spaniards, upon condition that the men should be let ashore. Greenwoolehimself was carried into the Spanish Admiral, where within two days he dyed, nor without paine of his very enemies; Thus the great Ship called the Revenge, was yelded, but had so many leaks in the Keel, that soon after it was cast away in a storm; and the loffe of this one Ship soon made good upon the Spaniards, by taking many of theirs.

About this time also, Cavendish, who in the year 1578. had sailed round about the World, now with five Ships bene his course towards the Magellan Straits; but by reason of foul weather, was not able to passe them, and being driven to the coast of Brazil, was there cast away.

And now, emly increasing during daily between Spain and England, two Proclamations were set forth; one, prohibiting upon pain of High Treason, to carry Villains or Munition into any of the King of Spain Dominions: Another, forbidding all persons to entertain any in their Houses, till enquiry made, what they were, left they might entertain Papift Priests, who at this time came swarming into England, by reason the King of Spain had lately founded a Seminary at Wakefield for the English.

At this time died Sir Christopher Hatton Lord Chancellor, whom of a mean Gentlemans boute, the Queens favour raised to this height of Dignity; a goodly personage of body, of Nobility, but the most absurd spirit, the only of all the Queens special Favourites, that died a Batchelor; and therefore left William Newgatt his Sifers son his Heir, who erced for him in Saint Pauls Church, a sumptuous Monument. After his death, the keeping of the great Seal was for certain Monethes committed to the Lord Burleigh Treasurer, Husfon, Cobham and Buckhurst; Afterward, Packeringe the Queens Serjeant at Law was elected, not Chancellour, but Keeper of the great Seal.

At this time also, Brian O-Rork, the Irish Poet, was arraigned at Westminster; his Indictments were, for raising Rebellion against the Queen, for dragging her Picture at a Horse-tail, for giving the Spaniards entertainment; which things being told him by an Interpreter, (for he understood no English) he said, He would not be tryed, unless the Queen her self in person fate to judge him. Yet being told, that it was the Law, he only said, If it must be so, let it be so; and so condemned, was executed at Tyburn as a Traytor, whereof he seemed to make as little recconing, as if it had been but in jest. And now this year, the Queen made the Colledge of Dub- lin in Ireland, an University, which was formerly the Monastery of All-Saints, endowing it with power to confer Scholastical Dignities.

At this time, Sir John Perrot, who had been Deputy of Ireland, and done good service there, was yet by the malice of his Adversaries, of whom John Hatton was one, called in question, before the Baron Husfon, the Lord Buckhurst, Sir Robert Cecil (Irly he made a Councellor) Sir John Forre- sease, Sir John Holley, and some of the Judges: His Accusations were; First, that he had spoke opprobrious words against the Queen, saying, She was illegitimate and cowardly; Secondly, that he had favored notorious Traytors, and Papift Priests; Thirdly, that he held correspondence with the Prince of Parma, and the Queens enemies. To the first of which he confesed, that in his passion he had spoken of the Queen unadvisedly, for which he was infinitely grieved; the rest he denied: And all men knew,
The Reign of Queen Elizabeth.

Laws, but follow them, nor dispute whether better Laws might be made, but observe those which were already in force.

This year dyed Anthony Browne Viscount Montacute, whom Queen Mary honoured with this Title, because his Grandmother was Daughter, and one of the Heirs of John Nevill Marquis Montacute; who, though he were a great Roman Catholic, yet the Queen finding him faithful always, loved him, and in his Sickness went to visit him. There dyed at this time also, Henry Lord Scroop of Bolton, Knight of the Garter, and long time Governor of the Western Borders toward Scotland.

At this time Henry Barrow, and his Secrario, condemning the Church of England to be no Christian Church, and derogating from the Queens Authority in matters Ecclesiastical; he the said Barrow, the King leader of the rest, was put to death, in terror to all such disturbers of the peace of the Church.

About this time, by reason of the Queens correspondence with the Turks, to the end her Subjects might have free Trading in the Territories; it was maliciously given out by some, that the Queen had excited the Turk to a War against the Christians, which caused the Queen to write to the Emperor, shewing him the falseness of this report, wherein the gave him full satisfaction.

And now a confuent report came into England, That the King of France had already embraced the Romish Religion: which is so much troubled the Queen, that she presently sent Thomas Wilkes into France; with Reasons (if it were not too late) to divert him from it. But before Wilkes came, the King indeed had openly professed the Romish Religion at the Church of Saint Denis in Paris, of which his Conversion, he declared the causes to Wilkes at large, shewing the necessity of it, unless he would suffer himself to be utterly thwart out of the Kingdom. And the French Ambassadors finding as much to the Queen, in great perplexity, the writ to him to this effect:

Alas, what grief? what anxiety of minds both befal me, since I heard this news? was it possible

This year, the Queen going in Progress, passed through Oxford, where she was entertained by the Scholars with Oatations, Stage-Plays and Disputations; and, by the Lord Buckhurst Chancellor of the University, with a sumptuous Feast. At her departure she made a Laiute Oatation, wherein she vowed a Vow, and gave them counsel; Her Vow was, That as the defined nothing to such, as the prosperity and flourishing estate of her Kingdom, to live as much as possible to see the Universities and Schools of learning to flourish likewise. Her Counsel was, That they would serve God above all, not following the curiosity of some Wits, but the Laws of God, and the Kingdom; That they would prevent the fellows threatening proved not altogether vain, for the Earl within four Moneths dyed a most horrible death. This year, Death had his tribute paid from the Nobility; for there dyed Henry Rateiff Earl of Suffolk, and three renowned Barons, Arthur Grey of Wilton, Henry Lord Crom- wel, and Henry Lord Wentworth; besides Sir Christopher Carell, whose Warlike Prowesse at Sea and Land, doth deserve to be remembered.

In Ireland, But the Irish were not yet, as it were, in Canons bevelled, and Tyrone assuming to himself the Title of O-Neale, (which in Ireland is more esteemed, than to be called Emperour,) but upon a sudden, dissembling his discontent, he submitted himself to the Deputy, and promised all obedience.

It was now the year 1594. and the seven and thirtieth of Queen Elizabeths Reign, when the good correspondence between the King of Spain and Queen Elizabeth gave the Papists small hope that ever he would prove an Instrument to reform the Catholick Religion. Whereupon, they began to think themselves of some English Papists, which might succeed the Queen; but finding none of their own Sect a fit person, they fixed their thoughts upon the Earl of Essex, who always seemed a very moderate man; and him they de- cided to have some right to the Crown, by De- scent from Thomas of Woodruffe, King Edward the Thirds Son. So the English Pugitives were for the Infants of Spain; and defiring to fet the King of Spain, and the Earl of Essex at odds, they forth put a Book, which they Dedicated to Essex, under the name of Dolman, but was written indeed by Parson (Dolman bitter Adversary) Cardinal Allen, and Francis Englefield. The scope of which Book was, to exclude from Succession all persons whatsoever, and how near HEROERSTHALL. were the Roman Cathol- ics; Contending further, for the right of Is- abella, Infants of Spain, as being descended from Constance, Daughter of William the Conqueror; from Eleanor eldest Daughter to Henry the Se- cond; married to Alphonzo the ninth King of Ca- stile; from Beatrice, Daughter to King Henry the third: Title obsolete, and which exceed the bounds of Hereditary to discourse. This year, the sixteenth of February, was Henry Prince of Scotland born, to whom the Queen was God- mother, and lent Robert Earl of Suffolk for her Deputy.

But now greater matters were in hand, Plots were laid against the Queen life; some Spaniards thinking to make her away by Payson, and not daring to trust any Englishman in such a busi- ness, they treat to that purpose, with Roderick Lope, esq, and Physitian to the Queen, with Stephen Berrie, Emanuell Lossy, and other Portu- guese: for divers of that Nation came into England at this time, in relation to Don Antonio; who being discovered by Letters of theirs that were intercepted, were Arraigned at Guild-hall, and by their own confessions convinced, to have conspired against the life of the Queen: they were all condemned, and Executed at Tyburn; Lope professing that he loved the Queen as well as Jesus Christ; which was the cause of laughter to them that knew him to be a Jew. The next day after them, was condemned Patrick Colwyn and John Fencer, sent hither by the English Pugitives, to kill the Queen, who was straighway executed. He is ex- ecuted as 7yr. old.

About this time, Sir John Norris having been in a hot conflict at Sea against the Spaniards, where Sir Martin Fawbyfer received his deaths wound, was now called home, with a purpose to send him into Ireland. In which while, Richard Hawkins, Son of Sir John Hawkins the famous Sea Captain, had been at sea for a year and a half, with three of the Queens ships, and two hundred men in them, whereof one of them at the Isle of St. Anne was by chance fired, another of them (patticularly by tempest, returned into England; himself in the third, parted the Straights of Magdalen, being the sixth man in the Spanish account, that had ever done it; and being now come into the wide Southern Sea, he took five ships laden with Merch- andize; one whereof he took away, the rest he suffered to redeem themselves for two thousand Dutchers; But at last being fet upon by Bernardus de Castro, who was sent out by the Vice-Roy of those parts, with eight ships against him, after three days battle, he yielded, and though upon composition, yet was Nevertheless sent into Spain, and there for four years kept prisoner.

But James Lancaster in another part of Ameri- ca, had better successe; for being set forth by some London Merchants (whose goods the Spani- shes had seized) with three Ships and a long Boat, they took nine and thirty Spanish Ships, and at Fernandins in Breifs, where the Rich Merch- andize was, East-Indian Caraque was lately unloading; he desperately venturing upon the flord, loaded fifteen ships with the wealth of the Indian Caraque; Sugar, Reed, Red-wood called Brazil, and other Merchandize, and then safely and victoriously ret- urned home.

At Rome, about this time died Cardinal Allen, Cardinal, born in Lancashire, of an honest Family, brought up in Oxford, in Oriel College. In Queen Marias seventeenth of her Reigne, some days he was Professor of the University, and after Canon of the Cathedral Church at York. Upon the change of Religion in England; he left the Kingdom, and was Divinity Professor at Douay in Flanders, and made Canon of the Church at Canterbury. He procured a Seminary to be set up in Douay for the English, mother to Reims, and a third at Rome; and through zeal of the Roman Religion, forgot whose Subject he was born.

At home, at this time, Sir John Peers Arch- bishop of York, in whose place succeeded Mat- thew Husen, translated from the Archbishop of York. The vacant death of Ferdinand Stanley Earl of Der- by, being in the flower of his age, miserably tor- mented, and vomiting fluffe of a dark ruffly colour, being thought to have been poyneted or be- witched. There was found in his Chamber a little Image of wax, with hairs of the colour of his hairs, thrust into the belly; which some thought was done of purpose, that men should not suspect him to be poisoned; his vomit so stained the silver Andirons, that it could never be gotten out, and his body though put in seareclothes, and wrapped in lead, did stink and putrefy, that for a long time none could endure to come near where he was buried. The Matter of the Horfe was much suspeeted, who the same day the Earl, he took his bed, took one of his best Horfes, and fled away. About this time also died Gregory Finer, Lord Lord Darcy, a man somewhat crazed, the Son of John Lord Darcy, hanged in the Reign of King Henry the Eighth.

And now Sir William Fitz-Williams Lord Deputy of Ireland was called home, and William Raffles, youngest Son of Francis Earl of Bedford, was sent in his room; to whom presently came the Earl of Tyrone, and in humble manner crept pardon of his fault, that he had not prevented himself at the call of the late Lord Deputy. Bagnall Marshal of the Irish Forces, exhibited many Articles against him, but he so pleased for himself with promise of loyalty hereafter, that he was dismissed. But see the suberboufehness of this man, for he would never after be gotten to come again, though the Deputy sent for him with many kind meffages.

It was now the year 1595, and the eight and thirtieth year of Queen Elizabeth's Reign; when Edmund York and Richard Williams, who were formerly apprehended, came to their trial, and were executed at Tyburn, for being bribed to kill the Queen.

At this time a constant rumour was blown abroad from all parts of Europe, that the Spaniards were coming again against England, with a far greater Fleet than that in Eighty eight, and that it was already under Way, whereupon, Soldiers were levied, and placed on the Sea-coast. Two Navies were made ready, one to expect them in the Channel, the other to go for America, under Hawkins and Drake; but when all came to it, it was but certain Spaniards who looked from the Sea-coast of France, with four Gallies, which betimes in the morning landing in Cornwall, fired a Church standing alone in the fields, and three Villages of Fishermen, Newton, Monmouth and Penfants; and then presently retired, not taking or killing any one person; and there were the first and last Spaniards that in hoffle manner ever set foot upon English ground.

And now mischief growing daily in France, a great number perused the King, to conclude a Peace with Spain, and the Queen her self began to mistrust him, especially, having lately received Intelligence out of the Pope's Conclave; that he was received into the boosome of the Church of Rome, with the Popes Benefition, and upon conditions prejudicial to the Protestants.

And therefore at this time, were divers undertakings of the English against Spain, Sir Walter Raleigh Captain of the Guard, having decoyed a Maid of Honour (whom afterward he married) had loft the Queens favour, and was held in prision for certain months; but afterward being set at liberty, though banished the Court, he undertook a Voyage to Guyana; setting fayl from Plymouth in February, he arrived at Trinidad, where he took St. Johns Town, but found not one jot of Money with Bovis, and a hundred Soldiers, he entered the vall River Orinigue, ranging up in Guyana four hundred miles, but getting little but his labour for his travel. In like manner, Anthony Preston and Sommers, pillaged sundry Towns of the King of Spain in the Western parts, and three ships of the Earl of Cumberland let upon a huge Caraque, which by casualty was fired when they were in fight, and there were the enterprizes of private persons; but the Queen being informed, that great force of men were for the King of Spain, was convoyed to Port-Rico, in St. John's Island, fitted thither Hawkins, Drake and Bakerswite, with land Forces, furnishing them with fix Penny's out of her own Navy, and twenty other men of War. They set sail from Plymouth the 12th of August, and seven and twenty days after came upon the Coast of the great Canary, which being strongly fortified, they forbore to affult. A month after, they came to the isle of St. Dominick, where five English ships being sent forth to watch the English, lightened upon one of the small English ships which was trayed from the Company, and putting the Master and Mariners upon the Rock, understood by them, that the English Navy was bent to Port-Rico; whereupon they made all possible speed to give notice thereof, that being forewarned, they might accordingly be armed. And theseupon as soon as the English had cast Anchors in the Road of Port-Rico, the Spaniards thunders against them from the three Sir Nicholas Clifford and Brooke Brown were wounded; they were at supper, and two days after dyed. Hawkins also and Drake partly of disease, and partly of guest for their ill success died soon after. At the end of eight months, the Fleet came home; having done the Enemy little hurt, fired only some few Towns and Ships, but received infinite damage themselves; loft two such Sea-men, as the Kingdom, I may say, all Europe had not tho' like left. For the Spaniards having of late years received great harms by French and English, had now provided for themselves with Fortifications which were not easily to be won.

At this time the Queen made known to the States in the Low-Countries, the great charges she had been at in relieving them ten years together; for which the requireth some considerable recompence. The States against the great charges they had thereupon been, regarding the Spaniards in their cause; yet (not to fall out about the matter) they were content to allow some reasonable retribution; but yet for the present, nothing was concluded. Likewise at this time, the Hante Towns in Germany make a complaint to the Emperor, and the Princes of the Empire, That the Immunities from Customs anciently granted them by the Kings of England, began to be antiquated, and that a Monopoly of English Merchants was set up in Germany; To which the Queen by Sir Christopher Perkins, first shewing the cause of the first Grant, and then the reason of Queen Mary's prohibiting it afterward, makes them so satisfactory an answer, that tho' very Hante-Towns which complained, brought into England at this time such a fair of Corn, that it prevented a mutiny, which through dearth of Corn, was like to have happened in London.

This year was famous for the death of many great Personages, Philip Earl of Arundel, condemned in the year 1589. The Queen had all this while spare, but now death would spare him no longer, having since that time been wholly given to contemplation, and maccrated himself in a strict course of Religion, leaving one only

England, requiring to have some experienced Souldiers sent to him with Forces, who though he defined pancary as the man, yet Sir John Norris was sent to him with thirteen hundred Old Souldiers, besides a farther supply, whom Tir-Oen having to be coming, set presently upon the Fort of Blackwater, and in the absence of Edward Commander the Governor, took it. But now being doubtfull of his cafe, in a lubdolous manner (as he was a double dealing man) he both offred his help to the Earl of Kildare, against the Deputies;
and at the same time, maketh promise to the Earl of Ormond, and Sir Henry Wally, of loyalty and obedience; but notwithstanding he was forthwith proclaimed Traitor, under the name of Hugh O-Neat, bafaid Son to Con-O-Neat. There was at this time with the Rebels in Effet a thousand Horse, and 6:50 Foot: and in Connaght, two thousand three hundred, all at Tir-Oen command; and the Forces of the Engliesh under Norris, not much fewer, with whom the Deputy himself joynd, and matched together to Armach; which did terrify the Rebels, that Tir-Oen Breakin the Fort of Black water, began to hide himself. Whereupon the Deputy returned, leaving Norris to follow the War, with the Title of General of the Army.
But this satisfied not Norris, nor the Deputy;
and therefore only of emulation betwixt himself and the Deputy, he performed nothing worth the speaking of, and seemed to favour Tir-Oen, as much as the Deputy hated him; insofch, as he had private Con ference with him (a thing not lawful with pro clayed Traitors) and upon his submission, and Hoitages given, a Truce was granted both to him and Odovell, till the first of January. When the Truce was expired, Tir-Oen exhibited certain petitions, protesting, if they were granted, he would then perform all duties of a loyal subject.
In consulting about which Petitions, another Truce was concluded, till the first of April: dur ing which Truce, Tir-Oen dealt secretly with the King of Spain for Aid to be sent him, making nevertheless a fair shew of willingnes to obe dience, so far that by the procurement of Norris and Penoin, a pardon was granted him; the which he pretended to receive more joyfully, than the Intrusion which referred the Earlome upon him; yet all this was but disimulation, to win time

But a few days after, a far greater, and more select Army is raised in England, wherein many of Noble Houses served as Volunteers; For the Queen, to divert the King of Spain from inva ding her Borders, thought it the best way to in vade his: Whereupon a Navy of a hundred and fifty Ships was made ready; where were Souldi ers under pay, Six thousand three hundred and three, and there besides Volontaries; Volun taries of the Nobility and Gen try, One thousand, Members, Six thousand fev en hundred seventy and two, besides the Com mission of Officers, who brought two and twenty Ships. Robert Earl of Effet, and Charles Howard Lord Admi ral of England, were made Generals with equal Authority; but the Admiral to hold Persuasive at Sea, Effet at Land. To thee, for a Con cell of War, were joyned the Lord Thomas Ho ward, Walter Rawleigh, Francis Vere, George Carew, and Coysers Clifford. The whole Fleet was divided into four Squadrons; The Admiral commanded the first; Effet the second; the Lord Thomas Howard the third, and Rawleigh the fourth. The Officers of the Army were Francis Vere Serjeant Major General, or Mar shall; John Winkfield Quater-Master General, George Carew Master of the Ordnance; Coysers
Clifford Serjeant Major. Colonels were Robert Earl of Suffet, Sir Christopher Blunt, Sir Tho mas Gerrard, Sir Richard Winkfield; Wlliam Winkfield was Commander of the Volunteers, and Anthony Adery Secretary to the Council of War, was to Register their Ads and Confirma tions. The Commission being drawn, the Queen gave them private Instructions, and withall, a Prayer of her own making, to be daily used in every Ship.

This Fleet set forth from Plymouth at the be ginning of June. Night unto Coh S. Vincent they lighted upon an Irish Barque, which told them, That at Calde they were secure, and then in the Haven there were at Anchor Gallies, Ships of War, and a great many Merchant Vessels. The twentieth of June, they cast Anchor on the West side of the Island: within two days they were

agreed to set upon the Spanish Ships, whereas the Earl of Essex call up his Cap for joy. This business was allotted to the lefter Ships, because the Road was too shallow for the galleys. The galleys quickly fled, and creeping along the shore, flid away, but the Spanish Ships that lay at Anchor at Punall, turned their broad sides, so as the English fight with them from break of day till noon; at which time the Spaniards having their Galleons miserably torn, and many of their men slain, resolved to fire the ships, or run them on shore. The Spanish Admiral being Fifteen hundred Tun of Burthen, was fired by a Moor, and two other Ships which lay next her took the fire, and were loft alike. When this Sea-Fight was ended, Essex landed Eight hundred Souldiers at Punall, a league from the Town of Caies, when half a mile from the Town, the Spanish Horfe and Foot fllew themselves, and presently gave back again; but straightway came forth a greater number: Then Essex commanded his Forces to make a fair retreat, and having enticed forth their Enemies, they turned upon them with such violence, that they forced them back into the Town. Then the Earl got up to a Bulwark newly raised, near the Gate, where he fpyed a paffage into the Town, but to high from ground, that they might land on a Speare length. Yet Essex, the Earl of Suffolk his Lieutenant, Arthur Savage, and others leaped down; and the mean while Sir Francis Vere broke the Gate, and rushed in, and the reft with him. In the Market-place John Winkfield was shot in the Head, and with fones from the tops of Houtes divers were wounded; amongst whom, Samuel Bagnow received eight Wounds, and Arthur Savage was bloody all over; which two were Knighted in the place. The next day the Cattle was yielded, upon condifion, That the Inhabitants might depart with the Clothes on their backs, the reft to be left for fpyry. For five hundred and fourclore thoufand Duckets the Cattle was to be redeemed; and for the payment, forty of the chief Citizens to be fent Hoftages into England. Now Raleigh was commanded to ferve the Merchans Ships lying at Pery-Real, when they promifed two Million two Duckets to redeem them; but this the Admiral would not hear of, saying, He was fent to destroy Ships, not to diminith them upon Compoftion. A world of Munition was found in the City, and great fcore of Money privately carried away, every one ftifling for himself. It was thought by the wifer part, That the Spaniard could not be damned les by this Expedition, than Twenty Millions of Duckets. None of Note was flain among the English, but only Winkfield, who also flew a Spanish Captain; and now at elft, threecore Military men were honoured with Knight- hood. After this, having fpyed the whole Island, and demolished the Fort, they returned into England, much againft the will of Essex, who would fain have been attempting some other enterprize.

The Queen receiving them home with much affability, giving many thanks to-thofe of principal Note, but entolling the Earl of Essex and the Admiral, above the reft. And now bethinking her felf of a fit man to be Gouver- nor of the Bryes, which was given by the States as a Caution Town for money due, she made choice of Sir Francis Vere, although Essex com- manded other to her for the place: But ano- ther thing he took with great indignation: That in his abfence he had made Sir Robert Cecil Secretary, whereas he had formerly with great inftence, commanded Sir Thomas Badley to her.

And now the King of Spain to recover his Honour loft at Caies, fet forth a Navy for England and Ireland, with a great number of Irift Fugitives; but being at Sea, moft of his Ships were either run upon Rocks, or cast away in storms; So this Expedition came to nothing.

But the Queen, at this time, for her better fe- curity, entd a League of Defence and Offence vvhth the French King, againft the Spaniards, upon certain Conftitions; which League the conf- firmed by Oath, in the Chappell at Greenwich, the Nine and twentieth of Auguft, laying her hand upon the hand of Henry de la Tour, Duke of Bulliog, and Marfhal of France; the Bishop of Cliqcofter holding forth the Evangelifts, and a great lawly of the Nobility (anding round in a large heats) in the Name of France.

In fepember following, the Earl of Shrewby, was sent on Ambaffege into France, to take the French Kings Oath, and to prefent Sir Anthony Mildmay for the Queens Ambaffege in Ordinary in the room of the King of France.

It was now the year 1596, and the Nine and thirtieh year of Queen Elizabeths Reign, when Thomas Arundel of Warder returned into Eng- land, from the War in Hungery againft the Turk, whom, for his good service done there, the Emperour by his Letters Patents, had crea- ted Earl of the Sacred Empire, and all his Heirs and their Polftity, dukes or Fe- dars, to be rended from him, to be Earl of Arundel and Counties of the holy Empire for ever. Those who are graced with this Title, have a Place and Voice in the Imperial Diets, may pur- chafe lands in the Emperours Dominions, may take up voluntary Souldiers, and are not bound to answer any matter before any Judge, but only in the Chamber of the Empire. At his return, a great Quaffion came in agitation, Whether Titles of Honour given to the Queens Subjects without her privity, ought to be ac- cepted by them, or admitted by her. For this new Earl fluck in the Stomachs of the English Bsons, who inwardly guaged to give him place. The matter was long disputed on both fides, but what issue it had, or whether he were permitted this honour here at home, I find not: Certain it is, That Sir Nicholas Clifford and Sir Anthony Sherley, whom the French King two years before received into the Order of St. Michael, were had in Prison at their coming home, and charged to renounce their Orders of the
The Reign of Queen Elizabeth.

This year many great Persons dyed; John Puckering Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, whom Thomas Egerton succeeded; Richard Fletcher Bishop of London, who for marrying the Lady Baker (as goodly a Lady as he was a Prelate,) incurred the Queen displeasure; and to cure his Care, fell immoderately to drinking of Tobacco, and so expired. Henry Cary Baron of Hanford, Lord Chamberlain of her Majesties House, and her Cousin gentleman. Sir Francis Knollys, who married Hanford; Sifter, in Queene Mary's days an Exile in Germany for the Gospel, by Queen Elizabeth made Sir, Vice-Chamberlain, then Captain of the Guard, afterwards Treasurer of the Household, and Knight of the Garter, Henry Haffings Earl of Huntingdon, and President of the Council in the North, who spent his Estate upon Puritan Minifters: Francis Lord Haffings Nephew to him by his Brother George, who succeeded him in the Earlom, and Margaret Clifforf Countess of Derby, (who defecanted of the Blood Royal, from Charles Brandon,) confulted with Sorcerers and cunning men, and thereupon a little before her end, was in a manner excludéd from the Queene's Favour.

The Queen at this time was told, That the King of Spain was preparing a new Fleet against Ireland; whereupon to encounter him, they also prepared a new Fleet of twenty Ships, few than of the Queens, three and forty lefser Ships of War, the rest for the carriage of provifion. They were parted into three Squadrons: Essex commanded the first, who was also Chief Commander in the Expedition; the Lord Thomas Howard the second, and Richmht the third. In this Fleet were Sir Robart, the Nobility and Gentry, Charles Blunt Lord Mounjéy, Vere, Carew, Sir Christopher Blunt, the Earl of Rutland and Sambonfton, the Lords Grey, Cromwell, Rich, and many others. The ninth of July they weighed Anchor from Plymouth, and were to direct their voyage to Ferall and the Groyns, to seize upon the Spanish Fleet in the Harbour, and towards the Isles called Accores, to intercept the Indian Fleet at their return into Spain; but this Expedition was crost and overthrown by Tempests, for they had not tailed forty Leagues from Plymouth, when they were shaken with such a terrible Tempest, that for four days weather, that the Mariners themselves were at their wits end, and the Fleet had much ado to recover Plymouth: The Navy being amended, they hoisted up Sayl the second time, but the Wind fell prettily again to croft, that for a whole monthes time they could not get out of the Haven; returning to Plymouth, the seventeenth of August they got out of the Haven; and now the third time, with a fire wind hoist up sayl, but before they came in view of Spain, they were dispersed by another horrible Tempest, wherein of the two great Ships which were taken at Colies, one was dafhed in pieces, the other wandered no man knew whither. At the Island Flores the Fleet met again, where Ramleigh being dispersed for Water went on shore without leave; and ere he had watered, had charge to follow Essex to Fadal: but not finding him there, he observed the Port, and calling a Council, the Commanders with him to set upon the place, and not let slip to fair a Booy. Upon this Ramleigh with some of the prime Vo-luntes, got to shore, and won the Town, but found no booty in it. The next day Essex came thither, whom Merrick informed what Ramleigh had done, affirming spirituallly, That he had done it more to the honour of the Lordship in the honour of the Exploit: whereupon some persuaded the Earl to call a Council of War and then displâce him: others again, to take off his head for going to Land without the Chief Commanders leave, saying, he was never like for to have such another opportunity to be rid of his Adversary; upon this Sidney, Brett, Berry, and others of Rawleigh Company were displaced, and laid by the heels. Ramleigh himself was sent for, and entertained with a grim look by Essex: and all his Party, Essex rebuked him angrily, for landing his Forces, which none upon pain of death might do, without the Generals command: Rawleigh made answer, That the Captains indeed, Shipmasters, and the rest were within the compass of that Law; but not the three prime Commanders, of whom himselfe was one: That he had a long time waited his coming, and longer would have waited, but that the Hander provoked him to fight. And now the Lord Thomas Howard mediated, that no severity might be used against Ramleigh, and persuaded him to acknowledge his fault; which being done, all were friends, and the displaced Commanders were restored to their place. The Earl was of a placable disposition; easily apt to take offence, and as easily to remit it.

From hence they fail to Grattaro, where the Inhabitants crave mercy and obtained it; and here Essex would have tarried, in expectation of the Indian Fleet; but that Graves the Pilot disfavored, because the Harbour was not good: and now see the unluckinesse of ill counsel; for the English were not gone above an hour, or two, from this place, when loe, the American Fleet (wherein were forty Ships, and seven of them laden with Treasure) cometh thither; which, hearing that the English were thereabouts, directed their course to Tercera, where they gained the Haven, all but three Ships, indifferent wealthy; which the English took: and then were minded to set upon the fleet, in the Port, but finding the attempt not feasible, they passed from hence to St Michaelis; where Sambonfton, Rutland, Evere, Brandon and Duncks were Knichted. And then Essex landed within fix miles of the Town, nigh unto Villa Francis, a fair Town; and well furnished with Merchandise, Wine, Wood, and Corn; where they tarried six days; and the common Souldiers found good booty. And now a Caraque was espyed, coming out of the East Indies, which by a warning piece shot off in a Dutch Ship, perceiving that the Englishe were there; ran her well shore, unloaded her Merchandise, and then fired her self. Thus the English had ill luck everywhere in this expedition: And the ninth of October they hoisted sail for England: but within two days, a terrible Tempest from the Northward dispersed them; and the Spanish Fleet also at the same time; so as they never came in view of one another: one Spanish Ship was call upon Deremund, the Mariner and Souldiers hafled home in her, who intimated, that the Spanish Fleet intended to feize upon some Haven in Cornwall, which being night the mouth of the Channel, might be convenient to receive Forces from.
Spain: but the Divine Providence frustrated the designs both of the Spaniard and the English.

But now at his return, the Earl of Essex found that done in England, in his absence, which infinitely disconcerted him; Sir Robert Cecil made Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster: and which was more, Charles Lord Howard, created Earl of Nottingham, with relation in his Patent to the Victory in Eighty eight, and his good service at Cadiz: This glory he envied him, and besides dismached it, that he must now take place of him: It being enacted in the Reign of Henry the Eighth, That the chief Officers of the Kingdome should have Precedence of all men of that degree, Whereupon the Queen, to give him content, was fain to create him Earl Marshal of England; by which he recovered his place again.

About this time, an Ambassadors came into England, from the King of Poland; who, when the Queen expected he should give her thanks for having secured a Peace between the King his Master, and the Turk: he clean contrary expostulated unkindness, for breach of Privileges, in trading with Spain, requiring a present remedy, or else the King would otherwise right himself: The Queen not a little offended, suddenly replied, How was I deceived? I expected an Ambassador, and behold a Herald: such a speech I never heard in all my life-time. And after some further checking of him for his boldness, he referred him to her Council; and then retired into her Closet. The Ambassador afterward, in private Conference with some of the Council, execure himself, saying, That his Speech was penned by others, and then given him in Writing. To his Message, the Council gave the like answer, as they had given before to the Hanse-Towns, upon the like occasion: though now again, the Hanse-Towns obtain the Emperour, to prohibit the English from trading in Germany, which made the Queen to prohibit the Hanse-Towns from trading in England; and put them out of the Steel-yard till this difference was accorded.

This year the Chancellor of Denmark came into England to restore the Garter, which had been bestowed upon the Kings Father, and withall offering the Kings help, to make a Peace for the Queen with the Spaniard. The Queen thanked him; but meant not to use his help for that which she did not desire, and especially not now, when he had newly molested the King of France her Ally; and had taken Anzen the strongest Town of Picardy: Though why should the Queen be fonder of the French King, when now to get an Aid of Four thousand Souldiers from her, he fell to devices; intimating unto her, That he was now offered by the Popes Nuncio a very commodious Peace, If she would but forsake her. But while these things were in Treaty, Anzen was recovered again by the value of Baturials; (whoddied at the Siege) and of Sir Arthur Sanez, as the King in his Letters to the Queen thankfully acknowledged.

About this time a Parliament was held at Westminster, where Subsidies were willingly granted; and to this Parliament was called the Lord LeWarre, and restored to his blood, which by Act of Parliament in the Reign of King Edward the Sixth was tainted. Alto to this Parliament was called Thomas Lord Howard, by the Title of Baron Howard of Walden.

In Ireland at this time, a great part of Zippers, and almost all Connought was in Rebellion, Whereupon Kasf the Deputy was called home, and Thomas Lord Burroughs sent in his place, a man very just and courageous, but no Soundier! This infinitely disconcerted Norris; who thought himself safe of the place, and now to see his Rival preferred before him, and himself to be under him, President of Munster, drove him into such a melancholy, that in a very short time (and as he thought to himself with much disgrace) he ended his life.

And now the Earl of Tir-Ora craveth, and obtaineth a moneths Truce of the new Deputy, at the months end the Deputy marcheth against the Rebels, and gaineth the Fort at Black-water, the Fort whereof the Rebels shewed themselves upon a Hill hard by, against whom the Earl of Kildare, the marcheth and maineth them to flight, and with some loss of his own side, as Francis Vinyage, the Deputies Brother in Law, Turner a Sargent Major, and two Eijers, Brothers of the Earl of Kildare, whose death he took so heavily, that within a few days he dyed himself.

As soon as the Deputy had fortified the Castle at Black-water, and withdrawn his Army, the Rebels began to besiege it again; (for this was the main place of their strength) which causeth the Deputy with all possible speed to make thither, bat unhappily dyed by the way. Whereupon the Rebels set upon the Fort more fiercely than before; but being full repulsed, they comforted themselves with this, that there was not many days provision left in the Fort; yet the admiral fortitude of Thomas Williams, the Captain and the Garrison Souldiers saved the place, who, when then Horte-flash was all spent, fed upon weeds growing within the Trenches, and endured all. And of miser comes they to flight, but was with some loss of his own side, as Francis Vinyage, the Deputy being dead, the Army by direction from England, was committed to the Earl of Ormond, and the Government to two Lords Justices, Adam Lofthouse the Archbishop of Dublin and Chancellor, and Robert Gardiner: To this new Lieutenant, Tir-Ora exhibited a Bill of his oppressions and grievances with request of pardon, and at the same time fhirset up Mac-Hugh to a new Rebellion in Leinster.

In France at this time, the French King being importuned by the Pope, and by his own subjects begin to incline to a Peace with Spain; which the Queen understanding, sent into France Sir Robert Cecil, Harrows and Milnes (who dyed at his landing in France.) The States likewise sent thither Jaffine of Nassau, and BArneres, and others likewise into England to dilivate the Peace; but notwithstanding all they could say or do, the French King shortly after concludeth a Peace, to the great discontentment of the Queen and the States, but to the great good, and establishment of the French Commonwealth.

And now the Queen provisng for her own and her Peoples safety, sent Sir Francis Vere to the States, to know if they were willing to join in a Treaty of Peace with the Spaniards: if not, what what they would afford toward a War; and to deal advantage with them about repayment of money due to her from them. At home in the mean time, was holden a great Convention, Whether a Peace with Spain were convenient for England, or not: and many Reasons were on both sides alleged. Burleigh Lord Treasurer was for Peace, & Essex for War, and so vehement in it, that the Treasurer, after a long debate, in a strange manner of Pretence, reached forth the Book of the Psalms to him, pointing to him that Verst. The bloody minded man still was live out half his days. Which made Essex afterward to set forth an Apology, with Reasons for justification of his Opinion.

But now another Convention was holden, about a fit man to be Deputy of Ireland; The Queen intended to send Sir William Knollys, Essex his Uncle; but Essex was violent for Sir George Careen, whom he had a mind to remove from the Court; and when he could not by any means persuade the Queen to it, he then, forgetting himself and his duty, uncivilly and contemptuously turned his back upon the Queen, muttering certain words. Whereupon the growing impatient, gave him a box on the ear, and bid him be gone with a vengeance; Essex laid his hand upon his Sword hilt, and swore a great oath, That he could not, nor would not put up such an indignity; and that he would not have taken it at King Henry the Eighth his hands; and so in a rage flung away from the Court. But afterward, admonished by the Lord Keeper, he became more milde, and in a short time returned to the Queen's favour.

About this time, William Cecil Lord Burleigh and high Treasurer of England finding himself to drop with age, (for he was now thrithree and Seventeen years old) sent Letters to the Queen, intreating her to release him of his publick charge; whereupon the went to visit and consider him. About an hundred days had passed, in his life, after he had been the principal flay of the English Common-wealth for many years togethre. One great good he did to his Country: a little before his death, that he brought the States of the Low-Countries to a Composition, for the payment of Eight hundred thousand pounds, by Thirty thousand pounds yearly; likewise a new League to be concluded with them.

The King of Denmark Subjects having lately foized upon some goods of the English as Prise, to the value of a hundred thousand Dollars, the Queen sent the Lord Zouch and Christopher Perkins, Doctor of Law, in Embassador to the Dane, both to congratulate his late marriage with the Elektra Daughter of Brandenburg; and also to crave restitution of the English Goods; who obtained, that in lieu thereof, Thereforce thousand Dollars were repaid. And now George Clifford Earl of Cumberland, having with a Navy of eleven ships, waited for Portugal Cariques, and the American Fleets till all of the year was past (they not daring to fight for) he at last sailed upon Porto-Rico and took it; but seven hundred of his men falling sick of Calentures, and dying within forty days, he was fain to return home with some honour, but little profit.

About this time, one Edward Squire was arraigned of High Treason, and had been at first an ordinary Serviceman, afterwards a Groom in the Queen's Stable, and going as a Soldier in Drakes last expedition, was taken prisoner and carried into Spain, there he came acquainted with one Wallpope an English Jesuite, who caused him to be put into the Inquisition. For an Heretic, and the fellow taking of mercy, was easily drawn to become a Papist, and afterward to attempt any thing for the Catholick cause. His faithfully perjured it was meritorious to make away the Queen and the Earl of Essex, and sent him into England with a certain payson, whereunto to annoment the pommel of the Queens Sackle, and the chair in which the Earl should sit, which he accordingly performed, but neither of them took effect, whereupon Wallpope inspicing Squires fidelity was bent to revenge it, and sent one into England, who in general terms should lay this Apoilition upon him; whereupon Squire is called in question, and never thinking that his Confeftor would detect him, directly denied all at first; but after seeing himself betrayed, confessed all the matter and was executed.

This whole year, the rebellion was hot in Ireland. For Tir-Oen first of all obtaining his pardon lately obtained, all on a sudden besieged the Fort at Blackwater, to the raising of which, the Lieutenant Generall (for there was as yet no Deputy) sent thirteen Companies under the command of the Manuf, Tir-Oen sworn adversary, him Tir-Oen flew, and put his whole Army to rout, and achieved such a Victory, with so great loss to the English, as they had never felt the like since they first set footing in Ireland; for thirteen valiant Commanders, and fifteen hundred common Soldiers, were slain at this Skirmish, and soon after the Fort of Blackwater was yielded up. And now Tir-Oen fame began to resind as the Agent of the liberty of the Nation, and upon a sudden all Munster brake forth into Rebellion. For therefreshing whereof the King of England and Scotland was resoluioin for an hundred Dollars, the originally an English man, was grown a deadly enemy to the English Nation) with four hundred Knaees Against these, Thomas Norris President of the Province, marched to Killgowlack with a good force, but finding that the Irish Souldiers of his Company were ready to revolt, he was fain to disperce his Army and retire to Corks. Hereupon the Rebels grew insolent, spoiled the Country, and in cruel manner put all the English to the sword. Furthermore they declare Fitz Thomas to be Earl of Desmond; but upon condition he should hold of O-Nees, that is, of Tir-Oen, who now dispatched Letters to the Spanish, relating his Victories to the full, and vowing to accept no terms of peace with the English, and yet at the same instant (after his wonted treacherous manner) professed some kinde of submission to the Lieutenant, but withall made unreasonable demands.

The State of Ireland being thus in confusion, a furious confessional is holden whom to send to quench it: the Queen and most of the Counsell thought Sir Charles Bene Lord Mountjoy the fit- ted man; but Essex covertly intimated, that he had no military experience, and besides was too slow to prove a good Commander; he seem'd to aim at the place for himself, though he made a droll modelly to refuse it, and yet still ready with... with his exceptions if any other were nominated: many thought it dangerous to have an Army put into his hands, for his followers talked of great matters, that the Earl of Effex was degraded of the blood Royal of Scotland and England, and had better Right to the Crown, than any other of the Competitors. In conclusion, he is appointed Vice-Roy, with ample Authority, to make War or conclude Peace, and pardon all offenders, even Tit-Osen himself. An Army is allotted him as great as he desired: Indeed greater than ever Ire-land had seen before, Twenty Thousand Foot, and Thirteen Hundred Horse, with these, and a great Retinue besides of the Nobility, he pitched into Ireland; where as soon as he had taken the Sword, contrary to his Commission (which was to go immediately against the Arch-rebel) he marched towards Munster, against the petty Rebels, taketh the Castle of Cahirc, and driveth the Rebels into the Woods and Groves adjoining. His Forces being now impaired, he tarrieth to make them up, but in the mean time fenden directions to Sir Center: Clifford, President of Connacht, to let upon the Rebels in one place, (thereby to sever their Forces) while he assaulted them in another; Clifford marched toward Boteke, with 1500 Soldiers, where the Rebels are upon them at un-awares, under the conduct of O-Rocks, Chris Son that was hanged here in England.) The English repel them at eight with ease, and march along; but the Rebels finding they wanted Powder, set upon them again, and put them to flight; in which skirmish, Clifford and many of the old Soldiers were slain.

Effex having by this received new supplies out of England, and a check for neglecting the Queens Command, set forth at length towards the Borders of Effex, with Thirty thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse, being come thither, Tit-Osen by a Messengers requested parole, Effex reluteth faying, he might speak with him the next morning, between the two Armies; the next day word is brought to Effex, that Tit-Osen crave the Queens mercy, and that he might only be heard speak; appointing the shalow of Hole Cloche for a most convenient place; thither came Effex alone, with whom Tit-Osen (riding his Horse up to the gates) had private conference a full hour, while after, Cen Troy-Osen, late Son came to Effex, requesting in his Fathers name a second parole; and that some of the chief on both sides be present: Effex consented, so there came not more than fix. At the day appointed, many words had not past, but it was agreed, that their Dele- gates should Treat the next day concerning a Peace: between them it was concluded, that a Truce should be held from six weeks to six weeks, till May day.

By this time, the Queen understanding that no more was done, after so much time and mon- ey spent, in a great anger tacheth the Earls pro- ceedings, and I know not how, it fell from her to some others that hold by, that he had other thoughts in his minde, than the good of his Prince and Country: And thereupon dispatched very sharp Letters to him, blaming his delay, and letting dip every fair opportunity; with which Letters Effex was encounted, and chiefly troubled, that the Queen had now made Cecil Maffier of the Wards, which he expected himself; that he began to cast strange projects within his minides, and held Private confluations of returning into Eng- land with part of his Forces, to surprise his Ad- versaries, But from this course, the Earl of Dench- hampton, and Sir Christopher Blount, did divaded him, as being dangerous and wicked. Yet within a month over he went, and came to the Court at Nonshich, to inform the Queen of the State of Ireland. By the way the Lord Gray of Bifton crost him, but saluted him not, whom one of his followers offered to kill for his contemples; but Effex would not suffer him: And made such haste, that early in the Morning he was upon his Knees before the Queen in the Privy Chamber. She entertained him courteously, but not with the countenance she was wont; and after a little talk bid him keep in his Chamber; And so after, Committed him to Cutfody; in the Lord privy Seals Houfe; where entering into Consideration of his case, he giveth himself wholly to Divine Con- temptation, and writeth wonderfull Letters to his friends, of the vanity of the things of this life.

It was now the year one thousand six hundred, and the two and fourth of Queen Elizabeth's Reign; when after the departure of the Earl of Effex, in Osen began to carry himself as Mon- arch of Ireland, and fenden letters to make spoil in the poofleſſ day inhabited in the North of Ireland, and nearly the South, and that of Effex Tahun-Oen be- gan to carry himself as Monarch of Ireland, under the name of Mount Norris; Carrying early along upon Sir Warham Saint- Leger, thrut him through with a spear, and was himself thrust through withal. Whereupon the Queen sent Sir Charles Blunt Lord Montagu, to take upon him the Deputies place, who lothed no time, but first of all marcheth towards Effex, build- eth a forth within eight miles of Armagh, which, in honour of Sir John Norris, under whom he had his first military schooling, he calleth by the name of Mount Norris; there he placed Edward Blunte, who kept the Rebels in awe in those parts, from thence back he goeth into Leinfeir, where in the Gynnes he reduceth into order, Doni-Spanish, Phelim Mac-Phoes, and the rebellings Nation of the O-Tullies, taking hostages of them; them back into Effex again, being victor wherever he cometh, and at Trulegh, receiveth into protection Mac-Henry, Mac-Cony, and other Rebels, who left at this their feet for mercy. All this and more he rid in his first year, and no lesse successful was Carys preident of Munster, who drave out of the County the Titular Earl of Desmand, and having found Munster a turbulent Province in April, he overcomed and made it so quiet by De- cember following that the Rebels maintained no one Fort in it against the Queen.

And now a new Conflitution was holden in England, touching a peace with the King of Spain, the which he fought both by the French King, and by Alberti the Arch-Duke, who was now return- ed into the Netherlonds out of Spain, where he was married to the Infaunts, The Queen con- tents to a Treaty, left it to the French King to nominate both the time and place for the meeting of the Delegates, who set down the moneth of May, and Builvan in France; But now foresee- ing that a question would arise about Preci- dency, sent more appointed to look after the Records concerning that point. These men found in the Book of the Ceremonies of the

The English Commissioners have a charge not to give Precedence to State; and why.

Count of Rome, which (according to the Canons) gives that Rule to the rest, as the Lady and Mistress; that among Kings, the first place is due to the King of France, the second to the Kings of England, and the third to the King of Caffile. That the English quietly held this privilege in the General Councils of Bajf, Confiance, and others: besides the Kingdom of Caffile, which is the Spaniards first Title, (and which is but an upstart in regard of England) had Earls, but no Kings till the year 1507. In like manner, Pope Julius the third, gave sentence for Henry the seventh of England, against Ferdinand, who was then King of Caffile.

At the day appointed, the Delegates met at Bulloign, Sir Henry Niel, Leign Ambadisour, Sir John Herbert, Sir Robert Breul, & Thomas Edmonds for the English, and others for the King of Spain and the Archbishop. The English had instructions, first concerning Precedency, in no cafe to give way to the King of Spain: yet if they contended, to put the matter to the decision of Lords, rather than the Treaty should be dissolved: and for the rest, to propose and mention the renewing of the ancient Burgundian League, freedom of commerce, &c.

At the meeting, when they had severally show'd their Commissions, the English challenge the Precedency, the Spaniards do the like, and in fo peremptory a manner that without it they would dissolve the Treaty, Hereupon the English made a proposition, to let paife the question of Precedency; and to transact the business by writing, and Messengers between them: Or that the Treaty might be intermitted only for three score days, not quite broken off; but all was to no purpose; and at three months end they parted.

The States the mean while were far from regarding a Peace, that at this time they thought upon reducing the Sea Coast of Flanders into their Command; and thereupon they landed an Army there, of fourteen thousand Foot, and three thousand Horse, under the conduct of Maurice of Nassau and fifteen hundred of the English under the command of Sir Francis Vere, and his Brother Horatio, At which time happened the famous Battle of New port, against the Archduke, where nine thousand of the Spaniards were slain; and the Victory, by the valour of the English, fell to the Dutch for so forward were the English in this Battail, that of their fifteen hundred, eight hundred were slain and sore wounded; Eight Captains killed, and of the rest every man hurt.

All this year, and the year past, landy quarrels and complaints arose between the English and French, touching refinalls of goods taken from each other by Pirates of each Nation: Also touching Quitts and Impositions, contrary to the Treaty of Truce, and decreed in English Clothes, to the great injury of the Nation: In Denmark likewise arose controversies touching commerce, and the Fishing of the English upon the Coast of Island and Norway. The Queen also at this time, for the encrease of Navigation and Commerce, Founded the Company of East Indies Merchants, allowing them large Privilages; but whether this hath proved beneficial to the Common-Wealth, (there having been by this means such a maffe of money and great store of other commodities carried out of the Kingdom, and to many Mariner's lost every year) wise men make a question.

About this time also, Pope Clement the eighth, perceiving the Queen to be in her declining age, sent two Breves into England, the one to the Pope, the other to the Lady, to suffer no person whatsoever, to take the Kingdom upon him after the Queens death, but one that should promise by Oath, to promote with all his might, the Roman Catholic Religion, how near or ever his wife, he were allied to the Blood Royal of the King of England.

This year by reason of intertemporous weather, happened a great scarcity of Corn in England, and thereby many grievous complaints were occasioned. The common people call out reproachful andls against the Lord Treasurer Backhord, as the grantor of Licences for transportation of Corn; but he appealing to the Queen, the fortwith defended his Innocency, and made it known by open Proclamation, imputed the fault upon the Burgiers of Corn, and Forefellers of Markets, and ordered that the fudder should be reprehended and punished.

The Earl of Effex, who had now been Prisoner six months in the House of the Lord Privy Seal, he then began to repent in good earnest, resolving to put away his perverfence Councillors Gilly Merrick, and Henry Cuffis, and then he shewed so much patience and great submission, that the Queen then lent him to his own house, and to be there confined, always protesting, that he would doe nothing that should be for his ruine, but only that, which should be for his amendment. Nevertheless, when as the common people extolled his Innocency, he could not for the removal of suspicion of injustice, free her self and her Councillors, but bring him to trial, not in the Star-Chamber, but the Court should fall too heavy on him, but in the house of the Lord Privy Seal, where the cause should have a plain hearing before the Lords of the Council, four Earls, two Barons, and four Judges of the Realm. The objections were, That contrary to his Commission he had made the Earl of Southampton General of the Horse, had drawn his Forces into Munster, neglecting the Arch-rebell Tir-Oen, entertained a Parlee with him against the Dignity of the Queens Majesty, and the person of a Viceroy, which he represented: and that the said Parlee was fupicious, in regard it was private. Some aggravations the Lawers added from abrupt sentences in his Letter to the Lord Privy Seal, written two years since, as these: No former is more fierce than the indignation of an Impeante Prince. What? cannot Princes see? May they not injure their Subjects? and such like.

He falling upon his knee at the end of the Board, the Earl protested he would not conten with the Queen, nor excute the faults of his young years either in the whole or in part, Protesting that he always meant well, however it fell out otherwise, and that now he would bid the World farewell, within shedding many tears, so as the fadders by wept also, Yet could he not contain himself, but began to plead excuses, till the Lord Privy Seal interrupted him, advising him to proceed as he began, to fly to the Queen's Mercy, who would not have him questioned for disloyalty, but only for a contempt, and that he did not well to pretend obedience in words, which in deeds he had not performed. At length, in the name of the rest, he pronounced this sentence against him; that he should be deposed from the Office of a Privy Councillor, suspended from the functions of the Earl Marthall, and Master of the Ordnance, and be imprisoned during the Queen's pleasure. She had given express charge, not to suspend him from the Office of Master of the Horse (minding shortly to take him into favour) and that his Censure into his caufe should be recorded. After this he made them of wonderfull humility and mortification, which it affected the Queen, that shortly the removed Barkley his Keeper, and gave him leave to go at large; only admonishing him, to make his own Discretion his Keeper, and not to come to the Court, or in her Presence.

After this sentence, Coffe, who always persuaded the Earl to stand faithfully in his own defence, began so plainly to tax him of cowardice and pusillanimity, that the Earl in anger, commanded his Names, his number, and the names of his Servants; yet Merrick the Steward did it not, as being of Coffe mind himself. The Earl being now ready to go into the Country, remembered himself to the Queen, by the Lord Henry Howard, in these words: That he killed the Rod, and the Queens bands, which had once corrected, not overthrown him; yet he should never enjoy solid comfort, till he might see those blessed Eyes, which had been his old-starts, whereby he had happily served his course, while he held on his way as lawful distance; but now he resolved to eat grapes with Nebuchadnezzar, till it please the Queen to restore his Sonet. She being greatly joyed with these his Speeches; would to God (said she) his deeds be answerable to his words; He hath long cried my Patience, I must now make revel of his humility.

And now the Earl grew to confident of the Queen's Favour, that he became a suitor to her for the Farm of sweet Wines, but she to try his temper, and with what mind he would bear a repulse, made him Answer, That the must first know what it was worth, and not give away things hand over hand; and had oftentimes in her mouth, the Aphorism of Phyllainans, That foul Bodies, the more you nourish them, the more you corrupt them. And indeed, this was the right way to finde, whether the Ulcer of his Mind were thoughly cured or no; for being not thoroughly cured, it would endure no touching; and no more did his, but as though every day of a courte'sse, were an injury that required revenge; his Melancholy was presently turned into Choler, now he began to hart.ken to Coffe again; telling him, That it was now plain, the Queen determined to make him as poor as Job, that he should live of the Basket, and gather crumbs under the Table. Hereupon he returned to London, Southampton is sent for out of the Low-Countries, his doors are still open for all comers, Merrick his Steward received to his own Table deserted Soldiers, discontented and audacious persons; Sermons are made there every day by Puritan Ministers, to which the Citizens flock, and all signs of Popularity appeared; which matters coming to the Queen's Ears, alienated her affection from him daily more and more; but especially she was exasperated, that her Person was depil'd by him, for (not to say the worst) he had murdered; That the Queen was now old and decrepit, and withered as well in minds as body.

And now again, he runneth upon dissipate counsels, for the removal of his adversaries on the Court, feeketh to move himself into the King of Spain's favour, to whom he traduceth his adversaries, by name Rawleigh, Cobham, Carew, Cecil, and the Admiral as inclined to the Spanish Faction, and at on and the same time, feeketh to win him both Puritans and Papists. Many were of his party, but few of his counsellors; and there were the Earl of Southampton, Sir Charles Dovers, Sir Ferdinando Gorge Captain of the Galion of Plimouth, Sir Christopher Rount, and some other. With these he met privately in Derry House to avoid suspicion, where he first giveth them a Catalogue of the Nobility and Gentry that favoured him, to the number of a hundred and twenty. Then they consult, Whether it were better to reform the House of Lords, or the Queen's Palace, this latter they resolve upon, which should be done in this manner; Rount should keep the great Gate with a select number of men; and Dovers feith upon the Presence Chamber: Then Eex with his Company should come from the House, and present himself before the Queen. But now suspicions arising from divers circumstances, Secretary Herbert was sent to call him before the Council, at the Treasurers House; but he doubting the matter, excuseth himself that he was not very well. And now the Plot of feizing upon the Court, which had been four months in contriving, was by this means quite disdaffed, for they had ready at the present, neither Souldiers, nor Munition, do as some had desired must now be thought on: at which time very opportunely commeth one to them (let on no doubt by Eex his Adversaries) as if he had heard of a plot against the King, which made Eex to applaud his own great good fortune.

And now were four of the Lords, namely the Lord Keeper, the Earl of Pembroke, Sir William Knollys, and the Lord Chief Justice of England, sent by the Queen to Eex House, who could hardly be suffer'd to come in, all their Attendants were kept out, save he that carried the Seal before the Keeper. In the Court they found a confudted number of people, and the Earls of Eex, Roldland, and Southampton in the midst of them. The Keeper turning himself to Eex, told him, The Queen had sent him and the rest to understand the caufe of this concourse, promising Justice, if any person had done them wrong. Eex with a loud voice cryeth out, They lie in wait for my life, we are met to defend our selves. The Keeper urging Eex again to unfold some part of his grievance; the unruly multitude cryeth out, Away, let us be gone, they come to betray you. KILL them, call away that Great Seal! Eex seeth into the House, the Lords follow him, he chargeth them to make the doors fast, and turning him to the Lords, Have patience for a while (said he) I must go into the City, to dispatch a little business with the Mayor and Sheriffs, I will return presently.

The Lord Keeper and three others of the Privy Council, sent to Eex house, to know the caufe of this concourse, and his Amy fover.
There the Lords are kept prisoners; Essex maketh halt into the City, with a troop of two hundred men at his heels; the Earl of Bedford, the Lord Cromwell, and other Lords meeting him by the way, join themselves: coming into London, he cryeth out aloud, For the Queen, for the Queen, they lay wait for my life. The Citizens came running to gaze, but not so much as one person took heart to take his part. Paffing along the City, he came all in a sweat to the Sheriff Smith's house, who shifthimself forth at a back-door, and goeth to the Lord Mayor. By this time, certain of the Nobility entered the City with a Herald, declaring Essex and his adherents Traitors. Hereupon, hearing also that the Lord Admiral made towards him with an Army, he began to be disheartened; George taketh care for himself, requiteth he might be sent to release the Collectors, and with them to crave the Queens mercy, whiles the issue was yet doubtful. The Earl content that Popham only should be freed; but he refused, unless the Keeper also might be dismissed. Then George freeth them all, and goeth along with them to the Court by water.

Now when Essex thought to return, he found a chain fastened cross the street, at the West end of Pauls, and men in Arms on the other side; then he began to draw his Sword, and having once given the word, Down letteth fly at them, flew one of them incontinent, himself being sore wounded, and fell off his horse. On the other part had his Hat shot through; whereupon retiring, he took Boat at Queen-House, and went to Essex House, where, finding the Collectors all dismissed, he grew extreme angry and dismayed, and cast certain papers into the fire, saying, They should tell no tales. By and by the Admiral beseecheth the House, commanding them to yield. Southampton offereth, if the Admiral would give hostages to secure them, they would present themselves to the Queen. The Admiral answereth by Sidney, That Rebels are not to proffer Conditions. Within an hour, Essex finding the case desperate, releaseth to ruff forth; and the Lord Sandys (the most aged in the company) greatly urged it, saying, It were better to die valiantly than by the hands of a Hang-man. But Essex his mind upon a little deliberation altering, fell upon their knees, and deliver their weapons to the Admiral, when it was ten o'clock at night. Owen Souldier, and one or two more were slain with Marker shot, and as many of the Befiegers. The next day, Thomas Lee, Commander of a Company of Souldiers in Ireland, who to one Crofts a Sea-Captain (that detected him) intimateth, how noble an exploit it were, for six stout Fellowes to go to the Queen, and compel her forcibly to releaseth Essex and Southampton, was presently apprehended, examined, found guilty, and executed. Essex and Southampton were carrieth forth to Lambeth, to the Archbishops house, because it was a dark night; but anon they were sent to the Tower, by the Queen's direction; and with them, Rutland, Sands, Cromwell, Mountague, Daveners and Bromley, the rest were put in common prisons.

On the nineteenth of February, Essex and Southampton were called to their Arraignment, before their Peers in Westminster-Hall, where Backward Lord Treasurer, was appointed Lord High-Steward of England for that time. The Peers being severally called by their names, Essex demanded, If it were not lawful for them to except against some of the Peers, as private persons might do against the Jurors. The Judges made answer, That the credit and fidelity of the Peers of England was presumed to be such, that in Tryals they were not bound to take an Oath, nor were they liable to any exception. There were they jointly indited of High-Treason; namely, that they plotted to deprive the Queen of her life and Kingdom, To surprize her in her very Palace; and that they brake forth into open Rebellion, by imprisoning the Councillers of the Kingdom; by exciting the Lords to Rebellion with vain Fictions; by insubrating the Queens loyal Subjects in the City; and by defending of Essex House against the Queen's Forces. Hereunto they pleaded, Not guilty; Essex withall averring, That they had done nothing but of necessity, and the Law of Nature, Tawton aggravate the specialties; and Edward Coke Attorney argueth, That the Earl could not excite himself from the Law of Nature, seeing Majesty is not to be affronted for private revenge. The Earl of Essex with great confidence made answer, That to his Prince and Country, he always had and would bear a loyal affection. Then Francis Bacon (one that was little expected to speak against Essex, by whom he was raised) in defence of Cobham, Cecil and Ralwilge, aggravateth his crying out, That the Crown of England was told to the Spanish; whereunto Essex replied, That he heard indeed, That Cecil the Secretary should lay to one of the Lords of the Council. That the right of the Infanta of Spain to the Kingdom of England, was as good as any of the Competitors. Upon this Cecil (who stood by as an Auditor) steppeth in, and falling upon his knees, beseecheth the Steward, that with his good leave, he might quit himself from this foul aspersion which leave being granted him, he provoked Essex, if he durst, to name the Councillor; but he would not; therefore (faith Cecil) it is a Fiction: still Essex averreth it. Then Cecil turning himself to Southampton, brought him by all manner of Objections to name the man. He referreth it to the Honourable Assembly, and to Cecil himself, if in Honour and good Reason he ought to do it: they affirmeth, He might, Southampton nameth Sir John-Knightst Essex his Uncle. He being sent for, at Cecil's interracy, said, That Cecil two years since told him, that one Dolman in a Book, had asserted the Right of the Infanta; and had spoken no otherwise than so:

Now after the Judges had delivered their opinion what was Law in the matters alleged, the Earls, by the Stewards direction, were taken aside. Then the Peers rote, and went apart, and having consulted about an hour, returned to their seats, and in their order, pronounced the Earls guilty of High Treason. Then the high Steward advising Essex to implore the Queens mercy, giveth Sentence, and that done, brake his Staff, and departed.

The next day, Sir Robert Verno, Sir William Connable, Sir Edward Baynham, Littleton, Cloff, Captain White, Job and Christopher Wright, and Orell an old Souldier, were called to their Tryal: but the Queen (informed by Sir Fulke Greville, they pled, Not guilty.
Grevill, That most of them were drawn unnoting ingly into the danger, commanded that only Littleton, Baynham, and Orrell should have their Tryal, the rest to be sent back to prison. Theese were all condemned, but their lives spared;
which favour (Rantleigh for a good sum of money received of Baynham procured.

Eflex in the mean while, requested he might speak with some of the Counsellors, to whom he reconciled himself; and to Cecil especially; and then intimating that the Queen could not be in safety while he lived; he requested he might be executed privately in the Tower: He grievously inveighed against some of the Conspiracy, and withheath to speak with some of them, but specialy with Blunt and Coffe; whom as soon as he saw,
he brake forth into these words: O Coffe, ask pardon of God and the Queen, for thou hast chiefly provoked me to this disloyalty. Also he intimated Sir Henry Neville ordinary Ambassador in France, to have been acquainted with the Conspiracy; and that other in Scotland, France, the Netherlands, and the Lord Mounfajy Deputy of Ireland, knew of his purpose, and other in England: who being many in number, and the Lord Mounfajy, ordering the Affairs of Ireland in good fashion, the Queen wisely would take no notice of it.

The five and twentieth day of February, which was to be the fatal day, there were sent to the Earl divers Ministers, to give him ghastly comfort. The Queen now wavering in her self, one while remembering the ancient kindneffe she had shewed him, she commanded he should not be executed; then again, thinking of his hubbornness, that he would not once ask her mercy, and had faid openly, That he could not live, but the must perifh; countermanding her former word,
the gave order that he should be executed.

Then was he brought forth into the Yard, where a Scaffold was erected, and fundry of the Nobility present, among whom Rantleigh also: but being told, it was an inhuman thing to fland by and behold the death of his Adversary, he drew hithelf into the Yard, which would not have beheld the Tragedy. Eflex being ascendeth the Scaffold, uncovered his head, caft up his eyes towards Heaven, and crying God mercy for the ma-vengeance of his youth, but this late specially,
which he faid was a bloody, crying, and contagious sin; craved pardon of the Queen and her Counellors, commended his Spirit into the hands of God, and had his head taken off at the third blow, though the first benef hit both of his fore and motion.

The fifth of March, Sir Charles Davers, Sir Charles Dovers, Sir John Davis, Sir Gylle Merrick and Coffe, were brought to their Tryal inter-minister-division, before the Queen delegates. The Heads of their Indictments, were the fame which were objected to Eflex and Southampton. The others said little in their defence, only Coffe stood upon these two Answers; Where (Sixth he) I am challenged of Treason, because I was in Eflex houte the day of the Rebellion; by the fame Argument the Lyon in the Cellar might be indicted, all that day I lamented the Earl's fortune, and deal-with him to fly to the Queens mercy. And as for the Conflitution in Drury House, it is no more to be called High Treason, than an Embryon may be accustomed a perfect man. The Lawyers on the other side demonstrated, That no necessity lay upon him to tarry in the Houfe; and that the Conflution in Drury House, was it self a Treason, thought it had never broke forth into act. Merrick said only this, The Earl of Eflex railed me, and he hath overme turned.

The thirteenth of March, Merrick and Coffe are drawn to Tyburns, where Coffe entering into a long Speech, was by the Sheriff interrupted; and then, after prayers to God, and offering God and the Queen to pardon him, he was caft from the Ladder: a man of great Wit and Learning, but of a boyterous and turbulent disposition. In the fame manner dyed Merrick.

The fifteenth of March, Sir Charles Dovers and Sir Christopher Blunt were beheaded on the Tower-Hill; although Dovers offered ten thousand pounds to redeem his life, though with perpetual imprisonment. The Earl of Southampton and the Sheriff Smith, were kept prisoners, though Smiths, after some time, was upon certainties suffered to go at large. The eighth of May, Sir Henry Neville was cited before the Lords of the Council, where it was laid to his Charge, that he was privy to the Conflitution in Drury House, yet had not reve-Avered their finiftr purpojis; and had imparted to Eflex the secrets of his French Embassies. He confeffed, That at the Earls intercefs, he intewed him the Commentaries of the French procedings, was present at one of their Conflutation only, but conceived his counfels yet durft not be an Informer against to great Perfonages.
Hereupon he had a grievous check given him, and was committed to prison.

One act of the By, is not here to be omitted.
Eflex at his Arraigned had complained, That his hand-writing was counterfeited. It happened the Counteffe of Eflex being fearful in her Husband's behalf, gave a Letter which the had received from him, to the custody of one Robins, a Dutch woman that waited on her;
this Dutch woman husband named Daniel,
ought by chance upon the Letter, and percieving some paffages in it, which might be the Earl of Eflex into danger, gat a cunning Fellow to draw a counterfeit Copy of the said Letter;
with this he comett to the fearful Lady, who was newly brought to bed, threatening to give the fame to her husbands Adverfaries, unless she would prefently give him three thousand pounds.
She to him the danger, paid him eleven hundred and seventy pounds at the very infant;
yet did he deliver her the counterfeit Copy
only, meaning to make use of the true one,
to get another sum of the Earls Adverfaries.

This impudence being found out, he was cenfrued to perpetual imprisonments, condemned in three thousand pounds (two of which were to go to the Counteffe) and his Earls nailed to the Pillory, with this Writing over his head; A notorious Cheater.

Soon after a Parliament was assembled, where in grievous complaints being rended to the lower Houfe touching Monopolies; the Queen, by way of prevention, fent forth Proclamations, declaring the said Licences and Patents to be void in part, leaving some part to the difcutsion of the Laws: which thing was fo acceptable to the lower Houfe, that they prefentl sent eighty select persons, together with the Speaker, to give the Queen thanks; and the on the other side gave them thanks, for being such faithful Monitors to her, to recall her from an error, whereinto, through ignorance, not wilfulness, she was fallen.

In Ireland, the Deputy at the entry of the Spring, draweth his Forces together, and driveth Tir-Oen from where he had fortified himself; Carew President of Munster, taketh the title of Sir, and endeavoureth to use all diligence, that the Spaniards invited by Tir-Oen, had a purpose to land in Munster, yet could not persuade the Deputy they had any design for Ireland; but in the midst of September, certain News was brought, the Spaniards were in fight, who willing wind to carry their Fleet to Cork, put into Kinlady the three and twentieth of September, and land their Souldiers without resistance. Richard Percy having but few Souldiers to defend the Town, is commanded to come away and leave Kinlady to the Spaniards, into which they enter with Ensignes displayed, and by the Magnates and Inhabituants, were bidden welcome.

D'Aguila, who commanded the Spaniards, publisheth a Declaration, wherein he pretendeth, that Queen Elizabeth was depoited from her Kingdom by sentence of the Pope, her Subjects abjured from their Allegiance; and that the Spaniards went to Cape, to deliver Sir John Godolphine, the Jews of the Devil. Tir-Oen joymeth his Forces with them, so as they were now fix thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse, and promised themselves assured Victory, the English being not near so many. The four and twentieth of December a Battell is joyned; where, after long fight, the Victory inclineth to the English. Tir-Oen, O'Donell, and the rest call away their weapons, and save themselves by flight. Alphonso O'Campo chief Ruler of the Spaniards, together with three other Captains, was taken prisoner, and six Ensign-bearers, twelve hundred were slain, nine Colours taken, whereof four belonged to the Spaniards: of the English not many were slain, but a great number wounded.

After six days, D'Aguila tendeth Letters to the Deputy by a Drummer, requiring that some person or person of account might be sent to him, with whom to confer; Sir William Godolphine is sent to whom he complained of the cowardice, and he feared treachery of the Irish; and therefore, although he wanted nothing to bold out the Seige, and did daily expect great Forces from Spain; yet was willing to make a Composition: whereupon, at last it was agreed, The Spaniards should yield up Kinlady to the Deputy, as also the Castles and Forts at Baltimore, Bere-Haven, and Claffis-Haven, and should depart with life and goods, and Colours displayed. The English at a reasonable price should furnish them with ships and provision into Spain; and that they should not carry Arms against the Queen of England, till they were arrived in Spain.

And now the Spaniards being driven out of Ireland, the Queen, to prevent their coming again, tendereth out Sir Richard Lewison and Sir William Mompesson, with eight ships of her own, and some smaller ships, or two, to attempt something upon the Coast of Spain. On the nineteenth of March, Lewison brought Sail, and Mompesson afterward, having in vain tarryed behind for some Dutch ships to join with them. Lewison in the mean time lighted upon the Spanish Navy of eight and thirty ships, which brought the Treasure from America, and set upon them, but to no purpose. When Mompesson was come with the fleet, they had certain notice, that a mighty force of Caracque of five or six hundred Tuns, and richly laden, was upon the Coast of Spain. There indeed they found it, but it lay close under a Fort, attended with eleven Gallies, and the Caraque itself appeared as big as a Castle; yet they resolved to fire it, if they could not take it. The next day they thundred so violently against the Gallies, that within seven hours the Marquefle of St. Craf, together with the Perugial Gallies which he commanded, withdrew themselves; two of them were taken and fired; and in them was great store of powder, which was going for the Low-Countries. And now Lewison signifieth to the Captain of the Caraque, That the Gallies which they trusted to, were driven away, and therefore, if they now refused mercy, they must expect none hereafter. After much speech and pro, it was at last agreed, That the Caraque, with the Ordnance and Merchandize should be yielded up. Thus the English having a fair wind returned home with a Boast, to the value of a million of Duckets, by the Portuguese account, and not past five of their Men lost in the Voyage.

At this time there arose a Contention amongst the Popish Clergy here in England; for the Jesuites and Secular Priests made bitter Invectives in their writings, one against the other. The original of the Priests quarrel was, That Blackwell, one wholly at the back of the Jesuites, was set over them, as Arch-Prebysiter, who first of all defpoyled them of their Faculties; and when they appealed to the Pope, caueth them to be declared Schismaticks and Heretics. They in sundry Books exalted the Queen very highly, as one that dealeth mildly always with the Catholicks, till such time as they set all in a contubil-lation in England; and by their Tresasons, caused most sever Laws to be enacted against the Catholicks. Parry they traduced as a Bellandarii, Equivocator, and Tyrant. Whether they contended this in good earnest, or not, it is not hard to say; but the Bishop of London politicks considering the contention, and all he gained, was thus, That the Queen and her Counsel, finding them dangerous to the Commonwealth, both the one and the other, upon penalty of the Laws, were by Proclamation commanded to depart out of the Kingdom presently.

In France, the Marshal Bouron, for entering into dangerous attempts against the publick Peace, was arraign'd, and loth his head. His contention brought some other into danger, and amongst them, the Duke of Bullying, of the Protestant Religion, that when he was cited, he darst not appear, but fled into Germany. Hereupon the King of France tendeth to Queen Elizabeth, complaining that the Duke held his marriage unlawful, and the Popes dispensation nothing worth pronouncing his Sons illegitimate; had decli- ned the Prince of Condé to the Succession of the Crown, and contrary the Declaration of the prime of the Nobility. The Queen, by her Legis Legier Ambaffadours, adviſe the King not too credulously to entertain those reports, as doubting these suggestions might proceed from some of the Spanifh Faction. Hereupon the King grew very angry, saying, The Queen held a better opinion of the Duke than he deferved, and that he was one of the chief Architechts of Efex his Trea- fon; and being questioned by the King about it, was not able to deny it. About this time also, the Duke of Savoy, by cunning fleights, and open force, praifeed against the State of Geneva; and the Queen relieved them with a great sum of money, gathered amongst the Clergy and Laity all over England.

And now the Earl Tir-Oen, preceiving him- self in a desperate estate, resolved to face for mercy, and promised at left to submit his life and fortunes to the Queen's pleasure, absolutely without condition. Hereupon, being admitted to the presence of the Deputy, at the very entry of the room, he fell on his knees; and then paining on a few fleets, prostrated himself again, saying, I confente and crave pardon for my great fault a- gainst God, and a most bountiful Prince my dread Sovereign; I fly to the Queen's mercy, as a fa- cted Anchor, permitting her to dispofe of my life and fortunes at her pleasure. Upon this his submission, the Deputy commanded him to go aside, and the next day took him along to Dublin with him, meaning to bring him into England; that the Queen might deal with him according to her Royal pleasure. But before he could come into England, the Queen dyed.

Her Taxes.

I na Parliament holden in her first year, a Act was made, That every perfon should go, to Divine Service upon Sundays and Holy-days, or else pay twelve pence to the poor. Also it was enacted, That Bishops should not let the Lands of the Church, longer than for one and twenty years, or three Lives, except to the Queen or her Succiffors. In her third year, a Procla- mation was made, That the Tefton coyred for twelve pence, and in the Reign of King Edward ema- bled to fix pence, shou'd not be current but for four pence; the Great, but for two pence; and the piece of two pence, but for a penny: And not long after, all the fald bafe moneys were called in, and fix or twelve pence was allowed for them after the Rate. For Ireland also, it was proclam- ned Sterling money; where nine pence in En- gland went for twelve pence there. The Queen was the firft that brought certain Countries to deliver Proclamation at a certain rate, that to they might be freed from the Purveyors: Also the firft that granted allowance to Judges for their Circuits. In her fifth year, a Parliament then holden, it was made Trefon to refuse taking the Oath of Supremacy; yet with this limitation, That by it the blood should not be defhonoured, nor goods confiscate; nor the Oath to be required of any Baron of the Kingdom. Also this year, by a Common-council in London, it was enacted, That all rich Citizens as from thenceforth should be constrained to fel their Household-fluff, Laza- ries of Houses, or such like, should firft caufe the fame to be eynyed through the City, by a man with a Bell, and then to be sold by the common Oat- cerry, appointed for that purpose, and he to receive one farthing upon the yishing for his pains. In her thref and twentieth year, the repetitious by Proclamation excefs in Apparel, Gold Chains, and Cloaks which men were done to their heads. The length of Swords was limited to three Fort, and Daggers to twelve Inches, besides the hilt. Buildings likewise in the Suburbs were restrai- ned, In-mates forbidden, and expres charge for forth; That no dwelling house should be new built within three miles of any City Gates, un- der pain of imprisonment, and los of the materi- als. In her time was fet on foot by Sir Thomas Smith, the Law made for the serving of Col- leads with provision, to the great benefit of thofe Schol'atical Societies. In her two and fortieth year, the fetteth forth Proclamations against the Tranportation of Gold or Silver, wrought or unwrought, according to the former Acts of Parliament in that matter provided. This year also the founded the Company of the East India Merchants, and allowed them ample Pri- vileges. In her three and fortieth year, all Monopolies are called in by Proclamation. In her four and twentieth year, severe Laws are made against Papifts, some infiling death, some fine and imprisonment. In her eighth and twentieth year, a Proclamation was fet forth, prohibiting to

Of her Laws and Ordinances.
The Reign of Queen Elizabeth.

ON Sunday the first of January next after the Queens coming to the Crown, by virtue of her Proclamation, the English Lutany was read according as was used in her Grace Chappel, in all Churches through the City of London, and likewise the Epitaph and Gospel of the day, begun to be read at Maffe-time in the English Tongue. Also in a Parliament holden in her first year, the first Fruits and Tenth were refereed to the Crown, and the Supreme Government over the state Ecclesiastical, and the Book of Common Prayer and Administration of the Sacraments in the English Tongue was refoured, and by degrees the Protestant Bishops that refuted the Oath of Supremacy, were all removed, and Protestant Bishops placed in their room. It was enacted also, That all persons fhould go to Divine Service upon Sundays and Holy days, and a Fine of twelve pence imposed upon every one that should be absent, and the fame to be given to the poor. In her fourth year, the Queen was solicited by Pope Pius, to fend her Oratours to the Council of Trent, which the reforted, as not acknowledging it a lawful Council. In a Parliament holden in her eighth year, it was enacted and by a general content declared, That the Election of the Archbishop and Bishops in England, together with their Confeftation, Confirmation, and Inheritance (which fome persons flanderous called in question) was lawful and Canonical, and that they were rightly, and according to the Acts and Statutes of the King, elected and confirmed. In her eleventh year, there flore in England two contrary faclions in Religion: on the one fide, Thomas Haring, Nicholas Saunders, and other Divines that had fled out of England, began to fecure the Episcopal Juriftion upon the Queens Subjects which they had derived from the See of Rome; On the other fide, Coleman, Barrow, Holling- ham, Benfou, and other, making profeflion of the pure Religion, would allow of nothing but what was directly taken out of the Scriptures, openly condemning the received Discipline of the Church of England, together with the Church Liturgy, and the very calling of Bishops, as favouring too much of the Roman Religion, Protefling in the Pulpits, That it was an impious thing to hold any thing common with the Church of Rome, and used all diligence to have the Church of England, reformed in every point, according to the Rule of the Church of Geneva. Then, although the Queen commanded to be committed to Pulfon, yet it was incredible how upon a sudden their followers encrated, known by the envious name of Puritans. This Sco was mightily encrated, that in her eighteenth year, the Queen and Kingdom was extremely troubled with some of the Clergy, who breathing out no-thing but Evangelical parity, cryed down the Ecclefiastical Form of Government (as a thing polluted with Roman drugs) and setting forth Books likewise, Intituled, The Admission to the Parliament, and the Defence of the Admission: they refuced to return to the Divine Service publicly in life, and framed to themselves other Rites. Whereupon, the Queen to suppress them, whom by no means she liked, commanded every where the fervency of the Law touching the Uniformity of Common-Prayer, to be put in execution, and thofe Books, upon pain of Imprifonment, to be delivered into the hands of the Bishops, or fome of the Queens Council. And this year were taken at Maffe in their several houses, the Lord Mor ley's Lady and her Children, the Lady Guildford, and the Lady Brown, who being thereof indited and convicted, suffer the penalty of the Law in that cafe provided. Unlil the twelfth year of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, the Papists in England were mercifully concerning at, while they tolemnized their own Rites within their private houses (though that folely were against the Laws) but when as that Thundebolt of excommunicating the Queen came forth, the Queen found that was the time to make it more ftrenghtly againft them who brought into the Kingdom any Apost Dei, or baffled Beads, or reconciled any of the Queens Subjects to the See of Rome: yet for fix whole years together after this Law was made, it was not executed upon any Papift, till Culbert Mayn a Priest, and an obfinate maintainer of the Popes authority againft the Queen, was executed at Leofe in Cornwall, and the Gentlemens goods that harboured him confiscate, and himself adjudged to perpetual Imprifonment. In her three and twentiyear, divers Priests and Jesuits came into England; amongst whom, Robert Parsons and Edmund Campion, Englishmen and Jesuits, being now bound for England to promote the Catholick Caufe, at which time the Proclamation was fet forth. That whoever had any Children beyond the Sea, should by a certain day call them home; and that no person thereof should receive any Child into their family, or holy Priet or Jesuit. At this time also, there were appointed a certain Holland and a certain Scott, naming themselves, The Family of Love, who perswaded their followers that thofe only who were adopted into that Family, were elected, and no other could be saved, but were all Reprobrates, and damned, and that it was lawful for them to deny upon Oath what ever they pleased, before any Magiftrate, or whomsoever that were not of that Family. Many of their Books were printed, under these titles, The Family of Love: The Gospel of the Kingdom, The Lords Sentences, The Profeffion of the Spirit of Love, The publication of Peace upon earth, by the Author H. N., but who this Author was they would by no means reveal: at laft he was found to be Henry Nicholas of London, who blasphemously preached, That he was partaker of the Divinity of God, and God of his humane Nature: all which Books were by Proclamation commanded to be burnt. In a Parliament holden the eight and twenty years after her Reign, and out of a desire of Reformation, began to pick quarrels at the Clergy defiring to pass Laws for the restraint of Bishops in their granting of Faculties, conferring of holy Orders, Ecclefiastical Canonize, and the Oath Ex Oificio. They complained likewise of the non-refidency of severe laws against Puritans, when and why en- tered.
The Reign of Queen Elizabeth.

The Queen, who always hated Innovation (which for the most part changed for the worse) would give no or unto them; conceiving besides, That these proceedings in Parliament and Ecclesiastical Affairs, derogated from her Prerogative. In her fifteenth year, the Queen gave a special charge to Whitgift, Archbishop of Canterbury, to settle an Uniformity in the Ecclesiastical Discipline, according to the Laws, which through the conjunction of Bishops, and perverseness of the Parliaments, caused to be atonement given: Whereupon, he provided three Articles, by which every Minister should subscribe.

The fifty, That the Queen had Supreme Authority over all persons born within her Dominions; of what condition soever they were; and that no other Prince, or Prelate, or Potentate, hath, or ought to have any Jurisdiction, Civil or Ecclesiastical, within her Reign and Dominions.

The second, That the Book of Common Prayer, and the Ordination of Bishops, Priests, and Deacons, containeth nothing contrary to the Word of God, but may lawfully be used, and that they will use it and other.

The third, That the Articles agreed on in the Synod held at London in the year 1562, and published by the Queen's Authority, they did allow of, and believe them to be consonant to the Word of God.

It is incredible what Reproaches the Archbishop incurred by setting forth these Articles, both from factional Ministers, and from some also of the Nobility; yet by his patience and constancy, he brought at last peace to the Church, making this his motto, "Vincit qui patientur." Neither did these at home only disturb the Peace of the Church, but others also abroad, as Robert Brown, a young Student of Divinity in Cambridge, from whom came the Sectaries called Brownists; and Richard Harrison, a young Student of Divinity in Cambridge, who preached matters of Religion by their own private print, by Books set forth in Zealand, and dispers'd at this time over England, condemned the Church of England for no Church, and enmified many in the News of their new Schism. Neither could they be restrained, though their Books were prohibited by the Queens Authority, and confoundly fet forth by undisciplin'd men; and one or two of the Ring-leaders executed at St. Edmondsberry. In her one and thirtieth year, these Parliaments frames brake forth again, Books are written by the names of Martin Mar-Prelate, and A Demonstration of the Discipline, by Percy and Redal against the Government of Bishops; and nothing would please them, but the Discipline of Genove: Many Abetors they had, Knights and Bishops, Knights, besides Cartwright (the father of them) Snape, Rix, Pardew, Pan, and others; who were called in question, fined and imprisoned, could never be reclaimed. In her six and thirtieth year, the Queen caused the severity of the Laws to be executed upon Henry Baron and his Sectaries, for disturbing the Church, and the publick Peace, by fatterering of their majesties Opinions, condemning the Church of England as no Christian Church, and derogating from the Queens Authority in Canfeles Ecclesiastical.

Works of Pitty in Her time.

His Queen converted Wexfaminster Abbey into a College, and there ordained a Dean, twelve Prebendaries, a Mater, Luter, and forty Scholars, Vicias, Singing-men, and twelve Almif-men. In her third year, the Merchant-Taylors founded a notable Grammar-Shool in the Parish of St. Lawrence Pounshy in London. Also this year, William Harper Mayor of London founded a Free-School in the Town of Bedford, where he was born. In her seventeenth year, on the seventeenth of June, Sir Thomas Grefftaw laid the first stone of the Royal Exchange in Cornhill, which in November the year after, at his own charges was finished, being the year 1567. In her tenth year, the Citizens of London built a new Conduit at Holborn corner, near to Dow-gate, the water whereof is conveyed out of the Thames. Also this year, Sir Thomas Roe Mayor of London, caused to be enclosed within a wall of Brick one acre of ground near unto the Thames, without Bishops-Gate, to be a place of Burial for the dead of such Parishes in London as lacked convenient ground within their Parishes: He also built a convenient Room in Paul's Churchyard, on the South-side of the Croffe, to receive a certain number of Heirs at Sermon time. Sir William Peter having himself been born at Exeter in Devonshire, he gave to Exeter College in Oxford, a hundred pounds Lands a year: He also builded at Ingerstone in Essex, Alm-houses for twenty poor people, and giving them some competent maintenance, Sir Thomas Grefftaw had his dwelling-house in Broad-street, London, which he dedicated to the propagation of the Publick Sciences, erecting there Lectures of Divinity, Civil Law, Phriffick, Geometry, Astronomy, Music and Rhetoric, allotting to the Professors very competent allowances. In her seventeenth year, the King's Grant to the City of London, for the Professors of the Royal Exchange, to have a College, which was granted to the City, by the Charter of King Henry the Seventh, for the furtherance of the Publick Sciences, and the Propagation of the True Religion, and for the redemption of Souls, and the advancement of Learning. The Royal Exchange, when and by whom built.
In the first year of her Reign, dyed Sir Thomas Chetwynd, Lord Warden of the Cinque-Ports, of whom it is reported for a certain, That his pulse did beat more than three quarters of an hour after he was dead, as strongly as if he had been still alive. In her third year, there was found near Keswick in Cumberland, a most rich Vein of pure and native Bals, which had lain neglected a long time: Also the stone called Lapis Calaminaris, which is of great use in Bals-Works, was first brought into England at this time, and in most plentiful manner. Likewise this Queen was the first that caused Gun-powder to be made in England, which before was had from foreign parts; and at dear rates. In her third year, the Monastery and Church of Paulus, being five hundred and twenty foot from the ground, and two hundred and sixty from the square Steeple where it was placed, and was made of wooden materials, but covered with Lead, was with lighting burnt down, together with the Roofs of that large Church, and that within the space of five hours; the Roofs were after re-edified, but the Spire is yet wanting. The Queen gave towards it a thousand Marks in Money, and a thousand load of Timber; and the City granted a Benevolence, and three Fifteenths; and the Clergy also contributed to it. Also this year there was many monitory Births: A Male brought forth a Foal with two heads, and a long tail growing out between the two Heads. A sow larried a Pig with two Bodies, eight Feet, and but one Head. A man-child was born at Chichester in Sussex, having Arms and Legs like to an Anatomy, the Bief and Belly monitory but, about the Neck a great collar of Bife and skin, growing like the ruff of a fift. In her sixth year, upon the returning of the Army from Newzealund, the Pestifence was brought into England, but especially into London; where, in one year there died one and twenty thousand and five hundred. This year also, in the Moneth of December, was driven on the Shore at Grimsby, a monstrous Fish, in length nineteen yards, his tail fifteen foot broad, and six yards between the eyes. Twelve men stood upright in his mouth to get the Eye. In her seventh year, on the one and twentieth of December, began a Frift, so extreme, that on New-year, even people pass'd over the Thames on foot; some played at Foot-ball, some foot at tick's, as if it had been firm ground. Yet this great Frift, the third of January at night began to thaw, and by the fifth day, there was no Ice at all to be seen; which sudden thaw caused great inundations. In her eighth year, within the space of ten Moneths, there dyed in London seven Aldermen, namely, Edward Banks, Richard Chamberlain, Sir Martin Bowes, Sir Richard Mallerly, Sir William Hewer, Sir Thomas White, and Richard Lornble, one of the Sheriffs for that year. The same year also, in the Town of Offlery in Wales, two hundred houses, in the space of two hours, were consumed with fire. In her tenth year, were taken in Suffolk, at Dunton Bridge next to Ipswich, seventeen monstrous Fishes; Some of them more than seventeen feet long. In the same year, many Dutch flying into England, to avoid the persecution of the Duke D'Alva, were the first that brought into England the Art of making Bayses, Sayes, and Sayes, and such woven stuffs both Woollen and Linen. In her time a rich Vein of Copper was found in the Earl of Northumbers And Grounds, which the King by his Prerogative seized upon. In her thirteenth year, a prodigious Earthquake happened in the East parts of Yorkshire, a little Town called Kinnafyon. On the seventeenth of February, at six of the clock in the evening, the earth began to open, and a Hill with a Rock under it (making at first a great bellowing noife, which was heard a great way off) lifted it self up a great height, and began to travel, bearing along with it the Trees that grew upon it, the Sheep-folds, and Flocks of Sheep abiding there at the same time. In the place from whence it was first mov'd, there left a gaping fissure forty foot broad, and fourteen foot long; the whole Field was about twenty Acres. Pulling all along, it overthrew a Chappel standing in the way, removed an Ever-Tree planted in the Church-yard, from the Well into the East; with the like force it thrust before it High-waves, Sheep-folds, Hedges and Trees, made tilled-gound Pature, and again turned Pature into Tillage. Having walked in this fort from Saturday in the evening, till Monday noon, it then floved still. In her fifteenth year, in the moneth of November, a new Star, or rather a Meteor (but that was found to be above the Moon) was seen in Cathedra Cuffina, exceeding Jupiter in brightness, and in that place was caus'd with the Diurnal motion of the Heavens sixteenth moneths together, though after eight moneths it was perceived to grow less and less. In her sixteenth year, was a great Deaht, so as Wheat was fold at five and six shilling the Bushel, and other things in proportion. In her seventeenth year, a vast mighty Whale was cast upon the Isle of Thanet in Kent, twenty Ellis long, and thirteen foot broad from the belly to the back-bone, and eleven foot between the eyes. One of his eyes being taken out of his head, was more than a Cart with six Horses could draw;
The Reign of Queen Elizabeth.

The Heavens being out of order, was Parmacities. This year also, the River Thames ebbed and flowed twice within an hour: and in the month of November, the Heaven seemed to be all on fire. Also on the four and twentieth of February, being a great Frost, after a Flood which was great, there came down the River of Severne such a swarm of Flies and Beetles, that they were judged to be above a hundred Quarters; the Mills thereabout were dammed up with them for the space of four days, and then were cleaned by digging them out with Shovels. In her two and twentieth year, a strange apparition

happened in Somersetshire, threecore perigonemes

all clothed in black, a surging in distance from

t hose that beheld them; and after then appearing,

and a little while tarrying, they vanished away,

but immediately another strange company, in like manner, colour and number appeared in the same place; and they encountered one another, and fo vanished away. And the third time appeared that number again, all in bright armour, and encountered one another, and so vanished away.

This was examined before Sir George Norton, and sworn by four honest men that saw it to be true.

In her third and twentieth year, in the beginning of April, about fix a clock after noon, happened

an Earthquake not far from York, in which some places were taryed, that is, they shewed, and made the Bells in Churches to jangle. The night following, the earth trembled once or twice in Kent, and again the first day of May. In this year also, in the Town of Walsam in Suffolk, a childe of eleven years old, named William Wi-ters, lay in a trance for the space of ten days without any suffence; and at the last coming to himself, he uttered to the bystanders, by many strange speeches, inveighing against Pride, Covetoyness, coldness of Charity, and other enormous sins. In her fixth and twentieth year, being the year 1588, the like Prodigy happened in Dorsetshire; as in the year 1571 it had happened in Herefordshire: A Field of three Acres in Blackmore, with the Trees and Fences, moved from its place, and passed over another Field, travelling in the High-way that goeth to Here, and there layed. In her eight and twentieth year,

Tobacco was first brought into Eng-lond, and by whom.

Of Her Personage and Conditions.

She was of stature indifferent tall, slender and straight, fair of Complexion, her hair inclining to pale yellow, her face-head large and fair,

her eyes lively and sweet, but short sighted;

her Nose somewhat rising in the midst; the whole complex of her countenance somewhat long, yet

of admirable beauty, but the beauty of her mind

was far more admirable: She had been a subject, which taught her to Rule; she had been in mifery, which taught her to be merciful; and indeed, never Prince ruled with more justice, and with her justice mingled more mercy: She had more Valour in her than was fit for a woman, but that she was Ruler over men; and more Humility in her than was fit for a Prince, but that she meant to be a President to women. She delighted in nothing too much, as in the love of her people, which she procured by ordaining good Magifates, and forbearing Impositions. Her way not to need them, was frugality; and her way to have them when she needed them, was liberality. She made honour in her time the more honourable, by not making it common; and indeed, knowing it to be an influence from herself, she kept it, as her self, a Virgin, and would not prostitute it to unworthy persons. She declined being a Mother of Children, to the end she might be a Mother of her Country; and indeed, no other love ever loved her children more, than she did her people; and therefore never children loved a mother more, than her people did her. She covered not so much to be an owner of riches, as of rich Subjects; for the thought money did as well in their Coffers, as in her own; and indeed,

she never wanted it, when they had it; and they always had it, when she needed it. Never Prince had a wiser Councellor than she, yet never Prince needed it less; for she was her self a Counsellor to her Councell. In fain, whatsoever may in flattery be said of a wife, just, merciful, religious, and learned Prince, may truly be said of her: in all which, if ever she had an equal, yet the never certainly had a superiour. In playing her game of Fortune, she loved not an after-game, for she liked Preventions better than Remedies. She was admirable in expressing her mind, both by speech and writing: and if collection could be made of her Apotheogms, and ex-temporal Orations, it would certainly excit any thing extant in that kind: And for her writing,

Sir Henry Savile affirms; That he had seen some Translations of hers, which far exceeded the Originals. Never Prince kept greater State with lefs stateliness: Her Pensioners and Guard were always the fairest and goodliest Gentlemen and Yeomen of the Kingdom; her Maids of Honor and other Women about her, the fairest and most beautiful Ladies of the Realm; and yet her self a Diana amongst her Nymphs; infomuch that

Court, and the Queen asking him how he liked

Of her Death and Burial.

T was now the Year 1602, when the feeling some Infirmities of Old Age and Sickness, retired her fell at the end of January, to Richmond; at which time, in a sad Omen, the command the Ring to be fixed off her finger, where with the was solemnly at the first inaugurated into the Kingdom, and since that time had never taken it off; it being grown into the flesh in such manner, that it could not be drawn off without filting. At the beginning of her Sickness, the Almonds of her Jawes began to swell, and her appetite by little and little failed her; withall she gave herself wholly to fasting and heaviness, which some imputed to her care for the loss of the Earl of Essex; Others, because she heard, That divers of the Nobility fought the favour of the King of Scots, adoring him as the Sun rising, and neglecting her: But however, in March a kind of benumbedness seized upon her, with a deep melancholy, To she would fit silently, refrain her meat, and not admit of any Conference, but with the Archbishop of Canterbury, with whom she prayed fervently, till such time as her speech failed her, which failed her a day before the dyed. She being in this case, it was thought fit the Admiral and Secretary should go to her, to know her mind concerning a Successor; to whom she gave this Answer; My Throne hath been the Throne of Kings, I would not a mean Person succeed me. The Secretary requesting her to speak more plainly, I will (said she) have a King succeed me; and what King, but the King of Scots, my nearest Kinman? After this, the Archbishop exhorted her to think of God; That do I (said she) or do my thoughts ever wander from him. And when her tongue no longer served her, it was evident by the lifting up of her hands and eyes, that her thoughts were fix'd upon him. And to on the fourth and twentieth day of March, being the last day of the year 1602, she yielded up her Soul to God, when she had lived Three-score and nine years, fix months, and seven days; Reigned Four and forty years, four moneths, and seven days. Her Body was embalmed, wrapped in Lead, and brought to White-Hall; from whence on the eight and twentieth of April following, in great solemnity, it was carried into the Collegiate Church of Saint Peter at Westminster, and there interred in the Vault of her Grandfather, King Henry the Seventh, in his Magnificent Chapelle, where our Renowned Soveraign King James hath built her a Princely Monument, inscribed with Epitaphs to her eternal glory. At her Funerall were Gid to be Mourners in black, to the number of One thousand and fix hundred persons.

Men of Note in her Time.

The Ocean is not more boundless, than the number of Men of Note in her time; but though all of them cannot be reckoned, yet some of them must not be omitted. And to begin with State-men: An exquisite State-man for his own ends, was Robert Earl of Leicester, and for his Countries good, Sir William Cecil, Lord Burleigh; as also Sir Francis Walsingham, that great underminer of Conspirators. Famous Sea-men, were the Earl of Cumberland, the Lord Thomas Howard, afterward Earl of Suffolk; and of meaner Rank, Sir John Hankins, Sir Martin Forbysher, Sir Walter Raleigh, Cavendish, Pitenon, Ryan; and, to name the worthiest last, Sir Francis Drake, who though he were but a short figure bodied man, yet his great Acts have made the Spaniards believe he was some goodly Petronas. Great Commanders by Land, were Robert Earl of Essex, the Lord Wilmengby, the Lord Gray of Winton, Sir Francis Percie, Sir Roger Williams, Bakerwile, Savage, and the Honour of his Family, and our English Nation, Sir John Norris. Learned Gentlemen and Writers, were Sir Thomas Chaloner, employed by Queen Elizabeth as her Leiger in Spain, who wrote five Books of the reforming of the English Common-wealth, in elegant Verses, while (as he said) he lived in a love in Winter, and in a Barn in Summer: Roger Aikens, born in the norbiably skilful in the Greek and Latin Tongues, who had sometime been School-master to Queen Elizabeth, and her Secretary for the Latin Tongue; but taking too great delight in Gaming and Cock-fighting, he both lived and dyed in mean estate, yet left behind him sundry Monuments of Wit and Indultry. Sir Thomas Smith born at Saffron Widen in Essex, sometime Secretary to King Edward the Sixth, who wrote an imperfect Work of the English Commonwealth, a singular Book of the Orthography of the English Tongue, and another of the Pronunciation of the Greek; the first man that set on foot the Law for serv'ing the Colleges with Provision. Sir Henry Savage, Provost of Eaton, and Reader to Queen Elizabeth, who set forth all Sir Christopher Wike's Works in Greek, and by translating of Cornelius Tacitus, deferred as much of the English Tongue, as he of the Latin. But above all, the admirable Sir Philip Sidney, born by Writings, notably skilful in a light Argument, shew'd how excellent ly, and beyond all comparison he could have done in a grave. Learned Divines were John Fell said born in Devonshire, a Student in Corpus Christi Colledge in Oxford, in Queen Mary's time an Exile, by Queen Elizabeth made Bishop of Salibury, who wrote an Apology for the Protestant Doctrine, and dy'd at scarce Fifty years of age, in the Fourteenth year of Queen Elizabeth. John Whidnker, Master of St. John's Colledge in Cambridge, who learnedly answered all the Books of Belarissine, Bishop Bishop of Winchester, sometimes Fellow of New Colledge in Oxford, who, amongst his other learned Works, hath written notably of Christ's descent into Hell. Richard Hooker, Preacher at the Temple, who with too much meekness did threaten his great

THE REIGN OF KING JAMES.

James the Fourth of Scotland, married Margaret eldest Daughter of Henry the Seventh King of England, by whom he had James the Fifth, who had one only Child Mary Queen of Scots, who had one only Son James the Sixth, who from James the Fourth had undoubted Right to the Kingdom of Scotland; and from Margaret, King Henry the Seventh's eldest Daughter, (the Male Line being clean extinct) unquestionable Title to the Crown of England: whereupon Queen Elizabeth being dead about Ten a clock in the morning the 24th of March, King James the Sixth, King of Scotland was the very fame day (Mr. Secretary Cecil himself reading his Title, and Queen Elizabeth's Will) proclaimed King of England, Scotland, and Ireland, by sound of Trumpet, first at White-Hall, and then in Cheapside, in presence of all the Lords of the Council, and other of the Nobility, with a general Acclamation of all sorts of people, that we may truly say, Sorrow was never more deceased than at this time; for where upon the death of Queen Elizabeth, it was expected there would be nothing for a long time but sorrowing and lamenting; now that very sorrow was swallowed up of joy, her death bringing with it no other alteration but only of Sex, in all other points in a manner the fame, the like Wisdom, the like Learning, the like Justice, the like Religiousnes in them both: only bettered in this, that we changed a Queen of 70 years old, whom we could not look to keep long, for a King of 36, whom we might well hope to enjoy many years.

Queen Elizabeth was no sooner dead, but Sir Robert Cary a younger Son of the late Lord Hunsdon, poted away untent, to King James in Scotland, informing him of the accident: for bringing which news, the King afterwards rewarded him with making him Baron of the Realm, and Lord of Leppington. But though it were sufficient for the Kings information, that he heard the news by Sir Roberts Cary, yet it was not sufficient for the Lords of the Council in discharge of their duty, if he heard it not from them, and therefore within a very few days, as soon as they could provide fit men, they sent first Sir Charles Pailey, and Mr. Thomas Sovereser, and after them Sir Thomas Lake Clerk of the Signet, a man well acquainted with the State of the Kingdom, both to acquaint him with the general appalate of all the Realm, to receive him for their Sovereign, and also inform him in what terms the state of the Kingdom stand, to he might not come altogether a stranger when he came into it.

Queen Elizabeth indeed had left him not only a Kingdom, but a Kingdom without incumbrance; no Wars abroad, no Sedition at home; and not only so, but a Kingdom furnished with all the fruits of Peace, plenty of all things necessary, and of all necessary things; the chiefest a Wise Council, for the left Sir Thomas Egerton Lord Chancellor, Thomas Lord Buckhurst Lord Treasurer, Charles Earl of Nottingham Lord Admiral, and Sir Robert Cecil Principal Secretary: Four such men that the meanest of them were sufficient to sit at the Helm of any Kingdom. Yet to these and divers others besides (all whom the king now by his Letters authorized to exercise their several places, as formerly they had done) he added certain new ones of his own choosing, as namely the Earls of Northumberland and Cumberland, the Lord Thomas Howard, and then after the Lord Henry Howard, the one the brother, the other the son of the late Duke of Norfolk, who had suffered so much, that at first he suffered for the Queen his mother. But although the calling of these two last to such place was done (no doubt) out of favour to that house; yet one of them being known, the other doubted to be a Papist, it was presently apprehended, as a favour to that side; and the Catholics were not a little confident of his good inclination to them all in general. And it was indeed but necessary they should at this time have such a counsel, for he the late Queen's sickly, a little before her death, Pope Clement the eighth, had written two Briefs to the Catholic bishops in England, to admit of none to succeed in the kingdom, when that miserable woman should happen to die (so he pleaded to style the most glorious Queen that ever lived) but such a one, of whose good inclination to the See of Rome, they should at least be well persuaded. And now King James having filled the Government of Scotland, made it necessary for preparation for his journey; on the fifth of April 1603, he set forward and rode that day from Edinburgh to Dunfermline, and from thence the next day to Berwick, where having stayed two days the eighth of April he rode to Wollertoun, where the second of May he came to the house of Sir Robert Caris, from whence the tenth to Newcastle where he stayed Sunday and heard the Bishop of Durham preach, and to joyful were the Townsmen of his being there, that all the time of his stay they bore the charge of his household. The thirteenth of April he set forward to Durham and from thence the fourteenth to Wathorpe, the fifteenth towards York, where his train encamped to such a multitude, that he was fain to publish an inhibition of the peoples refrains, and flocking to him. At York it was a question to whom it belonged to bear the sword before the King at York, where whom is a modesty; but the sword before the King at York was presented with 70 Volunteers, and why.

For before we further, it will not be amiss, to shew the great men attended King James out of Scotland; as namely the Duke of Lenox, the Earl of Moray, the Lord Hume, and many other great Lords, and many others whom he afterward made great Lords, as being in his especial favour; first Sir George Hume, made afterward Earl of Dunbar; then Sir Thomas Erskine, made Earl of Kellie; then Sir John Ramsey, made Earl of Holderness; (which two last had the fortune to come fair in this rescue against the Treason) then Sir Robert Hesley, made afterward Earl of Carlisle, and then Sir Richard Popham, made Earl of Kildare in Ireland, but whose whole fortune by marrying the Heir of that Earldom was afterward the occasion of his great misfortune; for coming out of Ireland, he was unfortunately cast away and drowned.

But though King James was now safely come himself to London; yet he accounted him himself but half come, until his Queen and children were come to him, and therefore there are now appointed to go conduct them; of the Lords, the Earl of Suffolk, the Earl of Lincoln, the Lord Compton, the Lord Norris, and Sir George Carew Knight Lord President of Munster; of Ladies, the Countess of Wrottesley, the Countess of Kildare, the Lady Anne Herbert; Daughters to Henry Earl of Pembroke;
The Reign of King James.

The greater and other parts, the Lady Hastings, the Lady Cecill, the Lady Hawton, the Lady Harrington, and divers others; and with this Princely attendance, the Queen with two of her children, namely Prince Henry of the age of nine years, and the Lady Elizabeth on the twelfth and twentieth of June came to York; where resting themselves some few days, on the seven and twentieth of June they came to Easfon in Northamptonshire, a house of Sir George Ferrers, where the King met them at dinner; and afterward they rode together to a house of Sir John Fortescue, and so to London. The King's younger son, Charles Duke of Albany came not at this time, as being not three years old, and therefore not thought able to endure such a journey, but the year following falling sick of a Fever, Doctor Akin, one of the Kings Physicians was sent to conduct him, who in six weeks cured him of his fever; and the first week of October brought him safe to Windsor, where the King then lay; for which service he was so well rewarded, that together with the gain of his unfaill practice, he grew to a greater wealth than was usual for Physicians.

King James had distributed the meaner Order of Knighthood, very plentifully; now he thinks it fit to raise his distributions to a higher degree, and therewithon the twelfth of May, he made Sir Robert Cecill Baron of Elizan; Sir Robert Sidney Baron of Pavnburn; Sir William Knolles Baron of Grezet; and Sir Edward Wiston Baron of Morley; and not long after he made the Lord Henry Howard Earl of Northampton; and Thomas Sackville Lord Buckeburgh, he made Earl of Dorset.

The King had by this time found the love and affection of his own people; but the affliction of neighbouring Princes towards him flood yet in suspense, when now to take away that doubt came first in the beginning of June, an Ambassador from the Palgrave of Albion; presently after another the Kings of France, another from the Archduke of Austria; another from the King of Spain; from the Saignory of Venice another; another from the Duke of Florence; and lastly on the eight of June Mounfent de Bury from the King of France: all congratulating his happy coming to the Crown of England; for entertainment of which Ambassadors, and all other that should come after, the King had erected an Office by the name of Master of the Ceremonies, allowing him two hundred pounds a year Fec, and the first that had the place was Sir Lewis Lenkgor; a Gentleman, who besides other good parts, was very skilfull in the neighbouring languages.

Upon the seventeenth of May this year, were made fourteen Sergeant at Law: whereof eleven had received Wits the last year of Queen Elizabeth: namely, Thomas Courtnier, Robert Haughton, Laurence Tanfield, John Cook, Thomas Fuller, Edward Philips, Thomas Harris, James Allman, Henry Hubbard, Andrew Nicholls, and Robert Parker; to whom the King added three new, John Sterly, George Suggor, and Richard Hutton, who all kept their Feast together in the middle Temple Hall.

One would think that at this time all Offences against Queen Elizabeth had been forgotten, but King James more tender of wrongs done to him than to himself, would not suffer Valentine Thomas to escape, who after he had lain many years prisoner in the Tower, was on the twentieth of June arraigned at the King's Bench Bar and for conspiracy against the late Queen and some of her Council, was on the seventeenth of June after six a clock at night, drawn to St. Thomas Warnings, and there hanged and quartered.

About this time the Honourable Charles Lord Montjoys returned out of Ireland: bringing along with him Hugh O'Neal, Earl of Tir-Oen at whose coming to the King, the Lord Montjoys was sworn of the Kings Privy Council; and the Earl of Tir-Oen, who had been the cause of so much English blood shed, was yet pardoned, and proclamation made, that all men he should be used with respect and honour.

All this while the King had moved within his own Spheres, and had done nothing out of the Realm; his first Employment abroad was now in June, to his brother the King of Denmark, whom he sent Ambassadors, the Earl of Rosland upon two occasions: the one to be Councillor to his Son, who was named Christopher, the other to present him with the Order of the Garter; upon the like employment, soon after, he sent the Lord Spencer to Frederick Duke of Wurtemberg, which Lords faw the said Princes inveted with the Garter, and after honourable entertainment returned home.

It was now a time that every man might sit a Treatise under his Vine, and enjoy the happiness of a peaceable Government; when suddenly like a Storm in a fair Summers day, brake forth a Treatise of a strange Composition: for where in all Treatises commonly they are all of some one Faction, in this, there were people of all sorts; Priests and Laymen, Papists and Protesants, Noblemen, Knights and Gentlemen that one would think it should be a well managed Treatise, and yet was in nothing but the flatness that was to be so shallow, that it could scarce be observed, either by the Authors of it, or what it was they would have done. Indeed the great favour which King James at his first coming to the Crown, showed to the Earl of Southampton, was like to breed no good blood in those that were his oppositer; and it was said (how true I know not) that as the King had sent to enlange the Earl of Southampton, and appointed him to meet him upon the way; when he heard of an intention that the Lord Cobham and Sir Walter Raleigh had to meet him; he sent them word they should spare their labour. But whether it were so or no, it seems they found some cause of discontentment, and discontentment will never want Complexes; and by this means was the composition of this Treatise made up, and thereupon we apprehended Henry Lord Cobham, and George Brook, his brother, Thomas Lord Grey of Hinton, Sir Walter Raleigh, Sir Griffith Markhaw, and Sir Edward Parham, Knights, Bartholomew Breakeby, and Anthony Copley Gentlemen, William Walfyn and William Clerk Priests; But though they were apprehended in July, yet they came not to their arraignment till November following, for by reason of the fickleness, which was then hot in London, the Term was put off till Graffino et Mariini, and, then, to be kept at Winchelsea in Hampshire, only the Courts of the Exchequer, Ward's & Livery, and the Dutchy of Lancaster were kept in the King's Manor at Richmond in the County of Surrey, and to in the fourth of November following, all the stored Delinquents were removed from the Tower of London and other Prisons, by strong Guards to Winchelsea, and there arraigned, whose Indictment was for Conspiring.

1. To kill the King.
2. To raise Rebellion.
3. To alter Religion.
4. To subvert the State.
5. To procure Invasion by Strangers.

Concerning the first Point, it was proved, that the Lord Grey intended to obtain the levying of 2000 men, for defence of the Low-Countries, and with them to seize upon the King and Prince, and take the Lords of the Council in their Chambers. For the other Points, It was proved, That the Lord Cobham and Sir Walter Raleigh met at St. Martin's in the Fields, and there consulted about making Sedition, moving Rebellion, altering Religion, subverting the State, and to set up the Lady Arabella. And particularly for the Point of subverting the State, it was proved, that Raleigh was designed to be Lord Chancellor, George Brooke Lord Treasurer, Sir Grissifh Markham Secretary, and the Lord Grey to be Master of the Horse, and Earl Marshal of England. And for effecting of these Treasons, It was proved, that Watson the Priest had devised Oaths in writing, by which all parties were bound to keep them secret. And for the last Point, It was proved, that Sir Walter Raleigh was appointed to treat with Count Arenberg for fix hundred thousand Crowns, and the Lord Cobham to go to the Archduke and to the King of Spain, to persuade them to affit the Lady Arabella. Those things being proved against them; on the days in which they were severally Indicted, the molt which was replied in mitigation of their fault, was first by Watson, who affirmed it could not be Treason, because the King was not yet Crowned; and then by the Lord Grey, that it was but a verbal matter, and never took effect, and therefore could be no Treason; but those aflerений being both refuted, they were all (except Sir Edward Parkham, who only was acquitted) on their several days of Indictment, found guilty of Treason; and had Judgment accordingly. The Prebends Watson and Clerk were executed at Winchelsea, the nine and twentieth of November: George Brook was beheaded the fifth of December: but then the hand of Justice flayed, and this was the course which the King held in the weung mercy. After the death of the three before named, he signed three other Warrants for the execution of the late Lord Cobham, the Lord Grey, and Sir Grissifh Markham, on a certain day then following, but before that day came, he privately framed another Warrant written with his own hand to the Sheriff, (who was then Sir Benjamin Ficeborn) by which he countermanded the former Warrants, and that there might be no notice taken of it, he sent it by Mr. John Glyde, a Scotch-man, and one utterly unknown of all the Company, appointing him to deliver it to, that it might not take effect, till after their several confessions, and at the very point of their Execution; which was accordingly performed. At this time it was a wonderful thing to see how the Delinquents falling upon their knees, lamented their misdoings, and most of all how they extolled the Kings unbreakable mercy. But though thus pardoned, yet were they carried back to the Tower, where the Lord Grey not long after dyed, and in him was extolled that Barony, which had formerly brought forth many valorous and worthy men. Sir Grissifh Markham after some time was set at liberty, and passed beyond Sea, where he lived long after in mean account. The Lord Cobham likewise was afterward discharged of Imprisonment, but deprived of his Ettate, lived divers years in great penury and in him ended that Noble Family, which in flourished in great honour many Ages. Sir Walter Raleigh was kept in the Tower, where to his great honour he spent his time in writing, and had been a happy man if he had never been releas'd. But such is our fate, that no man for time is understood, whether it be good or bad, until it be discovered by the Event.

And now was preparation made for the King's Coronation; and for a preparato unto it, he first restored the Earl of Southampton, and then raised in honour these following: Sir Thomas Egerton Lord Chancellor, he made Baron of Esher; Sir William Ruffet, Baron of Tornburg; Sir Henry Grey, Baron of Grady; Sir John Peter, Baron of Writtle; Sir John Harrington Baron of Exton; Sir Henry Dovers Baron of Denfey; Sir Thomas Gerrard, Baron of Gerard Bromley in the County of Stafford; and Sir Roberts Spenser, Baron of Hertnigesion. After this he conferred inferior Orders; and made Knights all the Judges and Serjeants at Law, all Civilians and Clerks of the Signet, all his Gentlemen Ushers and divers other, and lately made Knights all the Judges and Serjeants at Law, all Civilians and Clerks of the Signet, all his Gentlemen Ushers and divers other; and lately made Knights all the Judges and Serjeants at Law, all Civilians and Clerks of the Signet, all his Gentlemen Ushers and divers other, and lately made Knights all the Judges and Serjeants at Law, all Civilians and Clerks of the Signet, all his Gentlemen Ushers and divers other; and lately made Knights all the Judges and Serjeants at Law, all Civilians and Clerks of the Signet, all his Gentlemen Ushers and divers other; and lately made Knights all the Judges and Serjeants at Law, all Civilians and Clerks of the Signet, all his Gentlemen Ushers and divers other, and lately made Knights all the Judges and Serjeants at Law, all Civilians and Clerks of the Signet, all his Gentlemen Ushers and divers other, and lately made Knights all the Judges and Serjeants at Law, all Civilians and Clerks of the Signet, all his Gentlemen Ushers and divers other, and lately made Knights all the Judges and Serjeants at Law, all Civilians and Clerks of the Signet, all his Gentlemen Ushers and divers other, and lately made Knights all the Judges and Serjeants at Law, all Civilians and Clerks of the Signet, all his Gentlemen Ushers and divers other, and lately made Knights all the Judges and Serjeants at Law, all Civilians and Clerks of the Signet, all his Gentlemen Ushers and divers other, and lately made Knights all the Judges and Serjeants at Law, all Civilians and Clerks of the Signet, all his Gentlemen Ushers and divers other, and lately made Knights all the Judges and Serjeants at Law, all Civilians and Clerks of the Signet, all his Gentlemen Ushers and divers other, and lately made Knights all the Judges and Serjeants at Law, all Civilians and Clerks of the Signet, all his Gentlemen Ushers and divers other, and lately made Knights all the Judges and Serjeants at Law, all Civilians and Clerks of the Signet, all his Gentlemen Ushers and divers other, and lately made Knights all the Judges and Serjeants at Law, all Civilians and Clerks of the Signet, all his Gentlemen Ushers and divers other, and lately made Knights all the Judges and Serjeants at Law, all Civilians and Clerks of the Signet, all his Gentlemen Ushers and divers other, and lately made Knights all the Judges and Serjeants at Law, all Civilians and Clerks of the Signet, all his Gentlemen Ushers and divers other, and lately made Knights all the Judges and Serjeants at Law, all Civilians and Clerks of the Signet, all his Gentlemen Ushers and divers other, and lately made Knights all the Judges and Serjeants at Law, all Civilians and Clerks of the Signet, all his Gentlemen Ushers and divers other, and lately made Knights all the Judges and Serjeants at Law, all Civilians and Clerks of the Signet, all his Gentlemen Ushers and divers other, and lately made Knights all the Judges and Serjeants at Law, all Civilians and Clerks of the Signet, all his Gentlemen Ushers and divers other, and lately made Knights all the Judges and Serjeants at Law, all Civilians and Clerks of the Signet, all his Gentlemen Ushers and divers other, and lately made Knights all the Judges and Serjeants at Law, all Civilians and Clerks of the Signet, all his Gentlemen Ushers and divers other, and lately made Knights all the Judges and Serjeants at Law, all Civilians and Clerks of the Signet, all his Gentlemen Ushers and divers other, and lately made Knights all the Judges and Serjeants at Law, all Civilians and Clerks of the Signet, all his Gentlemen Ushers and divers other, and lately made Knights all the Judges and Serjeants at Law, all Civilians and Clerks of the Signet, all his Gentlemen Ushers and divers other, and lately made Knights all the Judges and Serjeants at Law, all Civilians and Clerks of the Signet, all his Gentlemen Ushers and divers other, and lately made Knights all the Judges and Serjeants at Law, all Civilians and Clerks of the Signet, all his Gentlemen Ushers and divers other, and lately made Knights all the Judges and Serjeants at Law, all Civilians and Clerks of the Signet, all his Gentlemen Ushers and divers other, and lately made Knights all the Judges and Serjeants at Law, all Civilians and Clerks of the Signet, all his Gentlemen Ushers and divers other, and lately made Knights all the Judges and Serjeants at Law, all Civilians and Clerks of the Signet, all his Gentlemen Ushers and divers other, and lately made Knights all the Judges and Serjeants at Law, all Civilians and Clerks of the Signet, all his Gentlemen Ushers and divers other, and lately made Knights all the Jud...
At this time the King forgot not a deliverance he had formerly had, which though it were had in Scotland, yet he would have notice of it taken in England, which was his deliverance from the conspiracy of the Covenanters on the fifth day of August three years before: and therefore Friday being the fifth of August was by commandment appointed to be holy day, with Morning Prayer, Sermons, and Evening Prayer that day, and Bonfires at night; which was then and after, during his life solemnly observed.

King James had in him as it were two persons; one as he was the King of Scotland; and in this he was in perfect amity with the King of Spain; another as he was King of England, and in this he had some difference with Spain but he, as Rex pacis, took the belt from both, and was altogether for the Olive branch, and therefore when at his coming into England, he found letters of Mart granted against the Spaniards, he first called them all to be called in, and then conferred to a Treaty of perfect reconciliation: In which Treaty handled at London, the 18th of August, 1604, the Commissioners for the King of England were the Earl of Dorset, Charles Earl of Nottingham, Charles Earl of Devonshire, Henry Earl of Nottingham, and Robert Viscount Cranbourne: For the King of Spain, John de Valaisco Contable of Caflias, John de Tuffe Earl of Villa Medician, and Alexander Robidins Provisor of the Law in the College of Millan; For the Archdukes, Charles Count of Arenberg, John Richardus President of the Privy Council, and Lodowich Verreiken principal Secretary: by whom a Peace being concluded and contained in many Articles; The Summer following, the King of Spain sent Dom John de Valaisco Contable of Castile and Duke of Fyra, also Pedro de las Serez, his great Chamberlain accompanied with divers Marquess's, Earls and Barons, who coming into England, were by the Earl of Devonshire on the nineteenth of August Brought to the Count, where the King in his Chappell in the presence of the Commissioners and other English Lords, the Duke of Fyra holding the Kings hands between his face and the Sun; where he made a solemn Swear, truly to observe and keep all the Articles of the Peace and League agreed upon; and in March following, being now the third year of King James, Charles Earl of Nottingham, Lord high Admiral of England was sent into Spain to take in like manner the King of Spain's Oath; who accompanied with three Barons, and many Knights, Gentlemen & other, to the number of six hundred and fifty, the fifteenth of April arrived at Granes, from whence he was conducted to Valdeaud, three hundred miles off, where the King of Spain then kept his Court, entertained in all places as he pleased, as the King of Spain's charge, with so great provisions and such demonstration of love and gladness, that it plainly showed the Spaniards were as glad of our friendship as we of theirs. The Lord Ambassador being come to the Court, he caused Thomas Knoll Esquire, to deliver the presents sent from the King of England, which were fix goodly HorSES, with saddles and bridles, the very richly embroidered, where for the King, and three for the Queen two Croffe-bows with thefe of arrows; four fowling pieces inlaid with plates of gold; and a couple of Lyme-bounds of singular qualities: which the King and Queen in very kind manner accepted, and then on the thirtieth of May, the Lord Ambassador being sent for, the King came forth into a large room: where having a little Table set before him, and a Bible very reverently laid upon it, together with a Crucifix: the Archbishop of Toledo read the Oath, at the reading whereof, the Lord Ambassador held the Kings hands between his, and the King kneeling down, laid his hands upon the Box, and after his Oath, subscribed to the Articles formerly concluded. Whilest the Earl of Nottingham was thus employed in Spain, the right honourable Edward Earl of Hertford, was likewise sent Ambassador to Albertus and Isabella, Archdukes of Austria, to take their Oaths, for confirmation of the said Articles of Peace, which were taken at Brussels the first of May with great state and solemnity: After which, as the Earl bestowed on the Archdukes favors, to the full sum of three thousand pounds; So the Archduke at his departure, bestowed upon the Earl, a Jewel worth nine hundred pounds, and a suit of Arms worth three hundred, and bore his charges all the time of his stay at Brzuzel. And now was King James truly in peace pacis, in peace and amity with all Princes of Christendom, which few of his Ancestors ever were.

A little before this, in the Moneth of August, in the year 1604, the strong Town of Fosseid in Flanders, after above three years siege, and the slaughter of above a hundred and twenty thousand men of both fides, and in defence whereof, Sir Francis Vere General, and his brother Sir Horatio Vere had shewed great Valor, was by the Marques Spinola taken; for which service, the King of Spain made him Duke of Santa Severina, and the Lord General of all the Forces in the Low Countries.

It was now the third year of King James his Reign, when he kept Saint George Feast at Greenwich, and their made two new Knights of the Garter; namely the High and Mighty Prince Duke Vreik, heir of Norway, and brother to our gracious Queen Anne; and the right Noble Lord Henry Howard Earl of Northampton. And upon this he also made Sir Robert Cecil Viscount Cranbourne, who being richly hanged with Arms, he created him Earl, one Viscount and four Barons; namely Sir Robert Cecil Viscount Cranbourne, he created Earl of Salisbury; Thomas Cecil Lord Burley his eldest brother, he created Earl of Exeter, and Sir Philip Herbert, younger brother to the Earl of Pembroke, he created Earl of Montgomery; then Robert Sidney Baron of Pembroke Lord Chamberlain to the Queen, he created Viscount Lisle Sir John Stanhope, Vicechamberlain to the King, he made Lord Stanhope of Hertington; Sir George Care Viscountchamberlain to the Queen, he made Lord Care of Clopton; Sir Thomas Arundell of Devonshire, he made Lord Arundell of Warder; and Mr. William Cavendish he made Lord Cavendish, of Hardwick.

About this time a strange fancy possessed the brains of a profFed Physician, one Richard Head, master of new College in Oxford, who pretended to preach at night in his steep, in such fort, that though they were called down or flourished, and Julia by the hands of feet, yet would make no show of either hearing or feeling. And this he did often, in the presence of many honourable persons, that came came to hear him; so as within a short time, his fame was spread through the land, by the name of the sleeping Preacher. At length the King commanded him to be brought to the Court, where his Majesty sat up the most part of a night to attend the event: when at last Haidock making a show to be asleep, began to pray; then taking a Text, made his Division; applying it to his purpose, for in his Preaching his use was to inveigh against the Pope, against the Crofs in Baptism, and against the last Canons of the Church of England, and having ended his Sermon, seemed to continue sleeping. His Majesty having well observed the manner of his carriage; after a few days, called the said Haidock before him, and in Conference with him (as he had indeed an admirable facility in discovering of Fictions) made him confess, that all he did was but impotence; and thereupon, to fall upon his knees, and ask forgiveness: which the King granted, upon condition, that in all places he should openly acknowledge his offense, because many were brought into belief, that his nightly Preaching was either by inspiration, or by vision.

We may not here think it unworthy the relating, seeing King James thought it not unworthy the feeling, thereby to obserue the nature of the Lyon, and make a solemn matter of it; for on Monday the third of June (taking with him the Duke of Lenox, and divers Earls and Lords) he went to the Lyon Tower, and caused two Lyons, a male and female, to be put forth, and then a live Cock to be cast before them; which they (as being their natural enemy) presently killed and sucked his blood. Then a live Lamb to be put down to them, which the generous Lyons (as having respect to its Innocency) never offered to touch, though the Lamb was so bold as to go close unto them. Then the King caus’d those Lyons to be taken away, and another Lyon to be put forth, and two Matthers to be put in to him, who presently flew upon the Lyon, and turned him up on his back: and though the Lyons were superior to them in strength, yet it seems they were his matches in courage, and so much superior as they were the first slain, with whom otherwise, the Lyon would not have offered to meddle.

On Friday the 4th of January in the Kings second year, Charles Duke of Albany, the Kings second Son, being then but four years old, was created Duke of York; which because it was done with extraordinary solemnity, is not unworthy to have the manner of it here related. Fifteen were appointed Knights of the Bathe, the Duke of Albany himself, the Lord Willoughby, the Lord Chandos, the Lord Compton, the Lord Norris, William Cecil, Son and heir to the Viscount Cranwell, Alan Percy Brother to the Earl of Northumberland, Thomas Soverell second Son to the Earl of Worcester, Francis Mansons Brother to the Earl of Rutland, Thomas Howard, second Son to the Earl of Suffolk, John Harington Son and heir to the Lord Harington, the Earl of Oxford and Essex were Esquires to the Duke of Albany; all the Knights took their lodging that night in the first Gate-house going to Kings-fret; where they lapped; and had Basons provided for them. The next morning being Saturday, they went out into the Park in their Hermit's weeds, the Minirtha playing, and the Haralds going before them into the Court, and so into the Chappel, where every Knight with his Esquires went to the Altar, and there offered, (the Dean of the Chappel, in a rich cope, holding the Banner,) After this they went up into their lodgings, and there new attired themselves in Robes of Crimson Taffety, with Hats and white feathers, and went back to the great Chamber; where, by the King, they were gided with the Sword; and had guilt spurs put upon them. This done, they were solemnly served at Dinner, and after went again to the Chappel, and there offered their Swords. The next day being Sunday, and Twelfth day, in Robes of purple Sattin, with Doctors hoods on their shoulders, and Hats with white feathers, they issued out of the Revelry with the Duke of Albany (being then to be made Duke of York) into the Hall, where the King sat under the Cloth of Estate, and then the Heralds going before, the Knights of the Bathe followed, and then the Earl of Suffolk, Lord Chamberlain, and the Duke of Northampton, and Charles, Duke Earl of Devonshire, carrying the Robes of Estate for the Duke of York; after whom Wrisley Earl of Southampoton carried the Coronet, George Clifford Earl of Cumberland the Golden Rod, the Earl of Worester the Cap of Estate, and the Earl of Nottingham bore the Duke of Albany in his Arms, supported by the Earls of Dorset and Northumberland, who all coming in this order before the King; the Duke of Albany was after the Patent read, created Duke of York, with the Robes and Coronet put on him; and the Golden Rod delivered into his hand: all which performed, they went to Dinner, and the Solemnity ended.

About this time, on the fifteenth of June, Thomas Doughty a Scrawman, was committed to the Tower, and had Irons put upon him, being sent there but the three days before from the Court on a matter of high importance; he was the first that had counterfeited the Kings Privy-Seat to divers Princes of Germany; One to the Archbishop of Cotten, another to the Archbishop of Tryer, another to the Duke of Clew, another to the Archbishop of Magotinia, and a fifth to the Count Palatine of the Rhine; whereas being examined and convicted, he was drawn on a hurdle into Smithfield, and there hanged and quartered.

And now was a second Parliament appointed to be held at Westminister, on the nineteenth of March following, when four days before the day of sitting, the King, the Queen and Prince rode solemnly in great state through the City of London, where in divers places were erected Pageants, Preffents given, Oatations made, and all demonstrations of love and obedience; and then the Parliament beginning, the King made a long and loving Speech to the House, wherein he signified that the times of his calling in, began time that should have proceeded, there was suddenly discovered a Plot to Treason (so damnable and foul, that politicall will hardly think it true, when they shall hear of it;) the Plot was to blow up with Gun-powder both Houses of Parliament at a time, when the King, Prince, and all the Nobility should be sitting in the Upper-House, and all the Knights and Burgesses in the lower. L 11

The

The Gun-powder Treason.
The principal contriver of this Plot was Robert Catesby, a Gentleman of great account in Northamptonshire, descended from that Catesby who had been a special Councillor of King Richard the third, to whose family the Divine Providence had now ordained to give a delicious period. This Catesby not able to perform the work himself alone, drew in many to assist him, as namely, Thomas Percy, Thomas Wither, John Grant, Ambrose Rockwood, John Wright, Francis Trelaw, Guido Fawks, and at last Sir Everard Digby, all earnest Papists, and all bound by Oath, and by receiving the Sacrament to be secret. For effecting of this plot, they hired a house close adjoining to the Upper House of Parliament, where they were to dig through a Wall, for the fit placing of their Powder. About Candlemas they had wrought the Wall half through; when suddenly they heard a noise in the next Room, which made them fear they had been discovered: but sending Guy Fawks (who went now under the name of John Johnson, or Master Percie man) to see what the matter was, he brought word, that it was a Cellar where Sea-coals had been laid, and were now a talking, and the Room offered to be let for a yearly Rent. This Room therefore as most fit for their purpose, being right under the Parliament House, Master Percy presently went and hired, laying into it twenty Barrels of Powder, which they covered with Billets and Faggots, for being discovered. Thus the first part of the plot was put in good readiness. It now remained to consider what was to be done, when the blow should be given: for though the King and Prince might be slain, yet the Duke of York and the Lady Elizabeth should still be safe, and so they should be no nearer their end than now they were. This work therefore for surpicing the Duke of York, Percy undertook, and for surpising the Lady Elizabeth, they agreed upon a match of hunting near to Dunbarach, under colour whereof they would draw company together, and surprize her at the Lord Harrington's house in Warwickshire, where the then lay, and then proclaim her Queen, and so be free to have all things done as they would themselves. Thus far their plot went, they were not fairly on, and had perhaps gone on so still, if they had continued only bloodily; but now a tenderness of heart took some of them, lest their Friends should perish together with the rest, and this tenderness overthrows them; for to prevent such promiscuous slaughter of Letters was framed, and sent to the Lord Montague, Son and heir to the Lord Morley, brought him by one of his Foot-men, which he received from an unknown man in the street; The Letter was this: My Lord, you of the love I bear to some of your friends, I have a care for your preservation; therefore I would wish you, as you tender your life, to forbear your attendance at this Parliament; for God and Man have concurred to punish the wickedness of this time; And think not lightly of this Advertisement: for though there be no appearance of any flaw in 1543, they shall receive a terrible blow this Parliament, and yet shall we see who burns them. This counsel is not to be contemned; because it may do you good, and can do no harm; for the danger is past, as soon as you have burnt this Letter; and I hope you will make good use of it.

My Lord having read the Letter, though much perplexed, yet went presently to the Court at Whitehall, (the King being then a hunting at Rayson) and delivered it to the Earl of Salisbury, principal Secretary of State, and the Earl having read it, acquainted first the Lord Chamberlain with it, and then the Lord Admiral, the Earl of Worcester and Northampton, who as soon as the King was returned from Hunting, acquainted him with it; the Earl of Salisbury telling him, that he thought it must be written either by a fool, or a mad man, because of those words, (for the danger is past, as soon as you have burnt this Letter) for if the danger were so soon past, what needed any warning? But the King considering it more deeply, apprehended presently some violent motion; and that it must be some sudden danger by blowing up with powder; and thereupon commanded, that diligent search should be made in the Parliament House, and all other Rooms and Lodgings near adjoining: which search was made by the Lord Chamberlain, accompanied with the Lord Montague, who entering the Cellar under the Upper House, found there great store of Faggots and Billets; which was answered to be for Mr. Percie's own provocation; but then (as being considered why such store should be had for Mr. Percie, who used to make but little (as in Town) and thereupon more diligent search being made, there was found under the Billets one of the Barrels of Powder; and after that all the rest, being six and thirty; together with other Instruments fit for their purpose, and then sprying the said Fawks to stand plicuously, they apprehended him, and found in his pocket a piece of Touchwood, a Tynder-box to light the Touch-wood, and a Watch, which Mr. Percie had bought the day before, to try the short and long burning of the Touch-wood, which he had prepared to give fire to the train of powder. The Plot being thus discovered, yet the most of the confederates met at Dunbarach, as they had agreed; where they divulged many detestable untruths against the King and State: signifying withal, that they were there met for advancement of the Catholick cause, hoping thereby to have many to join with them in their Rebellion, but this availed them nothing: for first Sir Richard High Sheriff of Warwickshire chafed them from thence, and Sir Richard Wills Sheriff of Worescheshire, knowing them to be entred into Mafter Lieutenants house at Heathbuck, to bethe them round, where Catesby and Percie influing forth, were both slain with one shot of a Musquet; and after them both the Wrights, John and Christopher, were likewise slain outright; Thomas Winter was taken alive: all which time, Francis Trelaw remained still full about the Court, offering his service for their supposition: but being surprised, was examined, and sent to the Tower, where he confest all, and within a few days after dyed of the Strangury. On the feven and twentieth of January following, a Commission was directed to divers Lords and Judges of both Benches, for trial of the rest of the Confederates: namely, Thomas Winter, Guyo Fawks, Robert Keyes, Thomas Bliss, Robert Winter, late of Holings, in Warwickshire, John Drum, late of Yorthbrook, in the County of Warwickshire; Thomas and Percie, Ambrose Rockwood, late of Stanfield.
The Reign of King James.

in Suffolk Esquire, Sir Everard Digby, late of Oatlands in Buckinghamshire, Knight, who were all condemned, and had Judgment to dye, and on the Thursday following Sir Everard Digby, Robert Winter, Grants and Bates, were accordingly drawn, hanged and quartered at the West end of Paul's Church in London, and the Friday the other four, namely, Thomas Winter, Kyes, Roofwood, and Fanny were executed in the Parliament yard at Westminster. Of all whom, none was so much lamented as Sir Everard Digby, and indeed worthy; for he was a goodly personage, and of excellent parts, and had it seemed cunningly drawn in, and bound to secrecy by Oath, when he little thought of any such Treason.

The seventh of November the Earl of Northumberland, upon招股 of being acquainted with the plots, was first commanded to his House, and after a while committed to the Tower. And thus was this great Plot discovered, and the Plotters punished; to the great rejoicing of all people: infomuch, that even the King of Spain's and Arch-dukes Embassadors made Bonfires, and threw money among the people in token of joy.

And at this time, on the fourth of January, the Spanish Embassador delivered a Present to the King from his Matter: namely, six Jennets of Andalusia, with a silver very richly imbrodered, &c. and also of cloth of Tyfus; one of which Jennets was snow-white, and had a main which reached to the ground. But this was a Present sent before any knowledge had of the Powder-Treason: but as soon as that was known, there was presently another Present sent from the Queen of Spain to the Queen of England, of purpose to congratulate the Kings happy deliverance from the intended Powder-Treason; and the Present was brought by Don John of Men- dieco, which was a Roal of Marme Sattine, imbrodered all over with Amber leather; and upon the leather, in every seam and skirt twice imbrodered about with Gold; the fore-part whereof were fet with eight and forty tagges three inches long of beaten Gold, hollow within, and filled with Amber-greece, also two large Chains of Amber-greece; Two Cagons of Amber-greece, a Velvet Cap, and Buttones, curiously enamelled, and a gudle futable to the Buttones, all which were presented together in a large Vessel of Gold, in form of a Ballo; so as it seems there was none rejoiced more for the overthrow of this Plot for the Catholick cause, than the Catholick King himself. And now King James, not to be unmindful to the Lord Montague for being the means of discovering this Treason, he gave unto him in Fee Farm of Crownland 300 l. to him and his heirs, and 500 l. a year besides during his life: and not to be unthankful to God for the deliverance, he caused the fifth of November, being the day of the discovery, to be kept holy, with Prayer and Thanksgiving to God, which was then solemnly performed, and hath been since, and is likely for ever to be continued.

But in the midst of this great joy, there was suddenly spread a rumour of great sorrow; for on Saturday the two and twentieth of March, news was brought to the Court for certain, that the King was slain at Qued, twenty miles from London, stabbed with an unvenomed knife, whereupon the Court gates were presently shut, and double guard set in all places about London, and all men minds were infinitely distracted, but within two hours all the clouds were flung and dispersed, and the Sun began to shine upon us again: and it was certainly known, that the King was safe, and in perfect health: for which a Proclamation was presently sent forth to signify it to the people; and that afternoon the King came himself to Whitehall, where thousands of people ravished with joy came flocking to see him; and so general was the rejoicing, that the Spanish Embassador gave Sir Lewis Leake, Master of the Ceremonies, a chain of Gold of very good value, for bringing him the news.

Though afterward it was thought by some, that this rumour was but politically devised to make the Parliament and people more tender of the Kings safety, and by making them more sensible what a treasure they had of his life, to make them more willing to part with their treasure for his living, as indeed this Parliament they did, giving more Subsidies than are usual.

The eighth and twentieth of March following, Henry Garnet Provincial of the English Jesuites, was arraigned in Goulid-hall, for concealing the foresaid treason, where he had Judgment to be hang'd, draw'd, and quarter'd, and accordingly on the third of April he was brought to the Tower to the West end of Paul's Church, & there executed. At his death, he confessed his fault, asked forgiveness, and called out all Catholics never to attempt any treason against the King or State, as a curse with which God would never prosper.

On Tuesday the twentieth of May were enrolled at windsor Knights of the Garter, Robert Cecil Earl of Salisbury, and Thomas Howard Viscount Bydon; both of them honourably attended, but the Earl of Salisbury beyond ordinary proportion.

There was, yet a Fag end of the late Powder-Treason behind to be examined: wherein upon two Barons of the Realm; namely, Henry Lord Mor- dent, and Edward Lord Stuarts, were brought from the Tower to the Star-Chamber, and there, not charged indeed with any point of the treason, but only reflexively, because they neglected to appear at the Parliament, according to their summons, for which neglected only, without any further charge, they were fined to pay to the King, the Lord Morant ten thousand Marks, and the Lord Storart six thousand, and to be prisoners during the Kings pleasure. But on the 27th of June, Henry Earl of Northumberland was likewise brought from the Tower to the Star-Chamber, and more directly charged with circumstances concerning the Treason, specially in regard of Thomas Percy, whom he had admitted to be one of the Kings Gentlemen Pensioners, without ministration unto him the Oath of Supremacy, knowing him to be a Recusant; for which, and some misprisions, he was fined to pay to the King thirty thousand pounds, to forfeit all his Offices, and to be kept prisoner during the Kings pleasure, as indeed he continued many years, and at last relented, was yet confined.

It was now the fourth year of King James his Reign, and was a time of Prudent Preparation; for this Summer, the 17th of July, Christiana, the King of Denmark's daughter, to the Queen, having been long expected, with eight flats came into the River Thames near LII.
On Thursday the 16th of July, the King and Prince with many Lords dined at Merchant Taylors Hall, where the Master and Wardens of that Society presented the King with a purse of Gold, giving him humble thanks for granting their Fraternity with his Royal Presence; and thereupon fewed him a Roll, wherein were registered the names of 7 Kings, 1 Queen, 17 Princes and Dukes, 2 Dutchesses, one Archibishop, one and thirty Earls, threecords and six Barons, seven Ab- bards, seven Princes, with a great number of Knights and Esquires, who had been free of that Company; which his Majesty graciously accepted, but told them, that he himself was already Free of another Company; but the Prince his Son should be free of theirs, and that he would see the Garland put on his head: whereupon the Master presented the Prince also with a purse of Gold, which he graciously accepted, and said, that not only himself would be free of the Merchant-Taylors, but the Lords also that were with him should do the like, all which was performed with great solemnity.

The fourth of July this year, Sir Thomas Ken- net was called by Writ to the Parliament by the name of Baron of Effrick, the next day Sir Ju- lian Caesar, Chancellor of the Exchequer was sworn a Privy Councillor; and the sixteenth of November following Sir Francis Clifford Knight, was called to the Parliament by Writ, by the name and title of Baron of Leyton Branc/old, whose only Daughter and Heir, was soon after, married to Esme Stewart, Baron of Aubigny in France; John Brother of the Duke of Lenox; whom he at- ter arrived in that Dignity.

About this time, Hugh Earl of Tyr-Oren, most ungrateful and utterly forgetful of the King's great elecency to him, together with Terence, Hugh Baron of Denbann, and divers other Irish Lords fell into the parts beyond Sea, with per- pote to sollicite forain Princes against the King, and to offer the Kingdom of Ireland to the Pope, which was presently signified to the Realm by Proclamation.

On the eleventh of April this year, George Jer- vise a Seminary Priest, and the three and thre- teenth of June following, Thomas Garnet a Jesuite, were both executed at Tyburn; Thomas Garnet having the favour offered him to be pardoned, if he would but take the Oath of Allegiance, which he refused.

The 19th of April at Whitehall, dyed Thomas Earl of Dorset, Lord Treasurer (whose death be- cause he dyed suddenly as he sat at the Council Table) was by some unwarrantedly interpreted; but being dead, and his head opened, there were found in it certain little bags of water, which, the King having the framing of his study the night before, in which little bags of water, the King, being aware it was not for others, caus'd his wife by their own maturitv, suddeily breaking and falling upon his brain, cau'd his sudden death. So certain it is, that death comes not always by determinate fleps, but sometimes by fal- tions, and we all carry about us the cau's of sudden death, though unfoleible of them till we be unfoleible. This Lord was of excellent parts, and in his place exceeding judicious, and I have heard many Cheepers man say, there never was a better Treasurer both for the Kings profit, and the good of the Subject.
The Reign of King James. 433.

The twentieth of May at Windsor, were made two Knights of the Garter, George Earl of Danbar, and Philip Earl of Montgomery; but the Earl of Danbar, within a year or two after left both his honour and his life; but not his life without honour, having been a faithful Servant and a wise Counsellor to the King; and was honourably interred in the Church at Westminster.

About this time were many famous English Pirates that stuck not some of them to turn Turks, and lived in great state at Tunis; of whom the chief were Ward Bishop, Sir Francis Verey, and Gauville, whom after many depredations and outrageous acts at Sea, partly the King of Spain suppressed, and partly the King of England, and of their associates being taken, were hanged at Wapping.

Also at this time, in the Strand on the North side of Durham-house, where stood an old long fable: Robert Earl of Salisbury now Lord Treasurer of England, caused to be erected a flately building; which upon Tuesday the tenth of April, was begun, and he himself fully furnished with Wares; and the next day, the King, the Queen, and Prince, with many great Lords and Ladies came to see it; and then the King gave it the name of Britain's Barre.

On the eighth of May this year, the King by Proclamation prohibited all foreign Nations, that after Annoy they should not fish upon any of the Coasts of England, Scotland, or Ireland; nor the Isles adjacent, without the special licence from the Commissioners in that behalf ordained.

At this time the making of Almain, which tolerably with great charges had been fetched from forran parts, was by divers that laboured in it, and now lastly by Sir John Bourchier brought to perfection in England, and thereupon the King prohibited upon pain of confiscation, any Almain to be brought from beyond the Seas, and took the whole traffic thereof to himself.

And the King according to an ancient custom, had aid of his Subjects through England, for making his eldest Son Prince Henry Knight, which yet was levied with great moderation; and the Prince to himself worthy of the performed his first Feasts of Arms at Barsieres, with wonderful skill and courage: being not yet full sixteen years of age.

It was now the eighth year of King James his Reign, being the year 1610, when Prince Henry being come to the age of seventeen years, it was thought fit he should be initiated into Royalty; and thereupon the thirtieth of May this year, he was Created Prince of Wales in most solemn manner, which was thus, Garter King at Arms, bore the Letters Patents, the Earl of Saffron the Robes of Purple Velvet, the Earl of Huntington the Train, the Earl of Cumberland the Sword, the Earl of Aylmer the Ring, the Earl of Darby the Rod, the Earl of Shrewsbury the Cap and Coro-

ed to conduct the King attended on by the Knights of the Bath, five and twenty in number, all great men; and great men's sons, the Earl of Salisbury principal Secretary, read the Letters Patents; the Prince kneeling all the while before the King; and at the words accustomed, the King put on him the Robe, the Sword, the Cap and the Coronet, the Rod and the Ring, and then kissed him on the cheek, and so the solemnity ended.

After this, it was thought fit, he should keep his Court by himself; and then appear Sir Thomas Cholmondeley, a learned Gentleman, who had before been his Governor, was now made his Lord Chamberlain, Sir Edward Philip his Chancellor, and all other Officers assigned him, belonging to a Princes Court; wherein he evidenced himself so early ripe for Majesty, that he seemed to be a King, while he was yet but Prince: and all men ever began to fix upon him.

King James had long since shut up the Gates of famine, and was in peace with all Princes abroad; his only care now was to keep peace at home; and to this end, the three first days of June, in his own Person he heard the differences between the Ecclesiastical and the Temporal Judges argued, touching the Protestsions out of the Kings Bench and Common Pleas; to this end, the eighth, ninth, and tenth of June, he heard many manifold complaints of the abuses of the Vacuum, and other Officers of his Navy Royal; to this end, the fourth of June, 1610, he once again by Proclamation, commanded all Roman Priests, Seminaries and Jefuites, as being the chief enemies of the True Religion, and to avoid the Realm, and why.

The English, or rather the English and the Englishmen of Ireland, made a Coupie against the Earl of Northampton and Northamptonshire; and it was called the Northamptonshire Insurgent, which was called the Earl of Northampton.

The Earl of India Company made a Corporation, with great Privileges.

They build a ship of twelve hundred Tun, called the Prince, and gives into the Princes.

Thereupon the King builds a ship of four hundred Tun, called The Prince, and gives into the Princes.
Before this time one Sir Robert Carre, a Gentleman of Scotland, or of the Borders, at a time of Tiltting before the King, charged with a fall on his Horse to break his Leg; upon which mischance, he was forced for some days to keep his bed, in which time the King was sometime pleased to come and visit him; and then it was first perceived, that the King had begun to cast an eye of favour upon him; and indeed from that time forward (as he was a very fine Gentleman, and very wise) many great favours were heaped upon him: So as on Easter Monday, in the year 1614, he was created Viscount Rochefort. On the two and twentieth of April, 1612, was sworn a privy-Councillor. On the fourth of November, 1613, was created Earl of Somerset, and the tenth of July following made Lord Chamberlain. But this Sun-shine of Fortune lasted not long; yet not by any inconstancy in the King, but by the Earls own unqualified, which thus fell out: The Right Honourable Robert Earl of Essex had before this time married the beautiful Lady Frances Howard, Daughter of Thomas Earl of Suffolk, who upon causing judicially heard, were afterward Divorced, and left free to marry any other. After which Divorce, this great Favourite (the Earl of Somerset) takes her for wife; the King gracing their Marriage with all demonstrations of Love and Favours; and the Lords gracing it with a flaty Masque that night; and a few days after, the Bride and Bridgroom, accompanied with all the Nobility of the Kingdom, were Fested at Merchant-Taylors Hall by the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, but see how soon this fair weather was overcast: For it happened, that one Sir Thomas Overbury, a very ingenious Gentleman, and the Earl's especial Friend, who had written a witty Treatise of a Wife; and it seems not thinking the Lady in all points answerable to his description, had been an earnest diffidater of the Match, and to strengthen his disaffation, laid perhaps some unjust imputation upon the Ladies Fame, which so incensed them both again him, that a lefe Revenge could not give them satisfaction, than to take away his life: So true is that saying:

Improve Error, quid non moralia pellora cogis?

Upon this, they find Pretences to have the said Sir Thomas committed to the Tower, and there by their Instruments effect their Revenge, some by a poysoned Tansey sent him to eat, Some by a poysoned Glyster murthered him, but howsoever effectual it was, for which Past Sir Ferdinando Tivoly then Lieutenant of the Tower, and three or four other of inferior condition were put to death, the Lady and Earl themselves were arraigned and condemned; but through the great clemency had their lives spared, but in such a sort, as was to them no less grievous than death it fell, being never after suffer’d to see the Kings face, nor to come near his Court. This Favourite being thus out of Favour, there was place made for entertaining another; for this same King James was so fond of love and loving a nature, that he could not be long without an Alter ideem; a bosome Friend with whom to communicate his Interns Senus, and upon whose shoulders he might oftentimes lay a burthen, which he was not willing to bear himself: and this new Friend was Mr. George Villiers, a Gentleman of a good Hone, but a younger Brother, but of so delicate a composition of body, and withall of so excellent parts of mind, as if nature had framed him on purpose to be a Kings Favourite. And indeed never any man was partaker of the Royal influence like to him, made first a Knight and Gentleman of the Kings Bed-chamber, soon after made a Viscount and Master of the Horfe; a while after created Earl of Buckingham, then Marquess of Buckingham, and made Lord Admiral; Lastly, made Duke of Buckingham, the greatest Title of Honour that a Subject is capable of; and yet this Title not greater than his Power; for all matters of Grace passed from the King by him, and to grace him the more, his Mother (who after his Fathers death, had married a younger Son of the Lord Compton) was created Countess of Buckingham, his Sister who had married a Gentleman of no extraordinary Family, had her Husband made Earl of Denbigh; his two Brothers were made, one of them Viscount Purbeck; the other Earl of Anglesey; besides many other of his friends and Kindred highly advanced; For this Lord affected not an advancement that should be one only perusal, but rather be in common to all his Family; and was not of the disposition of some, who like to great Oaks, love to keep all that are near them underwood; though it be in truth both against Nature and Policy to stand alone, when they would be lefte subject to the violence of Winds, if more flood together. And though never any man had juncte cause to be envoyed by he, yet never any man was left envoyed; because though his Honours made him great, yet they made him not swell, but he retained the like temper of affable carriage after his advancement, as he had done before. And before all these Favours were heaped up upon him, many other great pasages had intervened for first, after the death of Thomas Earl of Dorset, Robert Earl of Salisbury had been Lord Treasurier, and after him Thomas Earl of Suffolk. But this Lord, though of a most noble disposition, yet as having had his training up in another way, seemd leefe ready in discharging the place, and whether for this, or for his Ladies taking too much upon her by his indulgence; the state was soon after taken from him; after whom there came in such a succession of Treasurers as no Age before had ever seen; all wise and able men in- deed; but yet in whom the Office seem’d an im- plement, rather to enoble the Officer than to enrich the King. For first Sir Henry Montague was taken from the Kings Bench; and on the fourth of December, 1620, made Lord Treasurier, and presently upon it Earl of Manchester, and before the year went about put off. After whom Sir LythamCraigifield, from Master of the Wards was made Lord Treasurier, and shortly after Earl of Middlesex; and then not only put off, but fined to pay the King fifty thousand pounds: After him, Sir James Lee from chief Justice of the Kings Bench was made Lord Treasurier, and soon after Earl of Marlborough; and then, having made a good return of his Place, put off himself. After him Sir Richard Weston, from Chancellor of the Exchequer was made Lord Treasurer, and
It was now the year 1612, and the tenth of King James's reign, when the illustrious Prince Frederick, Count Palatine of the Rhine, came into England.

Alfo the fifth and twentieth of June, 1612, the Lord Sanger, a Nobleman of Scotland, having in a private revenge, enframed Robert Carile to murther John Turner a Matter of Fence, thought by his greatness to have born it out; but the King respecting nothing so much as Justice, would not suffer Nobility to be a shelter for villainy, but according to the Law, on the nine and twentieth of June, the said Lord Sanger having been arraigned and condemned by the name of Robert Creighton Esquire; was, before Westminister Hall first executed, where he dyed very penitent.

About this time, the King in special favour for the present Plantation of English Colonies in Virginia, made it to be held at the West End of Paris; whereas one Thomas Shortly a Taylor of London had the chief Prize, which was four thousand Crowns in fair Plate.

At this time also the Corps of Mary late Queen of Scotland, the Kings Mother, was translated from Peterborough, to St. Peters Church in Westminster, and from thence was carried to the Chappel-Royal there; where it was interred in a Royal Tomb, which the King had erected for her.

About this time also Sir Robert Shirley, third Son of Sir Thomas Shirley of Saffron Knight, who fifteen years past had betaken himself to travel, and had served divers Christian Princes for the space of five years; but chiefly Redelphin the Roman Emperor; and for his Service, made him an Earl of the Empire: he afterwards went into Persia, and served the Persian ten years, who made him General of the Artillery; and held him in so great account, that when the Prince of Persia died, and the Mother of the said Prince, Queen Shiter, was one of the Queens of Persia, after which the Persians employed him to found Princes of Europe, and sent him in the Secret Embassage into England to King James, to whom he delivered his Letters, and shewed his Commission; all which signify the Persians great love and affection to his Majesty; with frank offer of free Commerce to all his Highness Subjects through all the Persians Dominions: After a years stay here, in which time his Lady lay in of a Son, to whom the Queen was God-mother, and Prince Henry God-father; he left the child here in England, and then with his Lady departed into Persia.

It was the year 1612, and the tenth of King James's reign, when the illustrious Prince Frederick, Count Palatine of the Rhine, with whom a Treaty of marriage had been before, with the Lady Elizabeth; on the sixteenth of October arrived at Camelot; to whom the Duke of Lenox and divers other Lords were sent by the King, who conducted him to White-hall, and from thence into the great Banqueting house, where the King, the Queen, Prince Henry, and the Lady Elizabeth entertained him in all kind manner, Gentlemen of the Middle-Temple, and Lincoln's-Inn: The third night with a magnificent Masque of the Gentlemen of the Inner-Temple, and Gray's-Inn, provided indeed then, but was not performed till Saturday night following, by reason the concurrice of people was so great, it would have hindered the Show. After this the Lord Mayor and Aldermen gave the Bride a Chain of Oriental Pearl, valued at two thousand pounds: now when all things had been done for honouring their Marriage, which either love and observance could devise, or art and magnificence could perform; On the tenth of April the Bridgework with his Bride took leave of the King and the Queen at Rochester, (who had by Barge conducted them thither) and there taking Ship on the nine and twentieth of April they arrived at Flushing; from whence the Duke of Lenox, the Earl of Arundel, the Vicount Liffet, and the Lord Harington waited upon them to their chief City of Herfordergh, in all places as they passed, being received with all state and magnificence: but then on the fourteenth of June, the English Lords returning home; the Lord Harington dyed by the way at Wormes, which the two Captains bought out by birth in England. And here it will not be amiss to shew of what extent and largeness the Palatine's Country is, because of the iniquity of some that seek to disgrace it. It is in length about two hundred English miles, taking the lower and upper Country. In the lower he hath fix and twenty walled Towns, besides an infinite number of fair Villages, and two and twenty houses of residence. In the upper, not so many walled Towns, and Houtes, but those that are generally fairer than in the lower, especially Amberg and Neumarkt.

But it is now time to look home; in the year 1609, the King having care for the quietness of Ireland, had granted to the City of London the present possession and Plantation in the Province of Ulster; whereupon, after the year 1612, they sent thither about three hundred persons, of all sorts of hand-y-crafts men, chiefly to keep the two Counties of Londonderry and Cahiragh, where they ordained Alderman Cocklin to be the first Governor. And for their advancing of this, or the like Plantation in Ireland, King James about this time began a new Order of Knights, which are called Baronets, because they take place next to Barons younger Sons; and he appointed certain Laws, to make them capable that should be admitted. First, that they should maintain the number of thirty four Souldiers in Ireland, for three years, after the rate of eight pence a day, and to pay the wages of one whole year, upon the paying of their Patent; Then that they should be Gentlemen of Blood of three Decents; and lastly, should have land of Inheritance, in possession or immediate Revission, to the value of a thousand pounds per annum: And to keep the Order from swelling, he limited it within the number of onely 500, and the issue should fill the Orders to cease. But he that will look how near the end of the Institution, and the Laws of it have been observed, shall perhaps find it to be here, as it was in the Order of St. Michael in France, into which at first there were none admitted, but Princes and eminent Persons; but afterward, all sorts of men, without any difference, were admitted, that it came almost to be doubted, whether the Dignity of the Order did more grace the persons, or the meaner sorts of the persons disgrace the Order: and indeed, when the Laws of an Institution are not in some measure observed, it seems to make a kind of nullity in the collation.

About this time, on Sunday the 24th of October, an exemplar penance was imposed upon Sir Packall Breckys Knight, which was to Hand at Paris Cross in a white sheet, holding a flick in his hand, having been formerly convicted before the high Commissioners, for many notorious Adulterities with divers Women.

This year 1614, in the month of July, Christianus King of Denmark (out of his love to his Sister and King James) came the second time into England; but as being now secure of himself, privately, and with a small company, so as he came to the Queen at Somerset House unsuspected, and before any knowledge was laid of his coming: But King James being then in progress in Beresfordshire, and hearing of it, came presently back, and after he had entertained him there at Bourne-ham, running at Ring's, best-bairing, Play, Fire-Works, and Fencing, on the first of August Prince Charles brought him a board his Ship, who then took his leave, and returned home.

In October, this year was a call of Sergiants at Law, being 1 in number, namely. George Wilde, William Tores, Richard Baxry, Henry Finch, Thomas Chamberland, Francis Moore, Thomas Astou, John Moore, Francis Harvey, Charles Chibburn, and Thomas Richardson; and in Trinity Term before there had two other been called, namely, Sir Randall Cren of Lincolns Inn, and Sir Robert Hitchen of Grayes Inn, Knights.

About this time an Embassador came from the young Emperor of Russia to King James, defining his continual love and amity, and to be a means of making atonement between him and the King of Scottland, and withall presented him with a large Platter of Fish, which was no small honour to the King of Great Britain to have so great a Potentate as the Emperor of Russia solicite him to be his mediator.

Though King James out of a natural goodness was addicted to peace, yet out of providence he neglected not to be prepared for War, and therefore in the year 1620, had granted privileges to a Society called of the Military Garden; and this year 1614, caufed a Mustet of men to be presented before him, which was performed to his great liking, and to the great commendation of the City.

About this time a memorable Act was performed by Mr. Hugh Middleton, Citizen and Gold-smith of London, and born in Denmark, who having an Act of Parliament for his Warrants with infinite cost and indefatigable labour, brought water to the City of London, from the two great Springs of Chudlaw and Annwil in Hertfordshire, having cut a Channel from thence to a place next Flinstone, whither he conveyed it to a large Pond, and from thence in Pipes of young Elms to all places of the City, as for the Pect faith:
Another memorable act was about this time done on the North side of London, called Moorfields, which being before environed with deep ditching ditches and noynty common shoars, was now, not only made: fair and sweet, but so levelled into walks and set with trees, that it is the pleasantest place of all the City.

The next year being 1615, another memorable act for the benefit and beauty of the City of London, was performed; for Smithfield, which was before a rude dirty place, was now paved all over, and strong rails forming the middle part of it, were set up to make it a fair walking place, and fit for Market or any other use.

The Lady Arbella a near Kinwoman of the Kings, had sometime before, without the Kings privity, secretly married Master William Symons, younger Son of the Earl of Hertford, now Earl of Temple, for which they were both committed to the Tower; and now this year on the even and twentieth day of September the ended her life there, and was buried in the Chippel Royal at Westminster.

This year also in July were enthalt Knights of the Garter, Francis Earl of Rutland, Sir George Villiers Master of the Horse, and Sir Robert Sidney, Viscount Lifly; and in another kind of Honour the Earl of Arundel, the Lord Carres and Doctor Andrews Bishop of Ely, were sworn Pray Counsellours.

Wales by the death of Prince Henry, had been a good while without a Prince, and now to supply that place, Prince Charles is created Prince of Wales; in joy whereof, the Town of London in Shropshire, and the City of London, performed great Triumphs; and the more to honour his Creation, there were made five and twenty Knights of the Bath; all of them Lords of Honour, for which they were forty select Gentlemen of the Courts, that performed solemn Jails at Barretts, with great magnificence.

This year was a Cenure of divers great Delinquents, for first Sir Edward Coke, was upon displeasure discharged from being Lord Chief Justice of the Kings Bench, and two days after his discharge, Sir Henry Montague the Kings Serjeant at Law, was placed in his room; next to him the Lord Egerton, whether disabled by sickness or age, to exercise the place, or upon displeasure alfo, had the Seal taken from him, which was delivered to Sir Francis Bacon the Kings Attorney; he made first Lord Keeper; and the Lord Egerton dying soon after, Lord Chancellor. Not long after him Sir Henry Telferton the Knights Attorney, for adding new privileges to the Lanchester Charter, without the Kings privy, was in displeasure put from his place; and in his room was placed Sir Thomas Coventry, the Solicitor. But a while after, Sir Henry Telferton, was made a payless Judge of the Common Peace, having indeed the reputation of an excellent Lawyer.

And yet this work of Centrifying stayed not here, for much about this time Thomas Earl of Suffolk Lord Treasurer of England, had the stiffe of his Office taken from him, which was soon after delivered to Sir Henry Montague, Lord Chief Justice of the Kings Bench. If Sir John Bennet, Judge of the Perrogative Court, had made a little more haste, he might have made one in this number of Delinquents: but he came short three or four years, and then being charged by his own servant with bribery, he was put from his place, and confined in the Star-Chamber to pay twenty thousand pounds; and in his room was placed William Byrde a man of more integrity.

Though King James upon the death of Queen Elizabeth, came to reside in England, yet he forsooth, got not that Scotland was his native Country; and therefore after he had spent some years in England, to acquaint himself with the State of the Kingdom, in March this year one thousand fix hundred and sixteenth, he made a Journey into Scotland for though he had left very able men to fit at the Helm there in his absence, yet he knew that it is the Masters Eye that makes the Horse fast for the Prince's preference sometimes that keeps out many disappointments in a State, that would otherwise creep in; and now, when in his foraying six Months there, he had seen all things well settled both in the Ecclesiastical State, and in the Temporal, and made it appear that he refided not in England out of any neglect of Scotland; but to the end he might be in the place of most conveniency to both Kingdoms; on the fifteenth of September he returned to London, not more to the grief of the Scots to leave him, than to the joy of the English to receive him; so much was King James as a just and wise Prince, beloved of both the Nations.

The 15th of February 1671, in the Fiftenth year of this King, Francis Allenby of the Middle Temple London Esquire, where he had been Reader the year before, was by a Writ called to be Serjeant at Law, John Servis ad legem elec tus, and the fifth of July following was Knighted, and abouted him to be the Steward of the Marthley of the Kings house, and by King Charles, the fifth of May, in the first year of his Reign was by letters Patents made one of the Kings Serjeants at Law, and so continued unto his death, which happened by the will of God the 3th of November, 1675. as Serjeant Inne in Chancery; and was Recorder of Dorchester in Dorsetshire, where together with his Lady in the great Church he lies Involved; leaving Dorothy his only Daughter and heir(by the Lady Anne his wife, the eldest Daugh ter and Colheir of Bernard Samways of Dorsetshire Esquire) married unto the Honourable Den well Holles Esquire, whose only issue is Francis Holles of Winterborne St. Martin in the County of Dorset Esquire.

Now comes to be related a matter of speciall observation; Sir Walter Raleigh had lived a com demned man many years in the Tower, and now his Definity brought him to his end by liberty, which it could not do by imprisonment; for out of a longing for liberty he propos'd a project to the King, upon which(as he was a well spoken man, and of a great capacity) he set such colours of probability, especially giving it over with the Gold he would fetch from a Mine in Guian; and that without any wrong at all to the King of Spain.
Spain (if he might be allowed to go the Journ-

y) that the King, if he gave no credit, that he could perform it, at least gave way that he should understand it; and thereupon with divers Ships, acpanied with many Knights and Gentlemen of Quality, he set forward on the Voyage; but when after long search or search of no such place of Treasure, or no such Treasure could be found, whether it were, that he thought it a frame, to return home with doing nothing: or that his matut Genus thraff him upon the Design, he fell upon Saint Thoms, a Town belonging to the King of Spain; sacked it, pillaged it, and burnt it; and here was the first part of his Tragical Voyage acted, in the death of his eldest Son;

the last part was acted in his own death at his return: For Guindamore the Spanish Lieger, did to aggravate this fact of his to the King, against him, that it seemed nothing would give satisfaction but

Ranevigh's head, without which he doubted there would follow a breach of the League between the two Nations. Ranevigh excused it; by saying that he was urged to it by the Spaniards; first aftaulting of him; and besides, that he could not come at the Myne, without winning this Town;

but Guindamore was too strong an Adversary for him, and the King preferring the publique Peace, before the life of man, already condemned, gave way to have the Sentence of his former Condemnation executed upon him; and thereupon, brought to the Kings-Reach Bar, he was not new-lly Arraigned or Indicted, as being already Mortuns in Leges, but only hath the former Sentence averted against him, and to carried to the Gatehouse, and from thence the next morning to the Parliament Yard; a Scaffold was there erected, upon which after fourteen years reprieve, his head was cut off; at which time, such abundance of blood issued from his veins, that flowed he had stock of Nature enough left to have continued him

many years in life, though now above three centuries old, if it had not been taken away by the hand of Violence.

And this was the end of the great Sir Walter

Ranevigh's great sometimes in the favour of Queen

Elizabeth, and next to Drake the great seaco

and hate of the Spaniards, who had many things harmed him in his life, but more, than his confidence at his death, which he took with so undaunted a resolution, that one might perceive he had a certain expectation of a better life after it; so far he was from holding those Atheistical opinions; an asperion whereof some traducing persons had cast upon him.

About this time King James made a progresfe to the University of Cambridges, where delighted with the Disputations and other Scholastical exercises, he stayed three whole days, and could have been content to have stayed as many years;

for next being a King, he was made to be a Schol-

The King

The King of Spain was at war in England, what could be taken to procure the refom- ing it: who made him answer, There could be no better course than to make a marriage between his Son the Prince of Wales: & the Infant of Spain, which he said would easily be effect'd, if the Prince might have leave to make a Journey into Spain. King James thought he considered the inestimable gudges between Spain and England, and how dangerous it might be to put the heir of the Kingdom into the Spaniards hands, yet grounding himself upon saying, Fideles me furvivunt, facilest and drawn on by the infuriating Speeches of Count Guimard, no perhaps without some inclination in the Marquee of Buckingham, was contented at last the Prince should go.

And to Prince Charles sending his ships about, and taking along with him only the Marquess of Buckingham (who in the time of his being in Spain was created Duke of Buckingham) Edward Porter, and Mr. Francis Cottinson: (two that were well acquainted with the language and affairs of Spain) he took his journey by the way of France, went to Paris, and secretly in disguise to the Court there, where he had the fight of that Lady, that might well have flayed him from going forth, but yet on he went.

In the mean time Guimard a cunning man, and one that besides his Master's had ends of his own, and could play his game no less for his own profit than his Master's Honour, as he had per- fumed the King of the facility of the Match with Spain, to he per- fumed a certainty of it, especially amongst Catholic Laides, by which means he brought no small force of Graf to his own Mill, receiving from one Lady three hundred pounds to be made Groom of the Stool, when the Spanishs Princess should come, of another a good round sum to be Mother of the Maids, and of divers other the like for other places.

But the Prince being arrived in Spain, was re- ceived indeed with all the demonstrations of love and kindness that could be devised, so as the charge of his entertainment was said to includ the King of Spain in nine and forty thousand Ducats; but yet his acquaintance with the Lady was much refrained, for in all the time of his staying in Spain, (which was no lefle than eight months, being from February to October) he saw her but very seldom, and that at good distances, neither spoke with her but twice, and that before com- pany, besides that his speeches were limited, how much and what he should say, far from any means of tying the Knot between them which was Pretended. What the charge should be, was much in obscurity, some thought that a difference between the Duke of Buckingham, and the present Olivers, the King of Spain's great Fa- vorite, was a great hindrance of the proceeding, but other, and more likely, that the Spanish indeed never really intended the Match at all, but had drawn the Prince into Spain for other ends, but what those ends were, was no lefle un- certain; one thought it was done to hold the prince in a Treaty of marriage with a Daughter of Spain, till the Daughters of France should be befowled, thereby to keep him from that ally- ance; but others and more likely, that the King of Spain entertain this Treaty with the King of great Brittan, meaning to spin it out till he had composed some designs in the Low- Countries, and the Palatinate, at least to make King James less vigilant for those parts.

But when much time had been spent in pro- ceeding, upon pretence of difficulties in obtaining the Popes dispensation, King James partly wearied with delay, but chiefly angry with deli- beration, sent to the Prince, with all speed to return into England; which the Prince pretend signifi- ced to the King of Spain, and had his leave to depart; but upon promise to continue the Treaty of the marriage full. Though it was said, the Prince was gone but a few days on his journey, when a Post went out to have flayed him, but it had been overtaxed. But whether it was so or no, it was Gods Providence that he came safely to his ships, and in them safely into England; arriving at Porismouth, where he was behold of the people, with no lefle gladness, than the Sun after a long Eclipse, and now his safe returning did both justify King James his judgement in suffering him to go, and the King of Spain's justice, in suffering him to comeback: and was caufe, that the people began to have a better opinion of the Spanishe faith, than they had before. But now it preently breaks out, that this match with Spain could never take effect: for King James having received Declarations of the Articles touching the marriage, found many very strict and large for exercise of the Catholicke Religion: but none at all for restitution of the Palatinate; which made him to much discontented, that he presently brake off all Treaty of the marriage, and signified as much, not only to the King of Spain, but to divers other Princes of Christendom: upon which break two great Points were presently made in consultation: One for preparing Forces for recovering the Palatinate by way of Arms, which could not be done by a way of friendship; and for this purpose, a Council of war was called, and a proposition resolved on both of men and money, for undertaking the enterprise: as also a great contribution by way of benevolence was collected; towards which, the compiler of this work, gave himself fifty pounds: as many other far greater sums, though the collection went not through the whole Land; by reason there was hope given of a peaceable reconcilement: fo as many that were not over-hasty in their payment escaped without contributing at all. The other point was for providing a fit Wife for the Prince, in some other place, It was said the States of Holland offered a very great portion in marriage to the Prince, if he would match with some Lady of that Country, but matches are made in Heaven, and there was a young Lady of France defirous to his bed: and for this purpose, the Earl of Car- lisle, and the Earl of Holland were sent into France, to treat of a marriage with the younger Daughters of the fourth, King of Franse deceased, and Siffer to the present King Louis, which marriage afterward took effect, but was not accomplished in King James his days; who dyed soon after the agreement.

It was now the year 1632, in which in Mi- chermaur Term, there was a Call of fifteen Ser- geants at Law, who kept their feast in the Middle Temple Hall.

A Treaty of Marriage with a Daughter of the King of Frane, which afterwards took effect.

Two things in this King's days grew to lose their Luster. One the Exercise of Titling, which in Queen Elizabeth's time, was so much used, that no year pasted without a special solemnity in that kind. The other, the Band of Gentle men Pensioners and Yeomen of the Guard; which in her time consisted of the choicest persons both for stature and other good parts throughout the Realm; and was so great a grace to her Court, that no Prince of Christendom could shew the like but King James was so intentive to Realities, that he little regarded them; and thereby both these in his time were not so neglected:
No solemnity for Arms, but very rare, no regard had what persons were admitted into the other places.

We may here observe, how the Surname of the Kings of England, hath at sundry times been changed. From William the Conqueror, to King Henry the second, what surname they had or whether they had any or no, is most uncertain: but then King Henry the second brought in the French surname of Plantagenet: which continued in all the succeeding Kings, till King Henry the fourth; and he brought in the Welsh surname of Tudor, which continued the surname of all the succeeding Princes, till King James the first of Scotland and he brought in the Scotch surname of Stewart: in which it is likely to continue, and God grant it may do so to the worlds end.

Some passages of small moment I confess are omitted by me in this reign of King James, as wherefor, for want of knowing the particulars, I dare not venture upon making the Relation: which if some men would have done, the Truth of our Chronicles should not have been mingled with so many fables.

Of his Taxation.

In his second year, in the month of September, he lent Privy Seals to the wealthy Citizens of London for money to be borrowed of them and in October he lent the Custom of Merchant Taylors, both outward and inward, were raised, and then were letten out to Farm. In a Parliament holden at Westminster, the third year of his Reign, there were given him three entire Subsidies, and six fifteens by the Temporality, and by the Clergy four entire Subsidies. This year also Henry Lord Mordant, convicted in the Star-chamber, for divers misprisions, was fined to pay ten thousand Marks, and Edward Lord Storton for the like offence to pay thirty thousand Pounds, and some years after Sir John Bennet, Judge of the Prerogative Court was fined to pay twenty thousand Pounds. In his fourth year he repayed threefourth thousand pounds to the Citizens of London, which the Londoners lent to Queen Elizabeth, three years before her death; an act by which he got more love, than he paid money. In his seventh year he had aid throughout England, for making his eldest Son Prince Henry Knight: which though they leyved with great moderation, brought him in great sums of money. In his eighteenth year, in a Parliament holden at Westminster, the Temporality gave him two Subsidies, and the Clergy three: and in another
The Reign of King James.

Out of these Heads, he drew and moved divers Points: One, that Confirmation might not be by Bishops only, but that every Pastor in his Parish might Confirm: But this was thought to trench too much upon the Jurisdictions of Bishops, and to be a step to bring in a Presbyterian Government, which the King much disliked; and the Bishop of Winchester challenged Dr. Reynolds with all his Learning to shew, where ever he had read, that Confirmation was at all used in ancient times, by any other than by Bishops. Another motion of Dr. Reynolds was, That there might be a new Translation of the Bible, because the present Translations were corrupt, and not answerable to the truth of the Original; whereof he alleged divers Examples; particularly that in the 105. Psal. 28. v. where it is said, They were not Obedient, when in the Original it is, They were not Disobedient: To this it was agreed, That a new Translation should be made: and accordingly a few Years after, was performed by the most learned Divines of the Kingdom, and is that which is now used. After many other Points more, Dr. Reynolds, he came at last to Subscription: Intreating it might not be exacted, as heretofore; which many good men refrained for these reasons: First, because the Apocryphal Books are by the Common Prayer Book appointed to be read; albeit in some of them there are manifest errors, directly repugnant to the Scriptures. To this, the King himself answered, That as he would not with all Canonical Books to be read in the Church, unless there were one to interpret; so he would with no Apocryphal to be read, wherein was any error: but for the other which were clear and correspondent to the Scriptures, he would have them read; seeing there was good use of them, to make up the story of the Persecution of the Jews; but withal he would have the people be taught, they should not be taught a man, either to sacrifice to the dead, or to kill himself. The next furious instance of subscription was, That in the Common Prayer Book it is twice for ever, Jesus said to his Disciples, when by the Original Text it is plain, He shall take to the Pharisees. To which it was answered, That for any thing could be gathered by the place, he might speak as well to thine as to the other: But the King for more plainnesses sake, willed, That the word Disciples should be omitted, and only the words Jesus said, to be pointed in a different letter, that it might appear to be no part of the Text.

Another tempest was, concerning the Cross in Baptism, which Doctor Reynolds contended to have ever been used since the Apostles time, at going abroad, or entering into the Church, or at their prayers and Benedictions; but doubted of the ancient use of it in Baptism: to which the Bishop of Winchester answered, that in Constantine's time it was used in Baptism, and the Dean of Westminster shewed out of Tertullian, Cyprian, Origines, and others, that in their time it was used in Immersion Baptism, which could be nothing but Baptism, and that the King, judged to be antiquity enough to warrant the continuance of it still. At last Master Kenafsley moved how far an Ordinance of the Church was to bind them, without impeachment of their Christian liberty: At which the King seem'd much moved, and told him,
the reign of king James.

Concerning the wearing of the Surplice.

It was now observed, that in all their Object
there was not a word spoken against Bishops, or against the King in Marriage; for Dr. Reynolds, himself confessed that the King was a very mea-ceremony; and the King affirmed he should not himself actively married, if he had not been in the presence of the Bishop: And as for Bishops, he declared himself to be very perjured, they were Divine Ordinations, and most necessary to Monarchy; and would often say, No Bishop, no King. Many other points were handled, as about Predestination, Atonement, and Remission of sins, Baptizing by women; about the words in Marriage,
With my body I thee forspew, the Oath Ex officio, the high Commission and some others in all which the King gave so good satisfaction, that they all joyfully promised to be quiet and obedient, now they knew it to be his mind to have it so; and the King was so admired for his excellent Resolutions and Answers, that the Archbishop of Canterbury said, undoubtedly his Majesty spake by the special assistance of God's Spirit. After this Conference, the King in his second year set forth a Proclamation, to confirm the Ecclesiastical Government, and the Book of Common Prayer, in the Form and Style as Queen Elizabeth left them.

After this he sent divers Learned Divines into Scotland, to have a Conference with the Divines there; and if it might be, to reduce the two Kingdoms to an uniformity of Religion, as he brought them to an Union of Poise: And now entering into consideration of this Title, of being Defender of the Faith: he conceived it might extend not only to his own Dominions, but in some sort to Neighbouring Countries; if not in Authority, at least in Care: and hereupon hearing that the States of the Low Countries were determined to entertain one Professor of Divinity in Leyden, and knowing, him, though otherwise a learned man, yet tainted with many erroneous opinions, concerning the "Effence and Substantiation of God, making him to be Quaestio abstrusa, changing Eternity into Divinitamentum, attaining Eternity to consist of a number of Ages,
and denying God to be Portus altis; but to rise in some sort aligned Divisores et Multiplicitates in eipsos; etiam Principium expulsam nutrimentorum.
He earnestly solicited the States, both by his own Letters, and by his Letters, Sir Ralph Winwood, by no means to admit the said Professor into that place; lest his doctrine having once infected their Country, might soon after spread it self into his Dominions. Which request of his,
after much soliciting, the States at length granted,
and expelled Professor from amongst them.

At this time a Synod was assembled at Dort in Holland, consisting of Learned Divines, sent from the Count Palatine of the Rhine, from Hulsber go armed from Switzerland, from the Church of Geneva, from Bern, Embden, Holland, Zealand, Drecht, Friesland and other Provinces: Some also from England, as namely, George Bishop of London, John Dowes Professor of Divinity in the University of Cambridge, Samuel Ward of Malling, and Mather Farrant in Cambridge, Thomas God Doctor of Divinity, and Walter Belchem of a Scotchman Batchelor of Divinity: Which Synod was Assembled to examine and determine the Doctrine of Arminius; first concerning Gods Predestination, Election, and Reprobation; then concerning Christ's death and Man's redemption by it; then concerning man's corruption and conversion to God: then concerning the perfections of God: In all which points the doctrine of Arminius was rejected, as also of Professor, and the true Doctrine by a general consent, together with the approbation of the Lord's the States;
which yet the Papists made little reackoning of;
that one of them in persons, made Echo to cen
ture it in this Diuht:

But who knows not, that ill will will never speak
well, and that nothing is so obvious in the mouth of an adversary, as scandals and incredibles.
In the year 1616, Mr. Annesio de Domini Archbishop of Spalato, in the Territory of Dalmatia, came into England, leaving his Country (as he affirmed) for Religion: whereas he set forth in writing many reasons, and being thereupon entertained by the Archbishop of Canterbury, was afterward made Dean of Windsor, and Mitter of the Stowe; in which time he preached publicly divers times before divers Lords of the Council, printed in London the first four of his Ten Books, intituled, Of the Commonwealth of the Church:
wherein with great exactness he maintained the Doctrine and Discipline of the Protestants: But after all this, whether all he had done was but dissembling from the beginning, or whether out remorse of conscience he repented him of what he had done; after five years paying his retrieved all he had paid or warranted before; which incensed King James, that he commanded him (within three days at his peril) to depart to the Realm:
Works of Piety done by this King, or by other in his time.

Structures of Piety King James made none at all, nor many of magnificence, only the great Banqueting House at White-hall; a wall of Brick about his Park at Greenwich, another at Theobalds, and some little buildings at Royston, and such like. His greatest charity was expressed by largesses and Pensions; as first, where the Gentlemen of his Chappell, being 33 in number, had each of them 30 pounds a year fee, he made it up 40. Then he enlarged the Pensions of his Alms Knights of Windsor, being 13 in number, from twelve pence a day to two shillings. Then he increased the Pension of the Yeomen of the Guard, from sixpence to two hundred, so he increased their Pensions, from two shillings a day, for three months in the Summer, to seven groats a day for six months in the Summer. Then, where at his coming, he found but only four Judges in the Courts of Law at Westminster, he added a fifth, with the like allowance as the former had; besides many other Pensions of like nature. But the works of Piety done by others in his time, were very many, whereby we may justly set in the first place, the repairing of Paul's Church, begun in his time, though not finished till many years after; a work of as great cost and labour, as the first founding of it: towards the furtherance whereof though many well devoted persons contributed liberally, yet none was more industrious, than the Learned Doctor Land, first Bishop of London, and after Archbishop of Canterbury; who also was a bountiful Benefactor to the College of Saint John's in Oxford, where he had his Education. Next to him his Predecessor next before him, the worthy George Abbot, Archbishop of Canterbury, founded a fair Almes-houe at Guilford in Surrey, where he was born, as likewise Robert the second Earl of Dorset, founded another in Sussex; to the maintenance whereof, he gave Lands to the value of three hundred pounds a year. But of all the Almes-houses that were ever founded in Chriftendom, there is none I think can parallel that of Thomas Sutton Esquire. This man born at Snayth in Lincolnshire, having always lived a Batchelor, and by frugality, and economy, being grown to great wealth, bought of the right Honourable Thomas Earl of Suffolk, his Mansion house, called the Charter-house, near to Smithfield in London, and cut of a pious mind, converted it into an Almshoue, by the name of Sutton's Hospital, endowing the same with above three thousand pounds of yearly rent: wherein are maintained fourscore poor men, with convenient Lodging, diet, and allowance of money for apparel: also forty poor children with the like provision, and a Grammar School, with a Master and Usher to teach them; over all whom, he ordained a Learned man to be Master of the house, and to be chosen by the Governors, who he appointed for the present, by the Authority of the Kings Letters Patent, to be George Archbishop of Canterbury, Thomas Lord Esquire, Lord Chancellor, Robert Earl of Salisbury, Lord Treasurer, John Byrde, Lord Treasurer, his first Bishop of Ely, Sir Edward Coke, Chief Justice of the Common-Plaees, Sir Thomas Foster, a Judge of the Common-Plaees, Sir Henry Hubbard, the Kings Attorney-General, Doctor Overall, Dean of Pauls, Doctor Mountain, Dean of Westminster, Henry Thynby, Esquire, Master of the Chancery, Richard Sutton Esquire, Auditor of the Impreffe, Jeffery Nightingall Esq; John Law, Gentleman, Thomas Brown Gentleman, and Master of the Houehold for the time being, to be always one; and as many of the other sixteen Governors should die, the Survivors to make present addition of others. Next to this was a fair Colledge in Oxford founded by Nicholas White Esquire, and called after his name. About this time also Edward Allen of Dunwich in Surrey founded a fair Hospital at Dunwich for six poor men, and six poor women; and for twelve poor Children, from the age of four to six years, and for eight Children, from the age of fourteen to sixteen, and to have a School-master with dyet, and a convenient stipend. This man may be an example, who having gotten his Wealth by Stage-playing, converted it to this Pious use, not without a kind of reputation to the Society of Players. In this Kings time also William Camden, King at Arms, founded an History Professor in Oxford, to which he gave the Manor of Bowley in Kent, which some
The Reign of King James.

In his first year, on the seven and twentieth of April, thirteen persons were slain by muskets at the Gun-powder Mill in Retiaries, and much other hurt done in divers places. This year also, the Plague in London was so fatal, that its time and twentieth of December 1612, to the two and twentieth of December following, three died in London, and the Liberties, eight and thirty thousand, two hundred and four and forty, whereof the Plague thirty thousand, five hundred three-score and eighteen, of them in one week three thousand four hundred and ten, where the next year after, though the City were encreased with great number of strangers, yet there died that year of all diseases, within London and the Liberties, but only four thousand two hundred three-score and three persons. In the second year of his Reign, a strange accident happened, to the terror of all bloody Murthiers, which was this; one Anne Waters enticed by a Lover of hers, contented to have her husband strangled, and then buried him secretly under the dung-hill in a Cow-house; whereupon the man being miffing by his Neighbours, and the Wife making chee of a wondering what was become of him; it pleased God, that one of the Inhabitants of the Town dreamed one night, that his prisoners in mind of then approaching death, with a Christian remembrance and exaltation; the next morning to toll the great Bell, from six o'clock to ten, and then to ring it out when the Execution should be past. He also established a free forgiving School in Christ's Hospital, for the better education of the poor children there; besides many other good deeds of Alms. About the same time Robert Peake of London Goldsmith, gave to Sepulchers Church a Communion Table of two yards long, and three quarters and a half broad, richly gilded over, and at every corner inborn with plates of silver. In this King's first year, William Jones of London Merchant, gave about eighteen thousand pounds to found a Free-School in Wex, where he was born, with Almes-houses and Penitentaries in London; and a hundred pounds a year forever to a learned Preacher in London, ordaining all things to be ordered by the Company of Haberdashers, wherein of himself was free. This year also the old notorious Gate called Aldersgate was taken quite down, and new built from the foundations toward the building whereof, William Parker, Merchant-Taylor of London, gave a thousand pounds. In this King's time also, was erected a Building next to Chefsy, with a purpose to be a College for Divines to study the Controversies of Religion, but upon second thoughts, the Cage indeed framed finished, but no Birds have ever yet been brought to sing in it, and perhaps never will. If any other Deeds of Alms, or publick benefit were done in this King's time, as perhaps there were many, the Reader may be pleased both here and in other Kings Reigns, to add them, as he meets with them; for partly to this end, I have digested this Chronicle into such several Heads and Chapters.

Of Casualties happening in his time.

On the fifteenth of June, 1614, dyed Henry Earl of Northampton, who built from the ground a house where Charing Cross, and dying was buried in the ancient Chappel of Dover Caffe, who in his life-time founded three fair Hospitals, and endowed them with large maintenance for ever, one at Rivington in Norfok for twelve poor women and a Governor, a second at Cram in Shropshire, for twelve poor men and a Governor: The third at Greenwich in Kent, for a Governor and twenty poor Alm-en. In this King's time also, Mafter Robert Dow of London Merchant-Taylor, gave a competent maintenance for ever into Sepulchers Parish, for the tolling of the great Bell, and for finding some Divine to come to the Prison of Newgate, the midnight before Execution, and then to ring a hard Bell, and to put the his neighbour Waters was strangled, and buried under the dung-hill in a Cow-house; and upon declaring his dream, several were made by the Constable, the dead body was found as he had dreamed: and thereupon the wife was apprehended, and upon examination, confessing the fact was burned. And now what hope can murthers have of being concealed, when they are subjeet to be discovered by any mans dream? The 19th of January in his third year, a great Petrurus was taken at Westbarn, in a small Creek, a mile and a half within the Land, and within few days of London, whose body was seen divers times above water, and judged to exceed the length of the large ship in the River: But when the tides of the fresh water, and scented the Land, they returned into the Sea. In his fourth year, being the year 1607, a mighty wind was brought in the Sea into the River of Severn, with such violence, that in some places of Somersetshire and Gloucestershire, the Waters in dives Towns and Villages, grew higher than the tops of their houses (so not withstanding all courtes that could be taken) there were drowned in Somersetshire 80 persons, and damages done to the value of twenty thousand pounds. At Coventry also, the seventh of April, a sudden flood came into the Suburbs and City, that in one hour it rose in some places above three yards in height to the great Damage and hurt of many; and which is as much strange, as it suddenly came; so it suddenly abated: so in four hours and a half, it both came and went away. In his 4th year being 1609, a frost began in December, which continued till April following, with such violence, that not only the Thames was frozen, that Carts loaded were driven over it as on dry land, but many Fowls and Birds perished; as also much hag in gardens, especially Artichokes and Rosemary were destroyed. This year also the 11th of April a Malt-house in the Town of St. Edmondsbury, being by chance set on fire, continued burning till it had consumed 160 houses: but by the Kings bounty, (giving 5,000 loads of timber) and the City of London aid, the Town was forthwith new built, in a fanner manner than it was before. In the year 1613, on the fourteenth of April in the Parish of Stendish in Lancashire a maiden child was born, having four legs, four arms, two bellies joined to one back: one head with two faces, the one before, the other behind, like the picture of Janus. This year also the 26th of June, in the Parish of Christ Church in Hampshire, one John Hichoel, a Carpenter, lying in bed with his wife and a young child by them, was himselfe and the child both burnt to death with a sudden lightning, no fire appearing outward upon him, and yet lay burning for the space of almost three days, till he was quite consumed to ashes. This year also on the seventh of April, the Town of Drochet was quite consumed with fire, begun in the house of Tallow Chandler, destroying all the houses except a few near the Church, and all their wares and goods, to the value of two hundred thousand pounds, yet not any man or woman perished. About the same time also the Play-house called the Globe upon the Bank-side near London, was quite consumed with fire by 624 diaching a piece of Ordinance and yet no man hurt: and about four years after, a new built Play-house, near Golding-lane called the Fortune, was hoosed by negligence of a candle, clean burnt down to the ground. In the year 1614, the Town of Stratford upon Avon, was burned. And left the water should be behind in doing of mischfe, so great inundations were at this time in North and Lincolnshire, that the Sea entered twelve miles into the Land. In the year 1614, on the 18 of November a blazing Star began to be seen in the South-east about five a clock in the morning, the flame or stream whereof, enclined towards the west. This comet, in the opinion of Dr. Breridges, the great Mathematician of Oxford, was as far above the Moon, as the Moon is above the Earth: what it portended is only known to God; but the sequel of it was, that infinite wretches and devotions followed it, both in Germany and other Countries. In the year 1623, on Friday the 24 of October, a Roman Catholic Priest preached in the afternoon, at Han- don house in the Black-Fryers in London, in an upper chamber, where there were assembled above 300 men and women, when about the middle of the Sermon, a great part of the Floor brake, and fell down with much violence, that it brake down the next floor under it in the fall whereof, were slain the Preacher, and almost one of his Auditors, besides as many more hurt. In this Kings time confidence, paper commonly called white brown paper was first made in England, especially in Surrey, and about Windsor.

H E married Anne, the Daughter of Fredericke the second, King of Denmark, whole marriage was there solemnized in the year 1589. By whom he had born in Scotland, two Sons, Henry who dyed before him, and Charles who succeed him in the Crown; and one Daughter named Elizabeth, married to Fredericke the third King of Denmark, of the same family, Count Palatine of the Rhine, by whom she had many children, both Sons and Daughters. King James had also by his Wife Queen Anne two other Daughters born in England, the Lady Mary, and the Lady Sophia, who both dyed young, the Lady Mary at about three years old, the Lady Sophia the next day after she was born; and were both of them buried with great solemnity, in the Chappell Royal at Westminster.

Of his Personage and Characters.

H E was of stature some what higher than ordinary, a well compacted body, of an auburn hair, of a full and pleasing Visage; in his later days inclining to be lean and bony; of bodily exercises, he took much delight in hunting; which yet (some thought) he used rather as a reasing himself from the importunity of State affairs, than for any great pleasure he took in it. It is said, that he had such a passion in riding, that it could not so properly be said he rid, as that this Horfe carried him; for he made but little use of his Bridle, and would say, a Horfe never flame, but when he was reined. He was of an admirable
The Reign of King James.

Before: but King James being dead, and his body opened, there was found no sign at all of poisons, or inward parts being all found, but that his Spleen was a little doubtful, which might be cause enough to cast him into an Ague: the ordinary high way, especially in old bodies, to a natural death: of this Ague after a Moneths languishing, notwithstanding all the remedies that could be applied, he departed this life at 7 o'clock, on the 27th of March; in the year 1625, in the 59th of his age; when he had Reigned two and twenty years complete; His body for the greater State, was conveyed by Torch light; from Theobalds to Denmark house, where having rested from the 23d of April, to the 7th of May, it was carried to Westminster, and there interred in the Chappel Royal, with great solemnity, but with greater lamentation; there being scarce any of the infinite multitude that was present, of whom it might not be said.

Multa grannis, larga quo humcella femina vultum.

Of Men of note in his time.

Military Men of Note, in a time of Peace, as the whole Reign of King James was, we have no reason to expect; yet if we look among the Voluntaries that went to the School of War in the Low Countries; we shall find a pair of brothers, that may stand in comparison with the greatest Souldiers in the most Martial times, St. Francis Vere, who as another Hannibal, with his one eye, could see more in the Martial Discipline, than common men can do with two; and St. Horatio Vere, who as another Philopamens, contained in a very little body, a very great both skill and courage. But for men of Note in learning, as being in the time of a most learned Prince, there was never greater flower; of whom there are for example. In Curiosity of Preaching, there was Doctor Andrew Bishop of Winchester, who hath left to posterity, a Colour of such golden Sermons, that these, as well as the name of Chrysostom, that he had it. In multiplicity of reading, there was Doctor Reynolds of Corpus Christi Colledge in Oxford; who seemd, as it were, a Living Library; and one would have thought his Memory to be a perfect Index of all the Books ever been written. In knowledge of Law, there was Sir Edward Coke, Chief new Lawyers, Sir Francis Bacon, Chief new Lawyers, Sir Edward Coke, and seems as another Barbois or Baldois amongst us.

In elegancy of Writing, there was Sir Francis Bacon, Viscount St. Albans, who besides his profound Books of Novum Organum, hath written the Reign of King Henry the Seventh, in twelve fable, that like Manas, it pleeth the taste of all palates. In the skill of Antiquities, there was William Camden, King at Arms; who hath set forth with the Description of Rome, and the life of Queen Elizabeth in so lively colours, that it seems to have brought Britain out of darknes into light, and to keep Queen Elizabeth alive after death. And to speak it in a word, the Trojan Horse was not fuller of Hercules Grievous, than King James his Reign was full of men, excellent in all kindes of Learning. And here I desire the Readers leave to remember two of my own old acquaintance, the
Of the English Plantations in the Indies, that were in King James's time.

And now we are come to a time, wherein we may very near lay as much of King James as was laid of Augustinus Caesar; Super & Germanias & Indies profuse Impression; and in better, than where Augustus did it by the violent way of Arms, King James did it by the civil way of Plantations: for in his days began the great Plantation of the English in the Indies; and must be acknowledged the proper effect of his peaceable Government. The first Plantation of the English in the Indies; was that which is now called Virginia, in memory of the Virgin Queen Elizabeth; but called before Wingandacoa. It was first discovered by Sir Walter Raleigh, in the year 1584, to whom the first Letters Patents were granted for making a Plantation there: but yet no Colony was sent thither, till the year 1607. It is a Country in America, between the degrees of 34 and 45 of the North Latitude: but that part of it which is planted by the English, is under the Degrees of 37, 38, and 39. It is 1000 miles, as many have imagined, but a part of the Continent adjoining to Florida. The first and chief Town made here by the English, is called Jamestown, in honour of the King most excellent Majesty. It is a Country abounding with all sorts of Fruits and Fowl; so fruitful, that it yields thirty, and sometimes forty Bathels of Corn upon an Acre: and that (which is to us more strange) hath three harvests in a year, the Combeing sowed, ripe, and reaped, in little more than two months. Many Plantations had been attempted here before, but came to nothing: the first to any purpose was in the year 1607, under the Conquest of Captain Gains, John Smith, and Mr. Edward Maria Winfield, who carried a Colony thither of a hundred persons, but of these, many dying of sickness, or slain by the Savages, a new supply came in the year 1608. of a hundred and twenty persons, under the conduct of Captain Nisfan. After which, it was sent another supply of three score and ten persons; and in the year 1609, a third supply came of five hundred persons, under a Patent granted to Sir Thomas Woff, Lord de la Ware, but conducted thither by Sir Thomas Gates, Sir George Summer, and others. In the year 1611, was a fourth supply of three hundred men under the conduct of Sir Thomas Gates. In the year 1612, two other supplies were sent of forty men each, and now was the Lottery spoken of before granted by the King, for further Supplies of this Plantation. After this Matter Samuel Argell being appointed Governor in the year 1618, the Lord de la Ware came thither with a supply of two hundred people; but in his stay there dyed: After this in the year 1620, were sent thither eleven Ships, with twelve hundred and fourteen persons, and now they founded themselves into Corporations: In the year 1621, Sir Francis Wits was sent thither Governor, with thirteen hundred men, women, and children, and now they founded Schools, and Courts of Justice; and the Plantation was extended a hundred and forty miles up, on the River of both sides. But now when the English were leisure, and thought of nothing but peace, the Savages came suddenly upon them, and slew of them three hundred and seven and forty men, women, and children. For repairing of which lofe, the City of London sent presently over a supply of a hundred men. This mischief happened, by reason they had built their Plantations remote from one another, in above thirty several Places, which made them, when upon occasion, to reduce them all to five or six places, by which time they may better afift each other; since which time they have always lived in good security. And thus much for Virginia.

Next was the Plantation of the Island called Bermudas, so called of a Spanish Ship, called Berwald, which was there cast away, carrying Hogs to the West-Indies, that Iwan a flour, and there increased. The first English man that enter'd this Isle, was one Henry May in the year 1591, but in the year 1610, Sir George Somers was sent thither, who dying there, in memory of his name, the Isles have ever since been called Somers Iles. In the year 1612, one Mr. Moor landed there with 60 persons, and then builded the chief Town there called S. Georges, together with 8 or 9 Forts. The same year a supply of 30 more persons was sent thither, and the year after 60 more, under one Mr. Barlet; with a ship to convey the land, but with a purpose indeed to get from thence a great lump of Ambergris, and no less than 80 pound weight that had been found and taken up in the Island some few years before, and was still retained. A while after this, came a Ship called the Blessings, with 100 passengers, and two days after came the Star, with 80 more; and within 14 days after that again came thither the Margarita and two Frigates, with 150 passengers: So as now they begin to divide the Country into Tribes, and the Tribes into houses. In the year 1616, Captain Daniel Tucker was sent from Virginia to be Governor there, and now it began indeed to be a Plantation; for now they begin to build them houses; and now was sent from thence into England, a Ship fraughted with 30000 weight of Tobacco, valued there but at £5 6d, the pound, though sold here oftentimes for sixpence at great rates. In the year 1619, Captain Nathaniel Nunn,

In his eleventh year, Lewis Stewart Duke of Lenox was made Earl of Richmond, and after Duke of Richmond.

In his thirteenth year, on the 29th of June, Sir James Hay of Scotland was created Baron of Semy, and about three years after, was made Viscount Doncaster, and Sir Robert Dormer was created Baron of Byng, (afterward by King Charles was made Earl of Carnarvon.)

In his fourteenth year, on the 9th of July, Sir John Holyo Knight was created Baron Hanbury of Hanbury in the County of Nottingham, and Sir John Perer of Kent, was made Baron of Trent; and on the 17th of August, Sir George Villiers was created Baron of Whaddon, and Viscount Villiers; and on the 7th of November, Thomas Egerton Lord Ellesmere was created Viscount Buckingham, and he dying soon after, his Son John was created Earl of Bridgewater; William Lord Kinmore was created Viscount Wellingford; and Sir Philip Stanhope was created Baron of Shiforld: On the 5th of January, the Viscount Villiers was created Earl of Buckingham, and on the third of March, Sir Edward Noel of Rutland, was made Baron of Riddington.

In his fifteenth year, on New-year's day, Sir George Villiers Earl of Buckingham, was created Marquise of Buckingham; and on the 12th of July, Sir Francis Bacon Lord Chancellor of England, was created Baron of Verulam, and Viscount Devonshire; and after Viscount Saint Albans. Also in the Summer of this year, the King created four Earls and one Countesse; namely, the Viscount Liske was made Earl of Leicesters, the Lord Compton was made Earl of Northampton, the Lord Rich was made Earl of Warwick, the Lord Cavendish was made Earl of Devonshire, and the Lady Compton was made Viscountess to Sir Thomas Compton, and mother of the Marquise of Buckingham was created Countesse of Buckingham.

In his sixteenth year, on the 25th of November, Sir John Digby Vice chamberlaine to the King, was created Baron of Sherborne, by Patent to him and his heirs males.

In his seventeenth year, in the moneth of June, Esme Stewart Lord d'Asbigno, younger Brother to the Duke of Lenox, was created Earl of March, and Marquise Hamilton was created Earl of Cambridge, and Sir John Villiers, Brother to the Marquise of Buckingham was created Baron of Stack and Viscount Purbol.

In his eighteenth year, William Cavendish was created Viscount Mansfield: (afterward by King Charles made Earl of Newcastle) and on Monday the fourth of December, Sir Henry Mounagae, being first made Lord Treasurer, was created Baron of Kimbolton, and Viscount Mandeville, and not long after Earl of Manchester, and Sir John Rawley Viscount Had-dington of Scotland was created Earl of Holderness, and William Fielding was created Baron of Newark, and Viscount Fielding.

In his nineteenth year, Henry Cary was made Lord Cary of Lepington, (afterward by King Charles made Earl of Monmouth) Sir Edward Montague Elder Brother to the Viscount Mandeville was made Baron of Boulton, the Lord Dares of Evesham was created Viscount Colchester (afterward by King Charles made Earl of Kent), the Lord Hunsdon was created Viscount Rochford, (afterward by King Charles made Earl of Devon) Sir Lynley Cranfield, Master of the Rolls, was created Baron Cranfield in Richmond; and Sir Thomas Howard second son to James Earl of Suffolk, was created Baron of Charleton, and Viscount Andover, (afterward by King Charles made Earl of Buckingham.)

In his twentieth year, in the moneth of September, the Viscount Doncaster was created Earl of Carliile, the Viscount Fielding was created Earl of Denbigh, the Lord Digby was made Earl of Bridgewater, the Lord Cranfield was created Earl of Middlesex, and Sir Henry Rich was made Baron of Kennington.

In his one and twentieth year, the Marquise of Buckingham being then in Spain with Prince Charles, had his Patent sent him to be Duke of Buckingham; William Grey was created Baron of Wark, Elizabeth the widow of Sir Myles Finch of Kent, was created Viscountesses Maidstone, (afterward by King Charles made Countess of Winchesters.)

In the two and twentieth year, the Earl of Clancys, of Ireland, was created Viscount Furnebridge in Kent (afterward by King Charles made Earl of Saint Albans.) Sir John Holyo Knight, Baron Haughton of Haughton was created Earl of Clute, Sir Henry Rich Baron of Kennington was created Earl of Holland, the Lord Fines, Baron of Say and Seale, was made Viscount Say and Seale; Sir Francis Fans was created Earl of Wiltshere, Oliver Lord St. John of Bletho was made Earl of Buckenbrooke, Sir Christopher Villiers, Brother to the Duke of Buckingham, was made Earl of Anglesey, and Sir James Ley was made Lord Ley (afterward by King Charles made Earl of Marlborough.) Also this year, Sir Francis Leicester, was made Baron of Desmonton, and Sir Richard Roberts was made Lord Roberts of Tremor in Cornwall.

And this was the number of all the Earls and Barons made by King James; but in his time also began another form of Nobility to be made in England, which had none of the privileges of English Barons, but had only Title to be called Lords of some place either in England or Ireland, although they possessed not a foot of Land in either. Of which sort, the number being great; I forbear to rehearse them, lest I should be tedious, or otherwise be thought to encroach too much upon the Herald's Office. It is sufficient to have shewed, that King James advanced so many in honour, that in a kind it might be said of him, as was said of Augustus Caesar, That he left Rome of Marble, which he found but of Brick.

THE REIGN OF King Charles the First.

King James being deceased on the 27th of March in the forenoon, the same days in the afternoon, Charles Prince of Wales, his only Son, then living, and Ireland, with the general Acclamation of all sorts of people, as being a Prince of admirable endowments both of Mind and Body. He was now about the age of 35 years, whereof the most part of one he had spent in Spain; where, although he was frustrated of the end for which he went, yet it gave him a tincture of Travel and Experience, more worth, perhaps, than that he went for.

The Funerals of the deceased King were celebrated on the seventh of May, his body being brought from Somerset-House to Westminster, where St. Peter's Church, he was with great magnificence interr'd; the King himself being principal Mourner; which, though it was contrary to the custom of his Predecessors, yet he chose rather to express his Piety, in attending the Body of his Father at his Funeral, than to perform upon any old niceties and points of State.

The first thing he did after the celebration of the Funeral, was to hasten the coming over of the Queen, to whom on Sunday the first of May, he was by his Proxy, the Duke of Cheverton, espoused at St. Peter's Church in Paris; where the Espousals were performed by the Cardinal of Richleau.

A while after the Queen began her journey towards England, accompanied to Amiens, with the Queen her Mother, the Duke of Orleans her Brother, and the Duke and Duchesses of Cheverton, with others of the Nobility of France, and she was attended by the Duke of Buckingham, and the Earls of Carlisle, Holland, and Montgomery, and many of the English Gentry, who were sent over for that purpose.

The Queen flaid a fortnight at Amiens, and there she parted with her Mother; from thence she went to Béthune, where a Fleet of one and twenty of the King's Ships attended her, with the Counts of Buckingham and a Noble Train of Ladies.

On Trinity Sunday, late at night, she arrived at Dover, which being signified to the King (then at Canterbury) he went to her early the next morning, and received her with the greatest demonstrations of affection; and the same day they came to Canterbury, where their Nuptials were with all possible magnificence completed, and the Duke of Cheverton surrendered his Royal Charge to the King. On Wednesday the fifteenth of June, they went by Coach to Gravesend, and the next day they came thence to Somerset-House in their Royal Barges, attended with a very numerous Train of Lords and Ladies, and welcomed as they passed, by the great Ordinance from several Ships in the River, and the Tower of London, and accompanied or met by most of the Barges and Boats which could be found on the River of Thames.

The third day after their arrival, their marriage was declared at Whiter-hall, with great aclamations of joy, the King and Queen presenting themselves in that Ceremony, on Royal Thrones before the Nobility: but the Pachelmence began to rage in London at this time, which abated much of the Pomp of the Solemnity; though neither that, nor any thing else did divert the King from the consideration of the other concerns of the Kingdom; for, having summoned a Parliament to meet on the eighteenth of June, at the first assembly thereof he spake to them in these words:

My Lords and Gentlemen:

"You are not ignorant that at your earnest intreaty, March 25, 1623, my Father, "of happy memory, first took up Arms for the "recovery of the Palatinate; for which purpose," by your assistance, he began to form a considerable Army, and to prepare a goodly Armado and Navio Royal. But Death intervening between him and the Achievement, the War with the Crown is devolved upon me; to the prosecution whereof, as I am obliged both in Nature and Honour, so I question not, but in the same necessity continuing, you will cheer the Action with the like affection, and further it with a ready contribution. True it is, you furnished My Father with effectual Supplies, but they held no Symmetry or Proportion with the Charge of so great an Enterprise. For those your Donatives are all burdensome to a penny, and I am enforced to summon you bither, to tell you, That neither can the Army advance, nor the Fleet set forth, without further aid. Consider, I pray you, that the eyes of all Europe are first upon me, to whom I shall appear ridiculous, as though I were unable to outgo Master and Oilstati on, if you now desert me. Consider it is my first attempt, wherein if I fail I a sole, it will blight all my future Honour. If Mine cannot, let your reputation move you, deliver and expedite me fairly out of this War, where I have you encombed. (Let it never be said with regard to you that I have deceived me.) I desire therefore your speedy supply. The Sun, if you know, is entering into his declining point, so it will be soon too late to set forth, when it will be rather too soon to return. Again, I must mind you of the Mortality reigning in this City, which should it (as it may, and to no breach of Privilege neither) arrive any one Member of either Houfe, it would soon put a period, both to the Conflagration and Session, so that your own Periclitation necessitates an early revolution. In summe, Three of the best Rhetoricians, Honour, Opportunity, and Safety, are all of a Plot, and plead, you see, for Expedition. Perhaps it may be expected I should say something in way of account of My Religion, as also of the tender and tenure of my future Government. But, as I hope, I have not been guilty of any thing which may justly start the least question in either, so I defire you would repose in this assurance, that I will in neither vary from those Principles, wherein I have been infituted at the feet of that eminent Gunwate My late Father.

This Speech was very well receiv'd, and though it did not produce so great a Supply, as the exigence of Affairs required, yet the Commons gave two Subsidies without any Condition, and the Clergy three; and in the Grant of the Layety, the Papists were to pay double.

The King very gratiously accepted the gift, as an earnest of the good affections of his people, in reference to greater summs which he expected to follow; but the Plague encroaching in London, the Parliament, on the eleventh of July, was adjourned to Oxford, to be held there on the first of August. The Commons had that up a Bill for Tonnage and Poundage to the Lords before the Adjournment; but because it was limited to a year, they thought it unfit to pass; for that most of the former Grants to the Kings Predecessors were for term of life. The cause of this August was, because the Customs had been raised by King James, by advice of his Council, in the eighteenth year of his Reign, and the Commons had a purpose to reduce them to the rate fixed in Queen Mary's time.

August the first, the Parliament assembled at The King's Oxford, and in the fourth of the fame Moneth, Speech to both Houses, by the Kings appointment, attended him at Christ-Church-hall, where he briefly acquainted them with his wants for getting out the Fleet, adding, that the eyes of the Confederates were fixt upon it.

The Commons upon their return from the King to their House, had several long Debates upon the subsidence of his Speech, and the present Condition of the Kingdom, all tending to an Arrangement of the Government. Some urged that our Necessities arose from the want of Parliament; That the Kings designs were guided by evil Counsels, and, that though a former Parliament engaged the King in a War; yet if things were managed by contrary designs, and the Treasury misemployed, this Parliament was not bound to be carried blindfold in designs not guided by sound Counsell; and that it was unwise to grant Subsidies upon Subsidies, before Grievances were redress'd, and before they would agree to any answer to what the King proposed, (upon some jealousies that the Papist Religion was too much counteracted) they framed a Petition against Popish Recusants, which was presented to him by their Speaker, attended by all the House of Commons, which was read and displeased at this day, and the Parliament received from him a very gratious and satisfactory answer to their Petition; nevertheless this kindnees did not produce answerable effects: For, when the matters of supply came to be again debated by the Commons, great division arose, some would give, and others would not, and the majority were prevailed on by many passionate intonations of mis-government, to infringe on redress of Grievances before Supply, and to have a Remonstrance thereof drawn up, and presented to the King, inveighing in their Speeches against the Duke of Buckingham, as the chief occasion of all miscarriages in Government. Nothing more than this could shew the mutability of humane Affairs, and how little dependance is to be laid on the affections of the people; for in the last Part of the king James, this Duke of Buckingham, against whom they now exclaimed, was enrolled for the great Ornament and Honour of the English Nation, and the chief preserver of the Kingdom from the Spanish plotters; nay, no Honour was thought large enough to require his Merits. The King, from those of his Council in the House of Commons, had advice from time to time of the matter of this Remonstrance, in the debates of it, which tended chiefly to discredit the Duke, and remove him from his Counsels and Affection; but the expressions were so sharp, and the style so usual from Subject to their Prince, that the King determined rather to dissolve the Parliament, than admit of it; and thereupon he came to the Lords House, to put an end to it. The House of Commons were Resolved into a Grand Committee, when the Ulster of the Black Rod came to call them up to the Lords House, in order to a Dissolution, but before they would admit the Speaker to resume the Chair, to sit as a House, one Glanvill stood up and declared the tenor of the House in these words:

First, to give His Majesty thanks for His Gracious Answer to our Petition for Religion.

Next, for His care of our Health, in giving us leave to depart this dangerous time.

Lastly, a declarative declaration of our Affection and Loyalty, and purpose to supply His Majesty in a Parliamentary way, in a fitting and convenient time.

This being done, the Usher was called in, and declared his Message, and the dissolution of the Parliament immediately ensued.

Soon after this, a Proclamation was set out, to put the Laws in execution against POPISH Recusants, commanding the return, by a prefixed time, of children of Nobilemen and others, sent to be educated in POPISH Schools, or Seminaries abroad; and all of the Kings Subjects under the pay of the Emperor, the King of Spain, and the Arch-Duchies who then governed the Spanish Netherlands, were speedily enjoined to return to their native Countries, to be employed in the Kings Service.

The Term, because of the Plague in LONDON, was kept at Reading, and special Instructions were given to the Judges, to put the Laws in execution against Recusants. And now the War with Spain, for the recovery of the Palatinate, which was resolved on in the last year of his Fathers Reign, was vigorously prosecuted; and the Duke of Buckingham and the Earl of Holland were sent Embassadors to the United Provinces, where they met at the Hague the Embassadors of France and Denmark, and concluded a League with them and the States, for reforming the Liberties of Germany. The King of Denmark, in conformity with the League, took up Arms, but was unfortunate therein, which he imputed to the Kings not performance of what was promised on his part, and that was occasioned by the Parliaments failure of supplies of money. And for the same reason the Fleet, which should have been set out in the beginning of Summer, to attempt something on the coast of Spain, were not out till October following. In which Expedition the VICEADMIRAL WILMELTON was General of the Land Forces and the Earl of Essex Vice-Admiral of the Navy.

The Fleet, with the addition of some Dutch Vessels, consisted of Eighty good Ships; at their first setting forth, they were encountered with so violent a Storm, that the greatest part of them were dispersed and scattered for seven days together, and a gallant Ship, called the Long Robert of Ipswich, with an hundred and forty persons in it, were lost. After this Tempest, the Fleet met at the Southern Cape, where they entered into Confinement, what they should attempt; the Earl of Essex, out of a great deference to equal the glory of his Father gotten at Cadiz, proposed the sailing of the Spanish Fleet, which then lay in that Harbour, but there were so many difficulties in the Enterprize, and so long time spent in the debate of it, that the whole Coast of Spain was thereby alarm'd, and the Spaniards had opportunity to prepare for their defence: so that when it was concluded, that they should fall to Cadiz, they landed their men there with great danger and opposition. The first place they attempted was Panetor Castle, under the shelter whereof the Spanish Ships rode; for the taking of which, twenty English and five Dutch Ships were ordered; but they, after the expend ing of two thousand great Shot against it to little purpose, came off again. This not succeeding, WILMELTON sent Sir John BURROUGHS, with a select Regiment of Foot, to attack the Fort on the land side, but at the first appearance, were encountered by some Spanish Forces, which were drawn together for the defence of the Country, and after a sharp Engagement, they worsted the Spaniards in sight of the Castle; whereupon the Commander within it, hung out a white Flag; and after a short Parley, surrendered the place, with fifteen Breeches of Powder, and eight pieces of Ordnance; whilst this was doing, the Spaniard halted most of their best Ships, under the Port-Royal, so that Sir Samuel ARGYLE, who was sent to fire the Ships was disappointed of his purpose. But that which might have been very fatal herein, was the misgovernment of the Sou diers, who by the avarice, or negligence of their Commanders, were permitted to fill themselves so much with the Wine they found in the Cellars, and other places where they plundered, that they were more like beasts than men, and if the Spaniards had had good Intelligence, they might have been all cut off; for by this means they were so ungovernable, that the General fearing the consequence thereof, speedily caust them to be embarked and left behind him the hopes only of renown and Victory. From thence they failed to the Southern Cape; where they stayed twenty days, in expectation of the Plate Fleet, but by the inclemency of the Air, and the insufficiency of the Sou diers and Mariners, to great a Contagion happened in the Fleet, that they wanted men to manage the Ships; and where some Ships had a greater number of infected persons then others, to remedy this, a most pernicious course was taken; for every Ship was ordered by lot, to take in two sick in exchange for so many found men, which propagated the Pesteiline, and forced the General to an untimely return, four days before the Plate Fleet came.

The unpromising success of this Fleet displeased the King very much, and WILMELTON was some time prohibited his presence, but he excused himself, laying a great part of the miscarriage on the stubbornness of the Earl of Essex. Yet, though all were blamed, none were punished for the ill management and conduct of the Expedition.

The War became now very chargeable, and since the King could not be supplied in a Parliamentary way, he was advised by his Council, to use other means, and it was resolved to borrow what money could be got by Letters of Privy Seals, sent to several of the ablest persons in all parts of the Kingdom; in each of which Letters, the King promised in the name of himself, and his Successors, to repay the money within eighteen months after the payment thereof. To be repaid in 18 months.
The Reign of King Charles the First.

The Collector, and the Collectors of this loan were ordered to pay the sums received into the Exchequer, and to return the names of such as went about to delay, or excuse the payment of the money required of them.

This manner of proceeding was thought very improper, unless it had been resolved not to call a Parliament to meet; for if the King in that conjuncture had clapt up a peace with Spain (which the Spaniard had as much reason to accept, as he to offer) he might have freed himself from the necessity of calling Parliaments; (till by the goodnes of his Government he had no necessity for a Parliament to work upon) and likewise prevented a following unliecky rupture betwixt him and France. The King, however, was resolved to try his fortune in another Parliament, which was summoned to meet at Westminster on the sixth of February; but first the Solemnities of the Coronation were to be performed, which was celebrated on the second of February (commonly called Candlemas day.) In the external pomp whereof, the King omitted his triumphal riding through the City, from the Tower to Whitehall, partly to save the Charges there, and partly to prevent the danger of popular concourse; for the Plague was not quite decreased, but some dregs remained of it. In the Sacred part there was a clause added, which had been pretermitted in the time of King Henry the Sixth, which is this that followeth, &c. "Let him obtain favour of the people, like Aaron in the Tabernacle, Elias in the Waters, Zacharias, &c. in the Temple; Give him Peter, Key of Discipline, and Paul's Doctrine. Which clause had been omitted in time of Popery, as intimating more Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction to be given to our Kings than the Popes allowed of."

The Coronation Oath, though the contrary was suggested, was the same which had been taken by his Predecessors, as appears by the Records of the Exchequer.

The Solemnity being over, he began his second Parliament on the sixth of February, in which he had no better success than in his first. Sir Hugh Finch was chosen Speaker by the Commons, and approved by the King, a person of great prudence and moderation. The House of Commons began where they left at Oxford, with matters of Religion and publick Grievances; they made strict enquiry into what abuses had been of the Kings Grace since that time, and who were the Authors and Abettors thereof; for they had been informed of many Pardons and Reprieves to Felons and Priests, and their grievances were stated under four Heads.

1. The State of the King in the confiscation of the Crown.
2. The condition of the Subject in his Freedom.
3. The cause of the Nations good success in former times.
4. The present condition of the Kingdom.

Under the first head was considered the great dispositions of Lands and Penions made most, and other exorbitant expenses; in the second, the bringing in of new Impositions, the multiplying of Monopolies, and the levying of Tonnage and Poundage without an Act of Parliament. Under the third, they ascribed the great 627 renown and reputation of our Nation in former times, to the wisdom and gravity of the Consultants, when nothing was ordered but by publick debate; and whence arose a readiness in the Subject to stilt their Sovereign in purfe and person. In the fourth was represented the loss of the Nations wanted Reputation in the Expedition of Cadiz, and others; which was imputed to the want of such Counsellors as were heretofore used, forasmuch as men though difference in success were backward to adventure either their persons or their purses.

Whilesthefore debates were agitated by the Earl of Arundel, the Earl of Arundel was by the King committed to the Tower, because of a Marriage confirmed betwixt the Lord Maurice and his Eldest Son, and the Eldest Sister of the Duke of Lenox, one near allied in blood to the King; for the King had design'd to marry her to the Lord of Lenox, the Eldest Son to the Earl of Argyll, a man of great power in Scotland, meditating thereby to reconcile those two Families, who had been antiently in Feuds. The Earl thought the King pardon, and protested his innocence, as no way privy to the business, being contrived by the Dutchers Dowager, and his Counsellor, without his knowledge; but the King would not hear him.

This commitment of the Earl was resented by the House of Peers, who petitioned the King, That it is their undoubted Right, that no Peer sitting in Parliament is to be imprisoned, without Order from the House of Peers, unless it be for Treason, Felony, or refusing to give Secrecy for the Peace. And they insisted the more on this Privilege at this time, because the Earl had fix Proxies deputed to him which would be of no validity during his imprisonment.

Upon this Petition many debates passed in the House of Lords upon several Messages of the King about this Privilege, which lasted from the fourteenth of March, to the eighth of June, and was he was satisfied with the Reasons of the Peers; and then the Earl was released from his imprisonment.

Whilesthefore matters were agitated at home, to make the difference greater between the Dutch and the Spaniard, and for further promoting that War, the King of France did conclude a Little Treaty in the Hague, by the Baron of Contep, concerning the equiping of a Fleet of twenty Ships under the Admiral Hautain, upon a design to strengthen Genoa by Water, whilesthe Contable des Dequiers should be able to do the fame by Land; and the English Embassador then Resident at London, had obtained of the King the Vantguards of one of the Navy-Ships, and fix Merchant Ships to be employed in the same Expedition; but shortly after these English Ships were received into the pay of France, Moniteur de Souliez, taking advantage of the French Armies advance towards Italy, instigated five of Rochet to fix against the King, and he with some Ships he had got together, fixed on the Isle of Rho, and some of the King's Ships in the Harbour. At this the King was so incensed, that he turn'd his design for Italy upon Rochet; and thatoccasioned another Treaty at the Hague, with the Hebrorders.
The Reign of King CHARLES the First.

1. Whether the King hath not left the Regali y of the Narrow Seas, since the Duke became Admiral?
2. Whether bis not going as Admiral in this last Fleet, was not the cause of the ill success?
3. Whether the King's Revenue hath not been impair'd through his immense Literality?
4. Whether he hath not engrossed all Offices, and preferred his kindred to unfit places?
5. Whether he hath not made false of places of Judicature?
6. Whether Reprisals have not dependence up on bis Mother and Father-in-law?

Neither was this the only thing which displeas ed the King, at this Time in the proceedings of the Commons. They had sent Committees to the Sweat-Office, to search for Originals of his Letters for reprieving some Priests condemned at York, and when Sir Richard Weten Chancel lour of the Exchequer, brought a Message to them from bis, for supply, acquainting them, that the Fleet was returned, Victuall spent, and the gentlemen in great necessity, and ready to mutiny for want of pay, and that a Fleet of 40 Ships which were ready to go out, could not move without money, and that the Army on the Sea Coasts, was in want both of Victuall and Cloaths. They were not prevailed on, but one Mr. Clement Cook amongst other Invesitives, said, It was bet ter to die by a foreign Enemy, then to be destroyed at home.

This high temper of the Commons Houfe,
was a Subject of much discourse at this time; it was said, The Parliament is a very excellent constitution, but it is without its inconveniences, as all others are; and amongst these, the great licens of Speech in the Houfe of Commons is not the least; for though it be even necessary, that they should not be debaunted of Liberty, yet, that in the intention seems not to be boundless;
for at all times the SEAL for Reformation of abu ses in that House, being very great, those a mongst them that have a facility of eloquent Speaking, may do great hurt, if they be not well inclined to the Government. But, those that thought the Courts, so long plain and safe, some what too envious, believed this freedom of Speech very necessary.

And at this time whether it were out of a ge neral envy against the Duke, because of his fud dan extraition to Greatness, or a particular dif gust of some that thought they merited (as well as he) a greater share then they had in the Kings favor; the Tide against him in both the Houfe (but especially in the House of Commons) ran so high, that nothing would be granted to the King at a lower rate than his rage. In the mean time the King manifested a great displeasure at those proceedings, and sent Sir Richard Weten to demand satisfaction; in which they not an swering his expectation by so sudden an inquisi tion as he required, he called the Lords and them together, and by the Lord Keeper Covent ry (who lately had sealed the given to him, up on the disgrace of williams Bishop of Linocn who was displaced) he acquainted them with his mind.

MY Lords, and you the Knights, Citi zens and Burgales of the Houfe of Com mons, His Majesties Command hath comma ned you hither, and the fame Command has put upon the service of signifying his will to you. His will was, that both Houfe should be called together; You, my Lords, as Witneffes of the Justice of his resolutions,
and
of his address to the House of Commons. His Majesty would have you know, there never was King, who better loved his people, or was more sincerely affected towards the right ufe of Parliaments, or more ready to redrefs what shall be represented to him, in the quality of Grievances (provided it be in a regular and decent way,) then Himself; but he would also have you know, That, as He loves His People, fo he regards His Honour; and if He be fensible of His Subjects grievances, of His self, more, especilly when they flow from offences of threfh nature, as not only blaff His Reputation, but impede the progress of His Weighty Affairs.

"To come to Particulars, His Majestys faith, That whereas Doctor Turner, and Mr. Cook spoke very SEDITIOUS WORDS in your Houfe, they were so far from being QUESTIONS.

Sir Richard Weten message for money.
This speech caused great emotion in the 6 2 6

House of Commons, and produced a Remonstrance, to this effect. (viz.)

That with extreme joy & comfort they acknowledg the favour of his Majestie, and great pleasure extrication of affection to his People, & true intent of a Remonstrance. That concerning Mr. Cooke, true it is, he jet fall some few words, that might admit an ill construction, and that the House was displeased therewith, as they declared by a general Check at the very time he spoke them, and though Mr. Cooke explained of his mind more clearly, did somewhat abate the offence of the House, yet were they resolved to take it further consideration, and so have done, the effect whereof had appeare this, had they not been interrupted by this his Majesties message, and the like interruption befall them also in the busines of Doctor Turner.

As concerning the examination of the Letters of his Secretary of State, as also of his Majesties own, and searching the Signet Office, and other records; they had done nothing therein, not warranted by the precedents of former Parliaments upon the like occasions.

That concerning the Duke, they did humbly beseech his Majestie to be informed, that it has been the constant and unblown usage of Parliament to insist, and complain of any person of what degree soever, and what they should do in relation to him, they little doubted but it should redound to the honour of the Crown, and safety of the Kingdom,

Lastly, as to the matter of Supply; That if addition may be made of other things, importing his Service then in consideration amongst them, they were resolved so to supply him, as might evidence the truth of their intentions, might make him safe at home, and forbad abroad.

To this the King answered briefly; That he would have them in the first place construe about the Kings matters of the greatest importance, and that they should have time enough for other matters afterward. But this was not their progress against the Duke, to which the Earl of Bristol also contributed in the Lords House.

This Earl had decladed from the presence of both King James and King Charles, ever since his return from his Embassy in Spain, and taking advantage of the time, he petitioned the Peers. That whereas being a Peer of the Realm, he had not received a writ of Summons to the Parliament, he prayed, he might enjoy the Liberty of a Subject, and the Benefit of Peerage, after two years restraint, without being brought to Tryall, and if any charge where brought in against him, he might be tried in Parliament. Upon the reading this Petition the Lords referred it to their Committees of Privilege; from whence, after due considerations thereof, a Report was made to the House by the Earl of Hertford.

That it was the opinion of the Committee, that his Majestie should be moved to grant a new writ of Summons to the Earl, which was agreed to by the House. And upon Request, made to the King, a writ was issued accordingly, but acc\-\ncompanied
The Reign of King Charles the First.

1626. Complained with a Letter from the Lord Keeper to him, that though his Majesty had given way to the awarding of the writ, yet notwithstanding his pleasure was, that his Lordship should continue still under the same restraint, as he did before, and that his personal attendance was to be forborne.

The Earl sends this letter to the House of Lords, and a second Petition with it, offering to them, how much this might trench upon the Liberty and Safety of the Peers, to be in this fort discharged by a Letter mislaid of any Subject, without the King's hand, befeeching them the might be heard, both as to his wrongfull restraint, and what he hath to say against the Duke.

This alarm'd the Duke to begin his writ, and by his persuasion the King commands the Attorney General to summon the Earl to the Lords Barr as a Delinquent, Brerford appearing May the first, the Attorney acquainted the Peers, that he came to accuse him of high Treason, and exhibited eleven Articles against him. But before they were read, the Earl said: My Lords, I am a free-man, and a Peer of the Realm unattainted, I have some-what to say of high consequence for his Majesty's Service, and I befeech your Lordships give me leave to speake.

The Lords upon this, bid him go on. Then said he, I accuse that man the Duke of Bucking-ham of high Treason, and immediately he presented 12 Articles against him.

The House after having read these Articles, committed the Duke of Brerford to the Custody of the Usher of the Blackrod, and ordered that the Kings charge against the Earl, should be first proceeded on, before that of the Earl against the Duke; which the King took very well.

The Articles on both sides concurred in one designe, which was to render each other suspe-ceted in matters of Loyalty and Religion; though by so doing they made good sport to their eneemies, and the world besides, but in neither of them was any fact that amounted to treason, and because no proceeding was made on them, it is not very requisite to describe them at large. But there being an endeavour to take the Earls caufe out of the House of Lords, & to proceed by way of indiction thereon in the Kings Bench, the Lords referred this, and gave five reasons why they could not give way to that manner of proceeding; which were these following,

[1] He could have no Counsel.
[2] He could use no Witness against the King.
[3] He could not know what the evidence against him would be in a convenient time, to prepare for his defence.
[5] This Earl being indignt, it would not be in their Power to keep him from arraign't, & so he might be dissuaded to make good charge against the Duke, and therefore it was judged the most proper, and most legal way of proceeding; First to have the charge delivered into the House of Peers in Writing, and the Earl to set down his answer to it in Writing, and that the Witnesse might be examined, and evidences on both sides heard; and if upon full hearing, the House should find it to be treason, then to proceed by way of Indictment; if doubtful in point of Law, to have the opinion of the Judges to clear it: if deniæful in matter of fact, then to refer it to Regall Iat.

The Commons to load heavier upon the Duke did also, about this time, send up some of their Members, (viz.) St. Dudley, Diggs, St. John Ejots, Mr. Stedman, Mr. Gillingham, Mr. Pyms, Mr. Worsley, Mr. Herber, and Mr. Sherlank with 13 Articles of high Treason, and misdemeanours against him, containing several encroachments on the Royalll favour, and some miscarriages, which at another time, and in another man might have been connived at. Nevertheless he put in his answer to them, which was inwlied by so much modesty and humility, that many who expected a more disdainfull defence, were converted to a good opinion of him, and in regard there was nothing considerable in them, but what was acted and happened in the time of King James, and not legally cognozable at this time, he claimed the benefit of Pardon in the 21st of King James, and the present Kings Con-ronation Pardon. But this being contrary to the expectation of the Commons, upon the 14th of the same month they had drawn up a Declaration of the manner of their impeachment, which was clearization of not without difficulty preferred before a Bill of their impeachments, Subsidie, then ready to be read; at which the King was so dissatisfied, that the next day, by a Commission under the Great Seal, directed to the certain Lords, He dissolved the Parliament.

No sooner was he freed from this, but the necessity of his affairs involved him in another im-broilment. The French Priests and Domestique of that Nation, which came into England, with the Queen, were grown so insolent, and put so many surronts upon the King, that he was forced to send them home; in which he did no more than what the French King had done before him, in sending back all the Spanish Courtiers, which his Queen brought with her. But that King not looking on his own Example, and knowing on what ill terms the King stood, both at home and abroad, first, sealed on all the merchants ships, which lay on the River of Bord-town, and then the Peace lately patched up, was turned into an open Warr, to the that the King was firm to make use of those forces against the French, which were designed to have been used against the Spaniard, and to comply with the dets of the Richelieu, who humbly fixed to him at this time, for his protection and defence. But the fleet, which he designed for that alli-

cence, not going out till after Miche ermas, was found greater opposition at the Sea, then they feared from the land, being encountered with strong tempests, and thereby necessitated to return, without doing any thing, but only fleeing the Kings good will, and readiness to help them.

Whilesthis dispute between the two Kings continued, very sad news came hither from Ger-

amny, That the King of Denmark, who had armed (as was before mentioned) on behalf of the Elector Palatine, and the Protestant Princes of Germany
The Reign of King Charles the First.

Germany, notwithstanding the late Ad sent from England, of six thousand men, under the Conduct of Sir Charles Morgan, had on the seventeenth of August received a total overthrow by Sir William Howe, and was reduced to such distresses, that if present succours came not, he was ruined for ever; That the Sound was like to be lost, the English Garrison at Stead, strictly besieged, and out East-end Trade and Staple at Hampton-almost given up for good.

The King was much perplexed at this, and the more because of his inability in the condition he was to lend further succours to him.

That which chiefly was wanting, was Treasure, and the present use of it could not admit of so much delay, as to call a Parliament, which is the ordinary means of supply. The King was therefore in this straight advised by his Council, that forasmuch as the Commons in Parliament, at their late Sitting, had passed a Bill of Subsidies, and that the Parliament was dissolved before the Bill passed into an Act, he might require these Subsidies of the Subject, which the House of Commons, in their names had assented to, and yet not by the name of Subsidies, but in the way of Loan, till the next Parliament should enable him to make payment of it, or to convert the levying thereof, by a subsequent Act. In pursuance of this advice, Commons were influenc'd to support the Great Seal to divers Commissioners in all parts, for the levying these monies, who had the Instructions following, to direct them in the execution thereof.

1. That for a good example to others, they should themselves lend His Majesty the several sums required.

2. That to go according to the Rates at which people were assessed in the Book of the late Sir John Scott.

3. To fix up every man a cheerful leading, by declaring the unavoidable necessity of taking this course, and using other the most prevalent arguments they could devise; as the honour of the Nation, the defence of true Religion, the safety of Prince and People.

4. That they appoint the days of Payment to be within fourteen days.

5. That they treat with every one apart, and not in the hearing of others.

6. That they in all such things are like to them left examples.

7. That they endeavour to discover, whether any by underhand persuasions, or otherwise, go about to hinder the good intentions of others, and may such be found to certificate their names, qualities, and habitations to the Council.

8. That they sign the His Majesties pleasure to remit, upon the 8th day of those sums, whatever has been defined upon the late Restorations, or Private Seals.

9. That they admit of no suit to be made, or reasons to be given, for the delay of any sums.

10. That upon their Faith, and Allegiance to his Majesty they keep these Instructions secret to themselves, and do not discover them to any others.

And besides these private Instructions, they were to represent to the people the deplorable estate of Rochell, then closely besieged by the Duke of Guise, which, if not speedily relieved, would fall into the hands of the Enemies of the Protestant Religion. But though these commissioners brought in good sums of money, yet so many, and some of good quality refused, and were therefore committed to several prisons.

This year died two of the most eminent men for Learning, that ever the Nation had, Doctor Andrew Bishop of Winchester, and Sir Francis Bacon, Viccount St. Albans.

It was now the third year of His Majesties Reign, when Rye Action was agreed on; and though money came not so plentifully as was at Buckingham hopes, yet the Duke of Buckingham High Admiral of England, determined to wipe away the imputation of Negligence, in relation to his Admiration, had, with much ado, completed his Naval Forces, consisting of six thousand Horse and Foot in ten Ships-Royal, and ninety Merchant-men; with which he set Sail from Portsmouth the 27th of June, and published his Manifesto the twenty first of July following, declaring at large the Kings Affection to the Reformed Churches in France, and his displeasure at the imposition of his Ships against the Rochells.

The first design of this Fleet was intended against the Port Louis, wherein being prevented by the Duke of Augustaine, they resolved upon the Isle of Rye. Twelve Ships therefore were sent to guard the entry of Port Bourbon, the rest failed on to a Port of the Isle of Rye, called De la Price, making their approaches with their Canon to near, that Monsieur Turon, Governor of the Citadel of St. Martin, perceiving their intention, sent out his Forces, to the number of one thousand, in seven partitions, Horse and Foot, to impede their coming on shore: These were encountered by twelve hundred English, whom Sir John Barrow, Sir Alexander Brett, Sir Edward Conway, and Sir Charles Rich, had landed by the advantage of their great Ordinance. The fight was sharp and quick, whereas in many brave Gentlemen lost their lives on both sides; of the French Monseur Reffranger, Brother to Turon, Chausofiis, Capet, Naval, Tarbuff, Mounces, Hoby, Belzofor, and Candamofor. Of the English Sir Thomas Ford, Sir William Hageden, Sir Thomas Thornhay, Sir George Blundell, Captains, Glin, Withly, Powell, is brave, Goring, Sc, and a Kinman of Sir George Blundell, with Monsieur de Blancart Agent for the Duke of Ruan, and the Protestants. And of the wounded were, Rich Conway, Haul, Green, Abraham Rainford, Welmore, Thorpe, Maurice, and Boulter; The Victory uncertain. The English General removed his Camp, and in trenching, dispatched Sunbeke, and Sir William Beecher to Rochell, who returned with five hundred Foot, and found the Duke before St. Martin Carre (the chief strong of the Illand) notwithstanding the diffusion of his Council, who advised him first to attempt the other Carre, called the Mede, which they might in all likelihood have carried, and would have proved an handsome, and safe place of retreat in their future necessity. Buckingham falls to circumvallation, ordering the Ship to encompass the Island without, to hinder all provision and supply from Turon; by which means the besieged were for the space of two months greatly distress'd, in which time there hapned a hot conflict between both Parties, and that with equal success; and by a Letter of
In the mean time scarce affairs afflict the English Camp, and Sir John Burroughs viewing the Works, was shot through, whereof he shortly died. The French King came from Court to the Camp, and thrice in ten days attempted to send over some Aids to the Castle, but the English Ships repelled them, and three days after another Brother of Toiras was slain, and his Squadron put to flight. And now the Souldiers of the Castle were reduced to greater hardship than before, not being furnished with Bread for above four days; whereof having no other way left, Toiras resolved to win time by treating with the Duke of Buckingham about surrender, hoping in the interim to have some better news from his Associates, which accordingly fell out; for Moniteur Manpalte, who with other Pilots, heretofore had founded the Shelves, and designed the Station for some Ships, for the relief of the Island, contrived a way to bring them, in despite of the English; it was now the Winter, and the nights long and dark, which altogether disabled them from effecting it; but they made an attempt and opportunity to pass by them with a Fleet of 35 Sail, 750 Mariner, 300 Souldiers, 160 of the chief Nobility, and many Noble Commanders, with great force of all sorts of Provision, having before sent some diffembling Renegadoes, to tell the English that he passed a contrary way: so that when the Duke of Buckingham expected a surrender, they boldly threw him their Runners of Wine, and Turksies and Capons upon the points of their Pikes and Spears.

The Duke hereat dismayed, spends the night in Council, and determines with all speed to raise the siege, and be gone; but the Rounders intreats, and Dolliers arrival from England, with assistance of Auxiliaries, unhappily prevailed with him for a longer stay, during which, the same of fresh Supplies to the besiegers published over all France, to be coming, under the Command of the Earl of Holland, baffled the French to send forth another Fleet, consisting of fifteen good Ships, and other Smaller Boats, part to St. Martins, and the rest to the Meadow Castle, besides seven others which got to the Meadow Fort, under Moniteur command. And now the French King resolved to dislodge the English, and discharged over for the Service, an Army of four thousand Foot, and two hundred Horse, besides Volunteers, under the Command of the Marth of Schomberg with Maryland his Lieutenent General, to whom came all the besieged, and greatest part of the Islanders, being in all above eleven thousand men; after which, another party under Command of Bussampoline and Hauwers, consisting of eight hundred of their Kings Life-guard, an hundred and fifty of the Country thereabout, 30 of the Kings Horse, and 3 great Bats Pieces, landed at the Meadow Castle. A gainst these last, the Duke of Buckingham marched with 500 Foot and 40 Horse, and forced them to retreat to the Castle, but returning to his Camp, he finds the Trenches possisied by another party of the French Army; Stanley is ordered to beat them out again, which he doth by main force, though not without loss; and the Lord Monjoy seized a small Troop of French; him they endeavoured to surprize with six Horse in them, whom he chased so far, that he had almost come in danger of their Ambuscado.

One dark night a party of the English fell upon a party of the French, and not we discovering one another, so mingled, that by mistake, the English falling into the French Camp, became a prey to them.

Nor did the War only afflict the English, but also Sickness and Want, whereby their Souldiers and Seamen were generally enfeebled, which put the Duke upon his final resolution of taking his Jarrowell of the Island, with one more Assault to Saint Martins Castle. Toiras had intelligence of it, and therefore he managed his business accordingly, and gave them so hot a welcome, as being oppreced and fell'd to the ground with shot, they dropped in heaps: so that at first great losses received, the Duke commanded a retreat to be founded, and soon after dismantled his Works, filled his Ditches, and levelled his Trenches, in order to his departure. Schomberg and Maryland pursued, hallowing to them in a Bravado, and brandishing their Swords. The English thinking the French Enmy would then have charged the Wall with all possible force, prepared for a Battle, but they knew what advantage the way would shortly give them, made a halt, whereupon the Duke marched on in Military Order, until he came to the Village Carda, where they made another stand, and by an Ambuscado of Musketeers placed behind the old Walls, Walks, Hedges, and Ditches, compelled the French to retreat; but the whole Army coming up, followed them slowly for 3 miles, till they came to Aversine Cauway, which was so narrow, that they could only march six abreast, with Ditches on either side, mostly ending in Salt pits: and now Schomberg elying his expected opportunity, poured forth a great volley of shot against them, and then the English began to march as fast as possibly; but the Lord Monjoy's Troops unable to endure the charge of the French Horse, turned tail, and riding in amongst the other Ranks, put them into such a disorder, as enabled the French easily to break in upon them and rout them, with no small slaughter, overthrowing some into the Ditches and Salt pits, and piercing others as they lay in the dirt. Nor was flight any whit more auspicious to them for those who confudently ran away, and casting away their Arms, leaped into the Water, were also cut off. Cunninghams Horse sought it out nobly unto the last man. The Lord Monjoy was taken Prisoner, and civilly used.
Reformation, by even, and turning paths, made their way to the farther bridge, with much danger, where joying with Cowley, Croissy, Fryer, and Hackwith, and their forces, they made good that Pais by the repulse of the enemy, and leaving a guard of Monmouthers there all day, set the Bridge on fire, and lodged that night fragrantly up and down. The next day the Duke demanded, and obtained the dead bodies, and went on board. Great was this day's loss, viz. about fifty Officers, among whom where Sr. William Cunningham, St. Charles Rich, and Sir Alexander Brett, and next two thousand common Soldiers were slain, thirty prisoners of note, and forty four Colours were taken; of the French not above four was left. The Duke hoised Sails, and met the Earl of Holland, with his unexceptionable Recruits, near the Western Coast of England; and at his return finding a favorable reception at the Kings hands, he layed the loss of the designe upon the Earl of Holland not timely recording the Expedition. But at Sea, things were not so much better, as Captain Forget, in his return from Hamborough, feared by command a great French ship at the Texel in Holland, named the Saint Esprit, with twenty brafs Culverines, two brafs Semi-culverins, two other brafs Guns, sixteen large Iron Guns, & two leffer, & in the hold for ballast twelve great Guns, and Arms for eleven hundred Soldiers, and eighteen Barrels of Powder. And John Pennington, Vice-Admirall took thirty four of their rich merchant men, homewards bound, all which were safely brought into England, to Sweeven, though not countervail the losse receiv'd at Rochell. The ill Success of this Enterprise did much incende the People against the Duke of Buckingham, but the King did not discover any discontent towards him; only he tolde him, that Sr. Suckville Crown had written to him of a far greater loss, then he acknowledged. During this expedition, Albem Mar, Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, by letters Patents the 9th of Oct. vber, was suspende'd from all his Metropolitan Jurisdiction, and confined to his House at Faversham, and the exercise thereof was committed to the Bishops of London, Durham, Rochester, Oxford, and Bath and Wells, or to any four, three, or two, of them. The occasion of this Commissioin was not discover'd otherwise then by what was express'd in the Commissioin it'self, (viz.) That the said Arch-Bishop could not at that present, in his own person attend those Services, which were otherwise Proper for his Cognizance and Jurisdiction, and which as Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, he might and ought in his own person have performed, and executed. But the true reason was that for the King was perwaded, the non-conformists to the Discipline of the Church, too much increas'd by the reminisces of his Government.

This Michaelmas Term there was a great debate in the Kings-bench, concerning some of those impositions, viz. refusing the Loan, which mov'd for an Habeas Corpus, and had it. The Attorney General, St. Robert Heath, upon their appearance alleged, they were not liable, and their Counsell the contrary, and the Court agreed with the Attorney, so that they were committed in Prison, till an order Palf'd in Council, for a general release, which was shortly after.

The French King, encouraged by the Success he had against our forces, resolved upon a more formidable siege against Rochell, and having made a Line about it on the Lands-side, with three forts, by the advice of Cardinal Richlen, and the loan of many Merchants ships, belonging to the Subjects of the United Netherlands, he attempted a Barrage, fourteen hundred yards in length, cross the Channel, to hinder all relief by Sea; whereby the Richlen's expeditied nothing but ruin, unless they could prevent it, so that they with very great hate sent Mon蕨er Sublicx and their Deputies to England, to solicit the King for Supplies, before the work should be compleated, who was so affected with their miseries, that he promised them all the assistance he could; and to enable him therunto, he borrowed an hundred and twenty thousand Pounds of the City of London, for which and other Debts, they had lands, to the value of one and twenty thousand Pounds a year affur'd to them. He also borrowed of the East-India Company thirty thousand pounds, and what money else he could get by privy Seals. Moreover it was resolve'd to levy money by Excise, and a Comissioin, under the great Seal, was pass'd on the 3rd of February to authorize it; but the execution thereof was suspiz'd by the King, who never was guilty of any irregular action, by the impulse of his own nature, nor periuv'd by others but by extreme necessity, & at this time, in compliance with his own good inclinations, he chose rather to call a Parliament, which was summons'd to meet on the 17th of March, then proceed in extraordinary ways, for he was much troubled at the general discontent of the People, and he hoped by their counsels to beget a good understanding betwixt himself and them.

On the 17th of March, the Parliament assembled at Westminster, and the King having sent for the Commons to the Lords-house expressed him-self in these words to both Houses:

My Lords and Gentlemen.

The fair times are for alms, for alms, I say, not for words; I must say, I would have but a few and (as Kings are said to be exemplary to their Subjects, so) I wish you would instruct me in this, and use me a few, setting upon speedy consultation. No man is, I conceive, such a stranger to the common necessity, as to explicate the cause of this meeting, and not to think supply to be the end of it; and as this necessity is the prodige and consequence of your advice, for the true Religion, the Laws and Liberties of this State, and just defence of your Friends and Allies, being so considerably concerned, will be, I hope arguments enough to persuade Supply, for it is in (as most true it is) both my duty, and yours, to preserve this Church and Commonwealth, this exegent of time certainly requires it.

In this time of common danger, I have taken the most ancient, speedy, and least way, for supply, but calling you together, if (as which God forbid) you do not your dutie, in contributing what may answer the quality of my occasions, it shall suffice, I have done mine. In the Conference where-[" whereof I shall rest content; and take some other courses, for which God hath empowered me, to face that, which the folly of particular men might hazard to lose.

I take not this as a menace (for I fear to threaten my inferiors) but as an admonition from him who is eyed, both by nature and duty, to provide for your preferments; and I hope, though I thus speak, your demeanour will be such, as shall oblige me in thankfulness to meet you often, then which nothing shall be more pleasing to me. Remembering the distractions of our last meeting, you may suppose I have no confidence of good success at this time, but be assured I shall freely forget and forgive what is past; hoping you will follow that sacred advice, lately incited, To maintain the holy of the Spirit in the bond of Peace.

The Parliament feemed very much affected with what the King said, and the Commons freely voted, to grant him five Subsidies, whereof, when Secretary Cabot informed the King, he asked him, by how many voices it was carried, who replied by one, at which perceiving the Kings countenance to change, S. said he, your Majesty hath the greater cause to rejoice, for the House was so unanimous therein, as they made but one voice. At which the King was exceedingly pleased, and bid the Secretary tell them, he would deny them nothing of their Liberties, which any of his predecessors had granted. But whilst a Bill was in preparation for these Subsidies, they considered of the public grievances of the Kingdom.

The Kings extraordinary wants put him, as you have heard, upon some unfruitful courses for levying of Money, not very warrantable by our ancient Laws, and some that were unwilling to co inentance such courses. Or otherwise subjected to the Government, upon refusal were imprisoned; and because no legal cause could be assigned for such retartation, the Warrants, whereby they were imprisoned, had no cause specified in them, which was excluded against, as not legal, and a great Grievance. There is scarce any thing less then death, more grievous then imprisonment, and though by our Laws no man can be imprisoned without a legal cause expressed; yet those that are in the exercise of power, in tumultuous times, upon extraordinary emergencies, are constraint to pass over those bounds; for no such provision hath yet, or can be made, to exclude all manner of arbitrary exercise of Government; but whoever they be, that exceed in this tender point, it will become their prudence to do it with extraordinary caution.

Upon the return of the Fleet after the late actions at Sea, the Squid, etc., for want of pay, were billeted in private houses, which was alleged to be against the Law; and to aggravate this, the badness of their persons, and their country (being Scotch and Irish) did much contribute. Nevertheless, though their actions were bad, and their persons worse, the Commons liked not that they should be punished by Law Martill. For there being a Commission inflicted to the offences of the Soldiers by Martill Law, they exclaimed at it, and it was urged as a grievance, yet till that time the Kings Prerogative, in making and establishing Martill Laws, was never questioned, though since the petition of Right, there is doubt of it. Magna Charta and fix other Statutes explanatory of it, were expressed against illegal levies of Money, and imprisonments, and though those Statutes were in force, whether the Parliament thought them antiquated, and therefore left regarding, or for what other reason it is not said, To provide against the Grievances complained of, etc., They drew up that memorable Law, called the Petition of Right, and presented it to the King, to which he gave the Royal Assent in full Parliament, to the very great liking of the people. And it was now thought there was to be an Harmony between the King and the Parliament, that nothing could hinder the Nation of as much happiness, as it could be capable of; but this concession instead of the real of many of the House of Commons, to protest a little further, and they immediately framed a Remonstrance of several late miscarriages in Government, in the conclusion whereof, they said, The excessive power of the Duke of Buckingham, and the abuse of that power is the principal cause of all the evils and dangers, thereby measured; and therefore they humbly submit it to his Majesties Wisdom, whether it can be safe for himself, or for his Kingdom, that so great power, both by Sea and Land, be rest in him, should be trusted in the hands of any one Subject whatsoever.

On the 17th of June, this Remonstrance was presented to the King, with the Bill of Subsidies, in the Banqueting-House at Whitehall, when he had heard it read, told them he little expected such a Remonstrance, after he had so gravously passed the petition of Right, and for the Grievances, specified therein, he would consider them, as if they should deliver.

The King, and leved the duties of Tonnage and Poundage; even since the first of his Reign, which the House of Commons alleged he ought not to have done; or at least that they could not now be taken, since the passing of the late Petition of Right; and they prepared a Remonstrance against it; but the King unwilling to hear of any more Remonstrances of such a tenor, resolved to frustrate it, by proroguing the Parliament, from the 25th of June, to the 20th of October, and calling both Houses together to that end, he delivered his mind as followeth.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I fom a sort of a speech, that I come to fudder, sain to end this Session, therefore be it as you shall give your consent to the Bills, I will tell you the cause; (though I must own, I owe it in an account of my actions to none, but God alone.) It is known to every one, that a while ago, the House of Commons gave me a Remonstrance, in which they, as accept, every man may judge, and for the merit of it, I will not call it, that is in question, for I am sure, no wise man can justify it. Now since I am certainly informed, that a second Remonstrance is preparing for me, to take away my profit of Tonnage and Poundage (one of the chief maintenances of the Crown) by alleging, that I have
The Reign of King Charles the First.

The Duke of Buckingham was sent to the Tower, and his body was brought to York-house, from whence it was entombed at Westminster in St. Edwards Chappell, and a stately Monument was erected over it by his Executors. And Felton being arraigned, and found guilty at the King's bench-bar at Westminster, was hanged at Tyburn, and afterwards his body was sent to Portsmouth, where without the Town it was hanged in chains, till it was consumed.

The report of this accident was that the Duke's death made little or no stir in the proceedings of the Fleet, which at the last set forward under the Earl of Lyndsay, but before he could get to Rochester, the haven was so bar'd, that it was impossible for his ships to force their way (though it was gallantly often attempted) so that the Royalists seeing this hope to fail, sent out some of the principal of the Town, to make their submission to the King, and let open the gates, to receive him.

The time now drawing near for the meeting of the Parliament, the King for many weighty reasons, put off their Assembling to the 20th of January, and in the mean time Arch-bishop

The Reign of King Charles the First.

"dins. Yet to avoirdistinct kings, let me tell you, that it is far from me, to judge all that houle guilty, that I know there are as dutifulfull Subjects, as any in the World; it being but some few vipers amongst them, that did cast this mift of undutfulness before their eyes; yet to say truth, there was a good number there, that would not be infected by this Contagion, in so much that some did express their duties in speaking, which was the generall fault of the House the last day. To conclude, as these Vi-pers must look for their reward of Punishment, so you, My Lords, must justly expect from me that favour and protection, that a good King
oweth to his loving and dutifull subjects.
The King was highly provoked, as is evident by this speech, at the disorder and tumultuous carriage of many of the Members of the Commons-House of Parliament, who fiircind all things beyond their natural length, a little moderation and obfqueuiousness might have obtined of him, whatever was defined, and if he had not had better intentions towards his Subjects, then some of those discontented Spirits would have made the world believe he had, the dislocution of this might have been the end of all Parliaments, and we might have been deprived of that Spring, from whence the blessings of Peace, and happiness, have formerly been derived on this Church and State. And this there wanted not like to infite into him, by the example of the King of France then reigning. For whereas in an assembly of the three Estates (which is in the nature of our Parliament) some years before this time, the Commons (being their third Estate)entrenched too fully upon the Liberties of the Clergy, and some Priviledges, which the Nobility enjoyed, by the favour of the fortner Kings, it gave the King so great offence, that he dissolved them, and their conftitution together, and ordained another kind of Assembly in place thereof, which he called L'Assemblie des Notables. That is to say, The Assembly of principal Persons, who are composed of seeld persons out of all orders of Estates of the Kings nomination, to which is added a Coundelior out of every Court of Parliament in France, and the Acts of this Assembly are no lefs obliging to the People, than the others were. The King would receive no imprefions of this nature, but yet he was very carned to vindicate his Authority, and Commandment, which in his proclamation, before mentioned, He allowed to have been so contemned, as his Kindly Office could not bear, nor any former age parallell. He had on the fourth of March, fix days before his coming to the Lords (by the advice of his private Coun-del, and by their warrant) sent for severall Members of the Commons-House to appear the next day at the Council-table, (sic) Demail Holli: Esquire: St. John Elliot, St. Peter Hayman, St. Mils Hubbard, John Steden, William Cor-ton, Benjamin Valentine, William Stred, and Walter Long, Esquires, who were the principal authors of the late Diforders, at which time Holli, Elliot, Coriton, and Valentine appearing, and refusing to answer out of Parliament, what was said and done in Parliament, they were commited to the Tower; The refi not then appeaing, were afterward apprehended, and commited to severall other prifons.

But leaff, tho' these distempered Spirits, that had by imprudence caused so much disquiet at Westmin-fter, should to excufe themselves, diffpers abroad in their Countries, some of their malignities, to aperfe the Government, and alienate the hearts of the good Subjects from the King, he publi-fed a Declaration, letting forth his Reasons and Motives for dissolving the Parliament, with breviates of all transactions, in this and the former Seccion, the heads whereof, we think it not improper to insert in this place;

He professed therein, To maintain the true Religion, & doctrine, established in the Church of England, without admitting or countenancing any back-fliying, either to Popery or Schifmis, having been ever deffrons, to be found worthy of that title, which he accounted the most glorious in his Crown, DEFENDER OF THE FAITH, nor would he ever give way to the authorizing of any thing, whereby any Innovation might creep into the Church, but to preserve that unity of Doctrine & Difcipline, established in the time of Queen Elis-tabeth, wherein the Church had flourished,
and flourished ever since. He shewed also how carefull he had been to command the execution of the Laws against Popish Priests, and Popish recusants, and if his Commands were not duly executed, the fault ought to be laid on the remines of the Officers and Minifters, to whome it belonged, for it was his part to direc-
and order well, but the part of others to per-forme the ministerial Offices.

Next to Religion, his care of setting the Rights and Liberties of the People, was maniitured in his answer to the Petition of Right, which since that time had not been infringed.

Nor was he less careful in the provident ordering of the Supplies, given to him the lift Session, wherein no part had been put to any other ufe then to what it was granted.

But he could not but take notice of some of glances in the Houfe, and rumors abroad, as if his answer to the petition of Right, had not only given away his imposition upon goods exported and imported, but the Tonnage and Poundage alfo, whereas in the debate thereof
there was no mention in either Houfe, concer-ing those Duties, but concerning Taxes, and other charges within the land; for though in the matter of Tonnage and Poundage, his necessities pleas'd strongly for him, he was resolved, to guide himself, by the prudifce of his Nobillet Predecessors, and therefore he called records to be search'd, where it was found, that in the Subsidy of Tonnage and Poundage was not granted to King Edward the 4th, still the third year of his Reign, yet he received it the first day of his acception to the Crown, until it was granted by Parliament, and in the succeeding times of Richard the third, King Henry the Seventh, King Henry the Eight, King Edward the Sixth, Queen Mary and Queen Elisabeth, the Subsidy of Tonng e and Poundage was not onely enjoyed by every one of those Kings and Queens, from the death of each of them deceasing, until it was granted by
The Reign of King Charles the First.

On the Seventh of May, the Attorney General presented an Information in the Star-chamber, against Sir John Eliot, and the rest of the imported Members, and they urged a process against them, to answer his allegations in that Court; To which they demurred and acknowledged the King had several Communications with the Judges about it, but they moved for a Writ of Habeas Corpus, and had them granted but had no returns to them as was desired.

The Judges in the Matter, which he did the 7th of September, at Hampton-court; where he called them aside (after he had proposed several matters to them, by way of advice, and had heard the answer, which was: That their offences were not capital, and that the Law ought to be baied, giving security for their good behaviour,) he told them, he proposed, to proceed against them, by the Common Law in the King's Bench, and to decline his proceeding in the Star-chamber, and was contented they should be bailed, notwithstanding their obduracy, that they had not given him a Petition to express their sorrow for offending him, adding, that he was pleased with them for dealing plainly with him, or words to that effect.

In pursuance of this advice, as soon as Michaelmas term began, the Court of Kings-bench was moved, to bail the prisoners, to which the Judges with one voice say, they were contented they should be bailed, but that they ought to find Sureties for their good Behaviour, to which Salea answered (and all the rest agreed to it) that they had Sureties ready for the Bay, but not for the good Behaviour, for that was a point of discretion merely, and they could not assent to it, without great offence to the Parliament, where the matters numbed were settled. To this the Judges replied to this effect: That the return did not mention anything done in Parliament, and the surety of good Behaviour is a precaton of Damages to the Common-wealth, and an Act of Government and Jurisdiction, and not of Law, and would be inconvenient to the prisoners, for the same Bay would suffice, and all should be written in one piece of Parchment. But they refused, and were remanded, and the same term an Information was exhibited by the Attorney General in the King's bench, against Eliot, Halliwell, and Falton, for words spoken against them in the foregoing Parliament, laid to be false, malicious, and seditious, as well versus Regnum, Magnates, Praetores, Processos et Jusifikationes suis, quam Magnates, Processos & Jusifikationes, & religios Regis Subditos, & iurisdictiones Hereditarias eversae, & adversi Regiones, & Gubernationes Regni Anglie, et in Domino Rege, quam in Consiliariis, & Ministris suis, confunngique generis, & indicare tumultum et confusionem, in all Effuses et partes, et ad intentionem, that all the Kings subjects should withdraw their affections from the King. Then the words were expressed at large, and at the end of the information it was urged, that Sir John Finch the Speaker endeavoring to go out of the chair according to the Kings Command

mand, to adjourn the House, they sat down and evill-interred him and being out of the Court they sat down and him in the House, and interred him and drew him to the Chair, and thruf him into it.

To this Information, the Gentlemen put in a Plea; Forasmuch as those Offences are supposed to have been done in Parliament, they ought not to be punished in this Court or any other in-fell in Parliament. Upon this the Court gave a day to joyn in demurrer that Term, and on the first day of the next Term the Record to be read, and within a day after argued at the Bar.

Against Mr. Long particularly, an information was preferred at the Star-Chamber, which was agreed the first day of Hilary Term; it was not for any thing said in Parliament, but to this effect following, (size.)
For that he being high Sheriff of the County of Wiltz, had the charge and Custody thereof committed to him, and had taken his Oath according to the Law to abide within his Bilywick all that time of his Sheriff, and his trust and implementing requiring his personal attendance therein, did contrary thereto suffer himself to be chosen a Citizen for the City of Bath to serve in the neat Parliament, and did attend at Westminster in Parliament without his Majesties Licence;
that he being Sheriff at the time, which was done in contempt of his Majesties pleasure signified to him under his great Seal, when he granted the Office of Sheriffwick: And after hearing his Counsell upon his demurrer, and plea-ging other arguments and reasons used in that behalf by his Counsell, the whole Court agreed in a sentence against him in these or like words:
For the aforesaid offences in breach of his oath, neglect of his trust, and contempt of his Majesty, it is decreed and adjudged, that he shall be committed to the Tower during his Maj-esties pleasure, and pay a fine of two thousand Marks to his Majesty, and make a submission and acknowledgement of his offence in the Court of Star-Chamber, and to his Majesty before his enlargement.

The same Term, the Counsell of Sir John Elia, and the other Gentlemen (inform'd against in the Kings-bench) argued also against the information, and the jurisdiction of the Court, but the Judges hearing both parties for and against it, unanimously agreed, That the Court as the Cafe is, shall have jurisdiction, although there offences were committed in Parliament, and and that the imprisoned members ought to ar-obain, and that they were by the Court rule'd to plead further, but they not putting in any plea, the last day of the Term judgment was granted against them upon a Nilbo diitai, and they were sentenced by the Court,

1. To be imprison'd during the Kings pleasure.
2. None of them to be delivered out of prison until security given in Court for the good beaviour, and submission, and acknowledgment made of the Office.
3. Sir John Eli insin'd to pay to the King, two thousand pounds, being the greatest offender;

Mr. Hollis a thousand Marks, and Mr.
Valentine five hundred pounds, and in like manner the rest were proceeded against, and several Fines were accordingly imposed upon them, most of which were paid, and the gent-lamen afterwards released from their imprisonments. If any of them did relate to pay such Fines, as were for upon them, they were men either of decayd or of small estate, and to not able to make payment of the fines imposed.

Many weighty and learned arguments were made in the Case of these gentlemen, before the judgement given, both by the Kings learned Counsell and their Counsel also, who objected all that could be thought of in the matter, some of which we shall mention for the better understanding of the matter in Question.

That this was a priviledge of Parliament, Obj. 1, whereof the Court were not competent Judges.
To which was answered, in § Eliz. it was the opinion of Dyre, Collin, Wells, Brown and Slovetes, Justices, that Offences committed in Parliament are punishable out of Parliament, and Plunder, in the time of Queen Mary, was fined for words spoken in Parliament against the dignity of the Queen, and in § H. E. a judgement given in a Writ of Annuity in Ireland, the said judgement was reversed in Parliament there.
Upon which Writ of Errour was brought in this Court and the judgement reversed.

This is an inferiour Court to Parliament, and
Obj. 2, cannot meddle with matter done in it.

To which was answered, the Court Quetions, not the judgement of Parliament, for what is done in Parliament by consent of all the House shall not be questioned elsewhere, but the particular offences criminally committed there, are punishable here, for if particular members of a superior Court offended, they are punishable in an inferiour. As it a Judge shall commit a Capital offence in this Court, he may be arraigned therefor at New-gate.

The Parliament Law differs from the Law, by which this Court judgeth in fandy Cafes, as for instance, by the Statute none ought to be chosen Burgesse for a Town in which he doth not inhi-bib, but in that the usage of Parliament is contrary.

The reply to this was, That they are the judges of Acts of Parliament, and if information be brought upon the said Statute against such a Burgesse, the Statute is a good Warrant for the Court to give judgement against him.

In the spring of the yeare the Queen being at the Queen was frighted, aboard of a Son, which added thing to the Kings troubles at home; though a broad matter succeede well, for the Entry of France being in a Tranquilplate expedition at Suface, for the relief of Carda, was to intent on that War, that he was very inclinable to peace with the state

the former Alliance between the two Crownes, and to preserve it inviolable with free Commerce, and in reference to the said commerce, liberty is given, that such things be proposed as

or diminish,

2. That considering it is very difficult to make restitution of what hath been taken as prize, as well on one side, as the other, during the late Wars: It is agreed between the two Crownes, that for what is passed no satisfaction shall be demanded on either side.

3. As to the Articles and contract of marriage of the Queen of Great Britain, they shall be confirmed, and for what concerneth her domicile it shall be lawful to propose what shall be thought expedient to be either added or diminished.

4. All former Alliances shall stand good between the two Crownes, living wherein they shall be changed by this present Treaty.

5. The two Kings being by this present Treaty removed to the defecion they formerly had, shall respectively employ this correspondence toward the assistance of their Allies (so far as the restitution of Affairs, and the general good will permit) for the procuring repose of the troubles of Christendom.

6. The premises being established on both sides, persons of eminency shall be reciprocally dispatched as Embassadors on either part for ratification of the accord, and for nomination of Agents ordinarily resident at each Court, for the better preserving this Union.

7. And because many Ships are now at Sea, with letters of Marque, who cannot suddenly take cognizance of this peace; it is agreed that what shall occur in the nature of Hostility for the space of two moneths on either side, shall not prejudice or derogate from this agreement. Provided notwithstanding that what shall be made prize of within the space of two months, after signature shall be adjudged on either side.

8. Lastly, the two Kings shall respectively sign the present Articles the 14. of this present month of April, and at the same time they shall be configned into the hands of the Lords Embassadors of France, to deliver reciprocally to the two Kings at a day prefixed. And from the day of signing, all Acts of Hostility shall cease, to which end proclamation shall be issued out in both Kingdomes the 30. day of May.

And for a confirmation of this League in September following the Marques of Caufenna, was sent in Embiffy from France, and Sir Thomas Edmonds was sent thither from hence.

About the month of July, there hapned a great fray in Fleet-street, upon the rescue of one Captain Bellingham (an officer in the late expedition to the Isle of Rhé) which was attempted by some Students in the Temple, whereof some were hurt, and carried to prison. But this disordered arm of the Government to rescue the prisoner, who made a Bizzacade against St. Dunstan's Church, and beat back the Sheriffs Officers, and releasted their friends, of which the Lord Mayor being inform'd, he and the Sheriffs with a band of trained Souldiers came down to keep the Peace, and dispers'd them; who were now encrced to the number of five hundred, and armed with swords and pistols: The Lord Mayor made Proclamation that on pain of rebellion they should dissolve themselves, but preval'd not, he then tryd other means, and the souldiers fired their Muskets on them charg'd with powder only; but the gentlemen provok'd at this, shot ballots, and very fiercely attacked the Train-bands, kill'd five out right, and wounded near a hundred; yet the City souldiers were so reinforced, that in the end the gentlemen, were fabbuc'd, and one Abhurft and Stafard two Captains, with some others were taken and committed. The King was much offended at the, and immediately sent for the Lord Chief Justice, by whose advice a special commision of Oyer and Terminer was issu'd out, and about a fortnight after the malefactors were arraigned in the Guild-Hall of London, and Abhurft and Stafard being found guilty of murder, were condemned and executed at Tyburn. Stafard was a relation and servant to the late Duke of Buckingham, and much intercession was made for him: but the King would not pardon him, but said he had murder'd a watch-man before and was pardon'd, and hath now kill'd another, and he would take order he should not kill a third.

In the month of January, Don Carlos de Coloma, sent Embassadors from Spain arrived at London, and had audience six days after; his business was to treat of a Peace, betwixt the two Crownes, which was a while after concluded, all things being left on both sides in the same condition in which they were before the War, and the Spaniard did engage that he would make use of all his interest with the Emperor for restoring the Prince Elector Palatine to his lost estate.

This Peace, and that with France brought a great encroache of Trade to us, the Spaniard sent hither yearly in English bottoms, no leafe than 600000 Crowns in Bullion, for the use of the army in the Netherlands, redounding very much to the Kings benefit in the Coarne, and no les to the profit of the Merchants also, most of the money being return'd into Flanders in Leather, Cloth, Lead, Tin, and other the Commodities of this Kingdom. The Dutch and Flemings being great Traders, lookt upon London as the safest bank not only to lodge, but increase their trade; so that in a short time, the greatest part of the Trade of Christendom was driven upon the Thames.

On the tenth of April, this year William Earl of Pembroke, Lord Steward of the Kings Household died suddenly of an Apoplexy, he was the Son of Henry Earl of Pembroke, Son of William Herbert created Earl of Pembroke, and Lord Herbert of Careis in the fifth year of King Edward the fifth, whose great Grandfather was William Earl of Pembroke taken prisoner in the Battle of Stadwul in the year 1467, in the quire of the House of Lancaster, redounding much in the ninth year of King Edward the fourth.

He was a comely Person, of a very generous mind, and one that in all his actions, appeared to be of the true ancient stock of English Nobility; He was competently learned, and a great lover of his Prince and County without flattery or fashion, which made him be ever esteemed by the first, and loved and respected by the later: He married Mary, the eldest Daughter, and Coheiue of Gilbert Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury, by whom he had not issue. The King was some what touched at the death of so good a Converser, But to qualifie that loss, God blest him with with a Son, the Heire of his Dominions, on the twenty ninth of May, who on the twenty leventh of June following was with great solemnity baptized, and named CHARLES, the Godfather was the King of France, and the Prince Elector, represented by the Duke of Lenox, and the Marquef of Hamilton; the Godmother was the Queen of France, whose Substitute was the Duchefs of Richmond. After this joyful Ceremony was performed, the King was intent on the Business of the Prince Elector, and hence the Intelligence of a Dyet to be kept this Summer at Richmond, he sent Sir Robert Agliffor Ambassador to the Emperor, taking that opportunity, when the Estates of the Empire were assembled, to treat of his brothers refurtation to the Palatinate. Sir Robert went in very noble Equipsage, and was very well receiv'd, when he came thither, and at his first audience
he deliver'd his Message to this effect.

That nothing did affect his Mafter, the King of Great Britaine, more, than the day-ly Calamities, undergone by his Brother the Prince Elector, his Wife and Children; that he deemed no place more convenient, where to treat of their Reconcilliation, and reestablishment, than in this Dyet, therefore he made it moli ardent Request to his most Imperial Majefly, that having Regard to the many In tereffions of his late Father, and other Kings and Princes, he would remit the difpleafure conceived against his Brother, and recall the procription iffued againft him, true it is, that his Brother had offended, and was inexcufa-bly guilty (unleff the Riffineffe and precipitation of youth may fomewhat pleade for him).
But others had been as culpable as he, whom yet his Imperial Majefly receiv'd into Grace and favour, and would be pleafed to extend to him the fame eftem, it would oblige his Mafter to demonstrations of greateft gratitude, and raise a glorious imitation in others to imitate to Majelfique a Pattern. That the Palfgrave would entertain this favour with an heart to firmly devoted to his fet-vice, as all the intention of his Spirit should be dipofed to compenfation and reparation of his by-paff murciaries. That his Mafter held nothing to deare, as the affencion of his Imperial Majefly, and eftabliment of a durable deepe between them, and as upon all occafions
he had been forward to reframe hisiftself injuftice of it, fo at this time he is ready to give more ample testimony, If his Imperial Majefty be pleafed to incline to a treaty.

The Emperor and Estates did not answer the Kings expectation, for besides the Complements which the Ambaffadour receiv'd, the all the answer to this Bufinefs was, That the prefent affairs of Germany, which call'd them thither, were of that important concernment, as would not admit of any forein debate. But while leaffure ferved, his Mafter should have fuch Satisfaction, as they hoped would give content. The Emperor was the colder in this matter, because he had some intimations of the Kings Correspondence with the King of Sweden, who at this time to enter into Germany with an Army. And he was not much deceiv'd in his intelligence, for ever since the King of Denmark was by Count Tyfli driven out of Germany, The eyes of all this part of the World were upon anvs Adefibus, King of Sweden; as the fifth perfon, to check the greatnefs of the House of Auffria. Him therefore, two years ago, the King elected into the Noble Order of the Garter, wherewith he was felo inned in the midl of his Army, at the Siege of Dar-las, a Town of Powerfull belonged to the Crowne of Poland, and then the greatnefs were laid, which (being feconded by the French, the States of the United Princes, and the difpersed Princes of the Empire) brought that King in to Germany. For which Expedition on the thirteneth of June, he embarqu'd himself, and all his Army, in feaveny mane of War, and two hundred Jeffer Barks. He had made great preparations the year before for this deigne, and had entertain'd many Sciffith and English Commanders and Souldiers, lately in the Service of the King of Denmark, after the Peace at Angie in Hulfine, made the year before with that Crown, and had dipeath'd fome of them to raile Recruits, to compleat their Regiments in Scotland and England, and likewife he entertain-d Germany, who had return'd from the Ce-foree Army, and from that Army that was fent to affift the King of Poland, under the conduct of Haron, and from thofe who had been disbrulged by Welfheim, the Emperours Generall;
The receiver'd little intelligence of the State of the Emperour, and gave them Command to difperfe forces with all speed, So that with none of the & the remainder of the Army, which was brought from the warts of Lutonia, he had gott together above Twelve thoufand horse and fotive of old Souldiers; But time was very favourable to the Enterprize, for the Princes of Germany had been much oppreffed by the late Military Government, which Welfheim had introduc'd amongst them. Who had under his command a hundred thoufand houfe, and 30000 houfe of diverse Nations, difperfed over all Germany, whereby the Princes of Germany were not treated as free Princes, but Subjefts. Whereupon for that the exceffive Authority of private men, and over-greatnefs of Neighbouring Potentates is never lik'd by great ones, The Eleétores, which pretend to keep the Imperiall condition within its limits, could not fuffer either the barbarous they lay under upon this former occasion, nor that fo many Souldiers should be main'tain'd in Germany, in the time of Peace, to the peoples for great Grievances, nor that the Throne of Ca-far should be rais'd to hight. They therefore privately fought out all opportunite means, how they might unarm him, and take from the Empire such a support; To which the Spanifh Mi-nifers of Vienna willingly concur'd, to moderate the greatnefs of Waffenheim, and prevailed with the Emperour to the disbanding of the supernumerary Forces, to pleafe the Eleétores, and to oblige them thereby, to adhere toavour the King of Hungary, at Election of the King of the Romans, Waffenheim was hereupon immediately laid aside which made him exclam that the Emperour was betrayer, and certainly there were come grounds for it. But if he had been more complacent
complacent in his behaviour, his authority had not been so easily taken away, nor so many of the forces disbanded, which whilst they were kept together made the Emperor so powerful, that the King of Sweden could never have made that impression he did into his Dominions.

The news of this success of the King of Sweden, made our King very willing to lend aids to him, and the Marquess of Hamilton had Communications to levy four thousand men for that service. After the general form, which was most of them to be of the Scottish Nation; For the encouragement of the Marquess in this expedition, the King gave him the import of wines in Scotland, which amounted to twenty thousand pounds Sterling a year; but for the raising of those men, and an intended supply of money to the King of Sweden greater sums were required, and therefore the King by advice of his Attorney General and other his Council, learned in the Law, was forced to use all ways by the Law allowable to furnish himself.

By the Common Law every man of full age that could dispense a Knight's fee, was compellable by the Kings writ to take the Order of Knighthood, or else to make fine for the discharge or reipin of the same, but because of the uncertainty of the quantity of lands that made a Knight fee; King Edward the second in the first year of his reign grante a writ in the time of Parliament and directed to the garrison, wherein it was written, (which is therefore filled by some a statute) wherein no man was thereafter to be distrained for Knighthood, that had not twenty pounds a year in Fee Simple or Free taylor, or for term of life, which Sir Edward Coke explains to be tenant by curtesy; and almost in every Kings Reign till the time of Edward the 4th, men were summoned by proclamation to take the order of Knighthood, but the vale of land was seldom I vowed to was twenty pounds a year, for in the 18th of King Henry the 6th, which perhaps is the last time before this wherein proclamations of this kinds were filled, the same was exprest to be 40. a year. The King having this warrantable way to supply his necessities, did cause several writs to be issued out of the Chancery for Proclamations to be made in every County, to summon all persons of full age, and not Knights, being tenant of lands or rents of the yearly value of 40 l. or more, to appear in the Kings presence at a certain day there limited, to take upon them the Order of Knighthood, upon return of which writs and transmitting the same with their returns into the Exchequer, and upon other writs for enquiring of the names of such as did not appear, processes by

But this money would not answer the Kings occasions, wherefore Mr. Walter Montague was sent over to Negotiate the payment of the moiety of the Queens portion (being four hundred Thousand Crowns) besides, and to require satisfaction for two rich Ships, taken from us by the French, since the last peace concluded; and with him Philip Bartram a Merchant, was sent to receive the money, and make it over by Exchange or otherwise. The French King received the message with kindness enough, but complained that one Captain Kirk had two years before, taken the fort of Kelich in Canada, which was in possession of the French, and put an English garrision into it, this after a little consideration was found so equitable that the King gave order to have the Fort delivered, and thereupon his full and just demands were satisfied.

The Roman Refusants were about this time very active in England, and their Religion began to increase by the inducement of their Priests, who needed not now to fetch their Ordination from abroad, by reason that the Pope had sent before Dodder Smith of the Titular Bishop of Calcedon to ordain Priests, who took also upon him to approve of such regular Priests, as were to be standing Confessors, which the General of the Jesuits thought an usurpation upon his Jurisdiction, and that order by their information being more powerful in England; prevail'd with many of the most eminent of their Religion, to remonstrate against his authority asserting all sufficient power in the Regulars to what ever was pretended by the Bishop, and the necessity of having a Bishop in England; The Spanish Ambassadour favoured the Jesuits in this contest, to which the Kings Proclamation for the Bishops banishment concerning, he was trauget into France, nor were the last of men insolent in England only, but in Ireland also, for at Dublin whist the Lords Justices were hearing divine service in Christ Church, they had at publick retort to mark as is sometimes in London, to the houses of Ambassadors of that Religion which the Lords Justices taking notice of, they sent the Arch-bishop, the Mayor, Sheriff, and Recorder of the City to apprehend them, which they did, taking away their Crucifixes, chalices, and copes, and delivering the Fryers and Priests into the hands of the Puritans, whom the people threw stones at, and had reduced them, but that a guard was sent to defend
The Marquefs of Hamilton was at this time under some umbrage at Court, though his power with the King quickly broke through it. The occasion thereof was this; He had left a creature of his own, David Ramsey into Germany, on pretence to notify his coming thither to the King of Sweden, and to inform himself of the condition of the Scots then in that Service, but by what appear’d after, it was suspected he had another intention than the King of Sweden’s assent. There were at this time eight and twenty Colonels in the Scotch nation in the Swedish service, amongst which, there were four of the name of Hamilton, with whom Ramsey had made a near acquaintance, for he lived at a great expense; he had also indeed himself to Colonel Alexander Ramsey, Governor of Crummer, a person of good esteem and intertitle both with the Scotch and those of his own nation; Amongst these Officers, there was the Lord of Rhes Mackay, who commanded a Brigade of Scots, a person of great honour and reputation, who having discovered by some expression of Ramsey, that the Marquefs had a deeper design then the present expedition to Germany, he intimating to him to find out the bottom of it, and was told by him in much secrecy, that the Marquefs would consult those Forces which he was by the King’s authority to raise in Scotland for foreign Service against England. That their Friends had provided arms and ammunition, and more were expected from Sweden and other parts, and he and Colonel Alexander Hamilton solicited him to be of their party; to this the Lord of Rhes made a cold answer, but thought himself bound in duty to come into England and make it known to the King, which he did the rather because Ramsey was then return’d also; but he upon this accussation denied the whole matter, and the Lord having no proof thereof (as in such secret matters it could hardly be) more than a confident assertion and the engagement of his honour, the King thought good to referre the controversy to the trial of the Contable and Marshal with the assistance of other Lords in Commission with them according to the antient law of the Land. The Earl of Lindsey being made Contable to that end and purpose; many days were spent accordingly in parliance of it. But when most men expected that the matter would be tried by Combat, as had been usual in such cases, the business was holden up at Court, The Lord Rhes dismis’d to his employment in the war, and the Marquefs did not only continue in the King’s great favour, but Ramsey was permitted to hold the place of a Gentleman of the privy chamber which he used to be holden in by the former. Defend them, nevertheless the justicess were so careful to prevent the like disorders that most of their houses of Religion were immediately seiz’d into the King’s hands, and such Inquisition after the reft, that two Priests hang’d themselves at the apprehension of this (as they then call’d it) persecution.

On the 25 of April this year, Merrivin Touchet, Lord Andrey was indicted and attain’d of Rape and Sodomy before his Peers in Westminster-Hall, Thomas Lord Coventry Lord-keeper of the great Seal, was for that day constituted Lord High Steward of England, and the Peers joyned with him were; The Earl of Portland Lord Treasurer, The Earl of Manchester Lord Privy Seal, The Earl of Arundel Lord Marquess, and the Earl of Pembroke Kent, Northumberland, Bedford, Essex, Dorset, Suffolk, Leicester, Warwick, Carlisle, Holland’s Berks, and Denby, The Viscounts Wilmot, Conway, Dorchester, Wensworth, The Barons Percy, Strange, Clifford, Peters, North, Goring, where divers unnatural and beastial actions being prov’d against him, he had sentence to be hang’d: but by the clemency of the King to him that sentence was chang’d to a beheading, which was executed on him at Tower-Hill on the 14 of May. In the same Month, the Marquefs of Hamilton, and of Scurry, married his own Niece the Daughter one Mr. Dalton, for which he was question’d in the high Commission Court, but he declined the jurisdiction, and moved the Court of Common Pleas therein from whence he obtain’d two rules; one requiring the Commissioners to shew cause why a prohibition should not be granted: The other, that if they proceede further before cause shown, a prohibition should be awarded: This gave great offence to the Bishop of London, who complained to the King thereof, and he by my Lord Keeper figur’d his displeasure to the Judges for their proceeding herein, whereas they desist’d, and the Court consisting of eight Bishops, and four other Commissioners gave the sentence following, against him to be Fined to the the King twelve thousand pound; to stand oblig’d in the penalty of twenty thousand pound, never to inhabit or come near his Neice any more; and to be committed to Prison, or put in sufficient bail, till he he and his Neice shall have done penance at Paul’s-Cross, and at great Sainte Matre at Cambridge in a day appointed by the Court. Never was delinquent condur’d there by, a more solemn and venerable Condictory: many spake excellent well, but Sir Henry Martyn, whose cutomse it was before to out-go others, did then farrise himself.

About the midst of July the Marquefs of Hamilton arriv’d in the Oder with six thousand foot, well arraigned and furnish’d with Artillery for the Service of the King of Sweden and with three hundred thousand Dollers in money, he himself came to the King at his Leiger at Wurben on the Elbe. The King receiv’d him very respectfull, and shew’d him all the fortifications, and the preparations he had made against the Count de Tilly, who was March’d as far as Monument towards him; so that he had no leisure to entertaine him as he would, but after he had form’d his instructions he was dismis’d, and his forces were employ’d to Joyne with General Banier; he told him he was very sorry his Army arriv’d in such parts of the Country that were ruin’d, in that both the Armies had liv’d there above a year before, but within a while, he said, they should have better quarters, but the men were almost all lost whilst they were there finding not only same to confume them, but the Plague also, which did so rage that two hundred a week of them dy’d, and they were much weakened, but those that surv’d did good service, and their coming at this time was great furtherance of the King of Sweden’s cause, for thereby a good part of the Enemies forces were for feare of them diverted.

About five years since certaine Feoffees were intrusted to purchase in impropriations with their own and the money of other well disposed persons, and with the profit thereof to set up and maintain preaching Ministers in places of gratefull need, where preaching was much wanting, whereupon in a short while many great fumes were advanced. There are in England Nine thousand two hundred and eighty four Parish Churches endowed with Glebe and Tyth, but of these when these trustees entred on their work three thousand eight hundred forty and five, were either appropriated to Bishops, Cathedrals, and Colledges or impropriated as lay feyes to private persons, as formerly belonging to Abbies, to purchase which least they had made such profferts that it was believed itiny fifty years rather purchasers than money would have been wanting to them. The King was prevailed on that this project would prove dangerous to the Church, and My the Attorney General at the latter end of the year exhibited a Bill in the Exchequer Chamber against the Feoffees.

It was charged against them that they diverted the charity wherewith they were intrusted, for being by their Feoffment directed to settle preaching Ministers in distant obscure places where preaching was most wanting; they first setled a morning Lecture at St. Ambulines in London. To this they answered, that London being the chiefest place from whence their charity derived, it was fit they should have some benefit of their own hounty, and that they were not so confined to the uses in their Feoffment, but that in their choice they might reflect as well on the eminen-

The King of Sweden, which hapned at that memorable

Senat the Paligrave was in hopes of recovery, when news came to him of the death of the King of Sweden, which retarded him in his resolution, till after the 29 of the same Moneth, not the rendition of Frankendall then ready to
to be surrendred to the English Officers then before it any what moderate his griev; the Earl of Leicester was first sent Ambassador to the King of Denmark to concile the death of that kings Grand-Mother Sophia Queen Dowgner of Denmark, and to demand the demand of the last part of what the left as due to him and the Queen of Bohemia in right of Queen Anne their Mother, which first part amounted to a hundred and fifty thousand pound Sterling; The King of Denmark told the Ambassador when the accapt was stated of what was due in him in the name of thirty thousand pound a month from the Crown of England upon the contract made in the year 1625. towards the support of his Army, he would make up the re, so that the Earl was faine to return re infell. The King having had great experience of the ability and faithfulness of the Lord Viscount Wentworth (whom he had lately raised to that honour and made him Lord President of the North) made him Deputy and chief Governor of the Realm of Ireland, where affairs were in much disorder by the influence of the Romish Catholiques who did not use moderately the Kings clemency to them in relaxation of the Rigor of some penall Statutes; they are indeed a people that cannot bear any indulgence towards them with temerity but are too apt to be alinated in the apprehension of favour to their own detriment and the scandal of the Kings protestant Subjects. On the second of December this year the King fell sick of the small Pox, but there was so little malignity in the distemper that he soon recoverd; The same moneth the Earl of Arundell was sent to the Hague in Holland to the Queen of Bohemia, to concile the death of her husband and follicite her and her Childrens Journey into England, which at this time the relafed because of the griefe the lay under, and an indisposition of health that made her unfit in the Winter fenton to take such a Journey.
The King had this yeare a great check to the prosperity of his Government, which first appeared in Scotland, where some factous and le-ditions male-contents began to cause some feeds of discontent, which afterwards encreased to that degree, as well neare destroyed the prosperity and happiness of these flourishing Kingdomes,
on this occasion:
In the minority of King James, the Lands of Cathedral Catches, and religious Houses, which had been settled on the Crowne, by Act of Parliament, were shared among the Lords and great men of that Kingdom ( by the Convnience of the Earle of Murray, and some other of the Gents ) in the minority of King James, to make them fuse unto their side. And they being thus possst of the said Lands, with the realties and tyers belonging to these Ecclesiasfical Corporations, lend it with pride & infolence enough in their severall territries, holding, the Clergy to small stipends, and the poor peant under a miferable Vaffalage and subjexion to them.

King CHARLES, ingaged in War at his first coming to the Crowne, and having little aid from thence for the maintenance of it, by the advice of his Counsell of that Kingdom, was put upon a course of reforming those lands, Tythes, ad Regalities into his owne hands, to which the present possessors could pretend no other Tytle, then the unjust usurpation of their Ancestors.
This he endeavoured first by an Act of Renovation, but that course not being like to proceed he followed in the way of a legal process, which drew on a Commission for surrendring of Su-periories and Tythes, to be retaken from the King in such conditions, as might bring some profit to the Crowne, some augmentation to the Clergy, and the more ease and benefit to the Common people. But these occupates chose rather to exploe their Country to the danger of a publick ruine, than to part with any of that power, which they had exercised on their vaffals (as they commonly called their tenants;) and thereupon conspird together, to oppose the King in any thing, that should be effect'd in the following Parliament, which had Relation to the Church or church-affaires.

But because Religion and the care thereof is commonly the belt bait, to catch the vulgar they must finde out some other meanes, to divert the King from the prosecuting of that Commision, then the confideration of their owne peronall and private Interest, and they found meanes to do it on another occasion, which was brieftly this.

King F.AMES S., from his first coming to the Crowne, had a designe, to bring the Kirk of Scotland to an Uniformity with the Church of England, both in Government and form of worship. And he proceeded so far as to sette Episcopacy amongst them, naming thirteene new Bishops for so many Episcopall Sees, as had been ancieantly in that Church; three of which received consecration from the Bishops of England, and conferred it on the rest of their Prebythen at their coming home: which Bishops
he arm'd also with a power of high Commision, the better to keep downe the intolent and dominating Spirit of the Presbyterians. In order to the other he procured an Act, to be pulled in the Assembly at Aberdeen, Anno 1616. for composing a Liturgy, and extracting a new Book of Canons out of the scattered Acts of their old Assemblys, and at an Assembly, held at Perth, Anno 1618. he obtained an order for receiving the Communion kneeling, for admiring Baptism, and the Lords Supper in private houses in cases of extreme necessity, for Episcopall confirmation, and finally, for the celebrating the Anniversary of our Saviour Birth, his Passione, Refurrection, & Ascension, and the coming down of the Holy Ghost. All which he got to be confirmed in Parliament.

So far that wise King had advanced the work of Uniformity before his engaging in the cause of the Palatinate: his breach with Spain, and the war, which did issue upon it, had took of his thoughts from prosecuting that designe, which his Son being more intangled in wars abroad, and difficulties at home, had no time to finishe till he had

had tested his affairs, and attained to some measure both of power and glory, but being it was a barreness, which was to be asced leaflessly, and by degrees he deferred the execution of his purpose, till he fell into Scotland, towards which he went this year about the middle of May, and arrived at Edinburghe the tenth of June, and on the eighteenth following, his Coronation was celebrated with great solemnity; he had before summoned a Parliament, to meet at Edinburghe, which assembled a while after the Coronation, and he called an Act of Ratification of all that had been done by his Father, and proceeded to them, determining, as soon as that was passed, to go in hand with introducing a public Liturgie, in the effecting whereof he found a stronger opposition in the Parliament, then he had reason to expect, but carried it at last by a far major part of that assembly.

This gave him the first taste of their disaffection to his Person and Government, but he went forward notwithstanding, in pursuit of those purposes, which he brought thither with him, for not long after his return into England, he gave order to the Duke of his Chappell Royal in Edinburghe, for Prayers to be said therein, according to the English Liturgie, that a Commission should be had every Month, and all Communicants to receive the Sacrament on their knees, that he who officiated, if he were a Bishop, should perform it in his Rocchet, and other Episcopall Robes, and in his Surplice a common Prebbyter; And that not only the Lords of his Council, but the Lords of the Seifion, and as many of the principal Magistrates of that City as could conveniently, should not fail of their attending the divine Service there, on Sundays and Holidays, for by this means he gave himself, self-nombre possible hopes, that the English Liturgie taking a probationer ship in the Chappell Royal, might finde a plausible entertainment in the Churches of Edinburghe, and be received by degrees in all the rest of the Kingdom.

But the Presbyterian Senec, not ignorant of the Kings intentions, intimated into the minds of the confciouc of the compoin, that this was a design subjett to Kirk to the Rights and Ceremonies of the Church of England, which they said was superflitious, and therefore that it did behove them to stand together, as one man, to oppose their entrance.

The Lords and Gentry of that Realme, who feared nothing so much as the Commission of Sirenders, before mentioned, laid hold of this occasion also, and they being seconded by male contented Spirits, who had not found the King to be as prodigall of his favour to them, as his Father hath been before, endeavoured to poeifie them with fear and jealousies, that Scotland was to be reduced to the form of a Province, and governed by a Deputy or Lord Lieutenant, as Ireland was, the like was done also by some Lords of Secret Council, who before had governed, as they liked, and thought their power now diminished, and their persons under some neglect, by the placing of a Lord President over them, and the direct in chief.

So that the People generally being fool'd into this opinion, that both their Christian and Civill Liberties were in no small danger, became capable of any impression, which the Presbyte-rian faction could imprint upon them, which visibly appeared by a violent and seditious Libell, published in the yeare 1634, wherein the King not onely was charg'd with altering the Government of that Kingdom, but traduced for very strong inclinations to the Religion of the Church of Rome, the chiefe abetter whereof (for the Author was not to be found) was the Lord Palmerton, for which he was legally committed and condemned of Treason, but pardoned by the Kings great Goodness, though by his following actions he deferred not that favour. The Fire thus breaking out in Scotland, it was no Marvel, if it had held laid on England also, the discontented of both Nations working themselves about this time into a body, and from henceforth communicating their councils, and designs unto one another. As will hereafter appeare.

This yeare ended with some fires in Somersettshire, where some of the Justices were much offended, at the keeping of wakes, Church-ales, and Bride-ales on the Lords day, which occasioned many disorders and misdemeanors to be committed; and therefore they moved the Lord Chief-Justice Richardson, and Baron Denham, according to the former, then in their Circuit in the Lent Vacation to make some Order therein; these in compliance with their desire, make an order on the 19th of May, (founded on former preadins signed by the Chief Justice Papham, in the later end of Queen Elizabeths Reigne) there in suppressing such Revels, in regard of the infinite number of inconveniences, daily arising by means thereof, injuring the Confiables to deliver a Copy thereof to the Minifter of every Parish, who on the first Sunday in February, and likewise the two first Sundays before Easter, was to publish the same every yeere; This was look'd on by the Bishops, as an usurpation of Ecclefeiatical Jurisdiction, and they therefore procured a Commission, directed to the Bishop of Bath, and other Divines, to enquire into the manner of publishing this order, and the carriage of the Judges in the Bishops; notwithstanding which the Chief-Justice, at the next Assizes, gave them charge against these Revels, and required a true account of the publication and execution of the former order, punishing some perrons for the breach thereof, after whose returne the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury sent for him, and told him it was the Kings pleasure, he should revolve his order, as he would answer it at his peril, which he did at the next Assizes, (but with this Limitation, as much as in him lay,) but this ended not here, for the Justices of that County hearing of this dealing with the Chief-Justice, made an humble Supplication to the King, for suppressing the aforesaid Assemblies, which induced the King to renew his Fathers Declaration, about lawful Sports, on the Lords-day published in the 16th yeare of his Reign; hoping thereby, by the restraint therein directed, to hinder the abuse of those Recreations, and to free the Confciouc of his Subjectes from those frivolous yokes, which some Divines about that time endeavoured to introduce, maintaining the indemissible morality of the fourth Commandment, and consequently the necessary obligation of the Jewish Sabbath, for it was in the declaration prescribed,
The Reign of King Charles the First.

1. That these proffes should be no impediment, or less to the publique any of the day.
2. That no refusals should be capable of the benefit of them.
3. That none should use them, that were not distinctly present at all divine effects which the day required. And
4. That the benefit should redound to none, but such as kept themselves in their own Parishes.

The publication of this, however piously intended, gave great offence and the rather, because, though there was nothing express in the declaration that the Minister of the Parish should be prefixed to the publishing, yet some Ministers, for refusing the reading thereof, were some suspended as Office & Benefices, some deposed, and more maligned in the high-commision; the truth is the ill reception it had among the people, in the former publication of it, in the time of the Kings Father, might have deterred the like at that time, for that the first observation of the Lords day was much increased since that time, though it was not known in England till the year 1595, when Dr. Bond first published it in his Book of Sabbath Delights; nor in Ireland, till just twenty years after, when it was inserted in the Articles of Religion, there established, nor in Scotland till above twenty years after that, and at this day in Germany shooting in longbowes, tennis, bowling, and other parts of that kind are used, and the like in all foreign places, where the Protestant Religion is professed, but it was generally disliked, here many complaints being heard by divers books occasion to be worse, under the protection of these parts, permitted to them: for though liberty on the Lords-day may be so limited in the Notions of learned men, so to make it lawful, it is very difficult so to confine it to the actions of the people, but that they will degenerate into licentiousness, so that the declaration after a while dried off itself, and was withised by many prudent men of that time, that it had never lived.

The Merchants of London, and other parts made great complaints at the end of the last year, of the obstructions of Trade, for want of good Convoyes, to secure them against the Turks and other Pyrates, that infetled our Coaft, which made the King very earnest in making preparations, to make himself strong at Sea, to which he was the more inclined for the vindication of his just Authority of the Sovereignty of the British seas, which was not only annually usurped by the French, but the right it self disputed by a tradit, written by Dr. Grotius, a learned, but the illusion of that time, called Mare liberum, but whilst the King by his power omitted not to maintain his right, our learned Selden, by his pen encountered Grotius, in a learned book called Mare clausum, wherein he did not only effert the Sovereignty or Dominion of the British seas to the Crown of England, but clearely proved by constant and continual præfite, that the Kings of England used to levy money from the Subjects, for the providing of Ships and other necessaries, to maintain that Sovereignty which did of right belong unto them, before the writing of this trit, the King had well advised how to enable himself with Treasure, to support his authority, and defend the Kingdomes by the industry of Nay, his Attorney-General, a most indefatigable Inquisitor ship money expended by the late Authority of the King, very properly.

The safety and preservation of the Kingdom did require it of him, and that such aid had been heretofore levyed in the same year in which the Kings that took it, had received subsidies in the way of Parliament, for which he gave this reason; whereas a King of England wants money to support his own expenses, for the conducting his Dominions in foreign Countries, or otherwise to advance his honour in the eye of the world, he ought to be beholding to his Subjects for it by and in Parliament; but when the Kingdom is in danger, and the safety of the Subject concern'd therein, he may by our lands raise such sums of money as he thinks expedient for the preventing of the danger, and providing for the publique safety of himself and his; And therupon by this advice, writs were iss'd and directed to all the Port Townes and maritime Counties of the Kingdom to set out a certain number of Ships furnished with mariners, ammunition, victuals and all other necessaries for defence of the Realme, whereby the King had quickly equipped a very good fleet, though not great enough for the end intended, which occasioned the like writs to be iss'd out to all the counties in the Kingdom, in the year 1636. of which more hereafter.

This year was unfortunate to the Swedes in Germany, for, General Arnhelm was constrained to retire, and Barneveld, General of Friesland, was restored by the Imperiality General Albrigerin plain at Lauen, and the whole Army totally routed by the King of Hungary, and the Cardinal Jansen at the battle of Nottingham, after which ensued the surrender of that Town, and the conquest of the Dukeedom of Wittenburg, whose Duke fled to Strasburg, but though this gave a great step to the Swedish gentry, yet it brought a little repose to Germany, for shortly after this success, a peace was concluded though it lasted not long.

In Ireland the Lord Deputy Wentworth, was very busy in setting the quiet of that Nation and because popery was chiefly encreas'd for want of able Ministers, and that occasion'd by the poor maintenance they had in most places, he procured of the King by the mediation of Archbishop Langet, that all the impositions then in the Crown should be referrest to the Church, to a great diminution of the Royal Revenue, and that the King was never capable of any loss by himself, if thereby he gain might redound to God in his Ministers.

On Candlemas night, the Gentlemen of the four Inns of Court, presented a Mafque to the King and Queen at kitchell, riding in Stately Chariots from the Temple thither, it was indeed a Pompous and Magnificent shew, but made more glorious, by a long train of Christian Captives, who having been many years inflav'd in the chains of bondage, were sent for a present to the King, by the Heireffe or Emperor of Morocco in testimony of the assistence received from our King, whose fleets assistst in the taking of Saliz then in Rebellion against him, and in enmity to all the world, it being a nest of Pyrates, by whose deftuction

Destruction commerce was very free in those parts.

This year died Sir Richard Baff, Earl of Portland, Lord high Treasurer of England, a great statesman, but despised to be too much a favorer of the Religion of Rome, in which he was reputed to have dyed, and some of his Children were educated therein, his place for the present was intrusted to Commissioners, till a fit person could be found to whom to be left.

It was now the year 1635. when a gallant fleet was set out by the side of ship money, under the Earl of Lindsey, Admiral of the Fleet, and Sir Evelyn Dover, Vice Admiral; whereby our trade was not only made secure by fostering the Seas of prey, but the King became very formidable to all his Neighbours, and by his interception this summer Flanders was preserved, which had else probably been swallowed up by the French and Hollanders, for the King of Spain could not bring 8000 men into the field and leave his Garrisons provided, the French King and they were in confederacy for that purpose, by which it was agreed that he should invet Dunkirk with an Army, whilst the Hollanders did block it up with their Navy, that so all passages into the Country being fecured, they might the more easily (about the inward parts) which design had taken effect, if the English fleet had not dislodged the Hollanders from before the Town and releaved it, and the French by their Infolencies at Diet and Telement inflamed and encouraged the peoples heats against them, for before they had been so practis'd on by the Holland faction that few or none would arm to repulse their enemies.

September the 29th, the Earl of Arundel brought up to London out of Shropshire, one Tho. Pott, as the wonder of the time for the prodigy of his age, he had almost reach'd to the hundred and sixties year, and in all likelihood had outlived that time some years, had not to tedious a Journey and the over violent agitation of his body together with the change of his womed course of dye, accelerated his end.

Charles Prince Elector of Palatine came into England at this time to visit his Uncle, & to consider with them for his restitution to the Palatinate, and a while after his arrival, his brother Prince Rupert came also.

The Kings reputation was very high, and the Hollanders a wise and indefatigable people took all occasions to endeavour themselves to him, at this time they sent an Ambassadoer over to congratulate with the King and Queen, for the birth of their second Daughter the Princes Eliz. being and to ingratiate themselves the more, they sent by him a very rich present, a maffive piece of Ambersgold, two huge basons of China, a noble Clock, the workmanship of Raphine the Emperor, and some exquisite pieces of painting, of Titian and Vinciers, which were well accepted.

The King finding some inconvenience in the managing of his Treasury by Commissioners gave the office to the Bishop of London, which was a very good chance, for whereas most of the men before these latter times, had rather revered themselves in their Office; the King raising themselves to great Estates and dignities themselves, by, he thought fit to choose this Church man, who having not Family to raise, nor wife and Children to provide for, might better manage the incomes of the Treasury to his advantage, then they had been formerly, and so for proved, for by his care of the revenue, the King began to be rich and he was so well temper'd a disposition, that he gave exceeding great content to all the people.

The Kings Naval preparations were very great this year; The Fleet consisting of sixty good Ships, under the Command of the Earle of Northumberland now made Lord high Admiral of England, who laying Northward and finding a great number of Dutch Buffes fishing on our Coast, he feiz'd on many of them and dispersed the rest. This made a great conformation amongst the people of the United Provinces, many of whole subsistence depended on this fishing, wherefore upon a supplication from the States to the King, they had permission granted by him, for he was more displeased at their presumption in doing it as in their right and in conempt of his authority in the Dominions of these Seas, then at the thing done; As the Navy was greater this year then before, So the charge of it was much augmented, wherefore whereas in the last year the Ship wages had been but small only to the maritime Counties, they were now offered to all the Counties in England, and the people generally paid what rates and assessments were set upon them in pursuice thereof, but some few refused, and many of the Clergy complained that they were unreasonably rated by their neighbours, some of them at a sixth, and others at a fourth part of the tax of the parish; for satisfaction of the refusers, The King wrote to the Judges for their opinion, who are by their oaths their proper Counsellors in all difficulties concerning the law, and to ease the Clergy; he wrote to all the Sheriffs of England, requiring that the Clergy paid of Parsonages, should not be added above a tenth part of the land rate of their several parishes and that consideration should be had for vicars accordingly.

The Letter to the Judges was.

To our trusty and well beloved, St. John Bramham Knight, Chief Justice of our Bench; St. John Finch Knight, Chief Justice of our Court of Common Pleas; St. Humphrey Davenport Knight, Chief Baron of our Court of Exchequer: And to the rest of the Judges of our Court of Kings Bench, Common Pleas, and the Barons of our Court of Exchequer.

Charles Rex.

Toll and well beloved we greet you well; Taking into our Privy consideration that the honour and safety of this our Realm of England, the preservation whereof is only entrusted to our care, was and is more directly concerned then in late or former times as well by divers Counts and attempts to take from us the dominion of the seas, of which we are sole Lords, and right owners, or Proprietors, and the Gulf whereof would be of great danger and peril to this Kingdom, and other our Dominions, and many other matters...

To which, the Judges delivered their opinions as followeth.

May it please your most excellent Majesty
Wee have according to your Majesty's command severally and every man by himself, and all of us together, taken into serious con Aeration, the case and questions signed by your Majesty, and included in your letter. And we are of opinion, that when the good and safety of the Kingdom in general is concerned, and the whole Kingdom in danger, your Majesty may by writ, under your great seal of England, command all the Subjects of this your Kingdom at their charge to provide and furnish such number of Ships with men, victuals, and munition, and for such time as your Majesty shall think fit, for the defence and safeguard of the Kingdom from such peril and danger. And by that Law your Majesty may compel the doing thereof, in case of refusal or refractoriness. And we are also of opinion that in such case your Majesty is the sole Judge both of the danger, and when, and how the same is to be prevented and avoided.

These opinions being subscribed by all the Judges, were enrolled in all the Courts of Westminster Hall, and the King thought he had now warrant sufficient to proceed against the defaulters, the chiefest whereof was one Mr. Hambden a Gentleman of Buckinghamshire, who being summoned by process appeared and required Oyer of the Ship-writs, which being read, he demurred in law thereunto, and demanded the opinion of all the Judges upon the legal sufficiency thereof. This great case came to be argued in the Exchequer chamber, and the major part of the Judges delivered their opinions in favour of the writs, and accordingly the Barons gave Judgement against Mr. Hambden: yet did not the question altogether to repose, but Master Hambden obverting that two of the Judges were. Crooke and Histon, were of a contrary sense, held up the contest still though all in vain, all his iniquity not gaining him the least acquittal, until a higher power interposed.

There was an Imperial dyet held this year, for the election of a King of the Romans, and the King sent thither the Earl of Arundel his Ambassador to Ferdinand the third about the restitution of the Prince Palatine. But that Embasy could effect no thing, for the Duke of Bavaria, who had in his possession the upper Palatinate, and the electoral dignity would by no means hear of any propositions to part with either, But the lower Palatinate he might have had upon some terms which the Emperor proposed: but our Ambassador was not instructed to accept of any thing in dismission.

Diminution of the Electors Right: so that the Palegrave had no fruit of this Embassy, yet were his hopes a little rais'd by an overture of marriage made at this time betwixt the King of Poland, and one of his Sithers, which was almost effected by the legation of Prince Radziwili here in England. But the Emperor privately obstructed it, and by the information of the Jesuites, so instigated the Clergy of Poland against it, because of Fanatic Religion, that the Treaty was broken off, and the King afterwards married the Lady Cecilia, second Sister to the Emperor.

On the 12th of January Mr. William Prynne an Utter barrister of Lincoln's Inn., Doctor John Sibbick, Dr. of Physicke, and Henry Burton a Munition, were confined in the Star-chamber.

The offence of Prun was for writing & dispersing Libels against the established Discipline of the Church of England: That of Sibbick for inveighing against the proceeding of the High Commission against him, before which he had been accused for writing a Bookke, called Flagellum Pompificis & Episcoporum, Latitiudinam, and committed to the Gatehouse, in which time besides his arraigning the high Commission Court, he published a Latin Apologia (called by the Court a Libell) ad Presbytari Anglicanos, and a Letany very virulent against them. That of Mr. Burton was, for publishing a Sermon, which he preached on the fifth of November, before wherein the Prelates were urged for introducing several innovations into Divine worship, which was deemed a Libell: For these offenses, the judgement of the Court was, That they should lose their Eares in the Palace yard at treflminster, and each of them fine five thousand pounds to the King, and imprisoned during life in three remote places. Finch, the chief Justice, moved the Court, that it might be added to Mr Prun's confiure, to be branded in each Cheek with S. L. for sconderous Libeller, which was consented to, for they were the more severe against him, because he had been an Enemy before in the like kind, having been three years before confined to loose his Eares on the Pillory, for writing a Bookke, called Hiftory-mafs, or the History of Stage-Players, wherein some indelicat reflections were taken to be on the Queen herself, as too much delighted in Masques.

The Prince Elector, and his brother Prince Rupers went to Holland about this time in order to a defigne, which was put in practice the next year, to attempt something with an Army in the Palatinat; The Affiance and credit of the Kings Parle, did so prevail under hand with the Prince of Orange and the States of the United Provinces, that a small beginning of an Army was raiyed, with which they advanced into Westphalia, and besieged Lemmingen: But Hatzfeld one of the Emperor Generals came so looone upon them, that they effected nothing, but were forced to fight to great disadvantage, having had 2000 men slaine, and most of the rest dispersed; and many Prisoners taken, amongst which were Prince Rupers and the Lord Crown, the Prince Elector himself eloped by flight, and retired to the Hague.

William, Bishop of Lincoln, was on the 11th of July confined in the Star-chamber, for tampering to suborn witnesses, to be fined 10000; to the King, and imprisoned during the Kings pleasure, being referred to the high Commission for a further confiure: The occasion whereof we shall briefly relate:

This Bishop, after the great Scale some ten years since had been taken from him, retired to Reghin in Hungary, there, where he lived very hospitably, and had great concourse, Amongst others St. John Lambe, Doctor Sibbick, with Allen and Burdon, two Professors, came to visit him, and being with Dinner with him, there was much discourse about Non-Conformity, and the Bishop knowing the to be busy men in the prosecution of such, advised them to take off their heavy hand from them, informing them, that the King intended to use them hereafter with more mildness, as a considerable party, having great influence on the Parliament, without whose concurrence he could not supply his necessities, adding that he had communicated this unto him by his owne mouth.

A few yeares after, Lambe, upon some difference with the Bishop, informed him against him for reviling the Kings Secrets, whereupon an Information was put in against him in the Star-chamber; To which he put in an especial answer, declaring how all was contriv'd by a conspiracy and combination of Lambe, Sibbicks, Allen and Burdon, out of an intent to advance themselves and their friends, for not permitting them to Poll and Pill the Kings Subjects in Army, for their parte in their Ecclesiasticall courts, by haling them into their Nest; Ex officia mea, without any previous Complaint under an imaginary color of Publickisme. To this answer the Kings Attorney rejoyned in Iffue, admitting the Bishop to prove his special matters, who proceeded to the examination of his witnesses therein: but after a while the Attorney being somewhat resists in the prosecution: one Richard Kivers was entertained to be the Bishops Procutor, who had found out, that one John Prigion a Rector of Lincoln and Leicesters, was a most material witness in the Bishops defence: And the credit of this Testimony he designed to invalidate, by charging him with getting a Ballad, on one Eliz. Hodson: The Bishop thought it behoved him to support the Reputation of Prigion, and engaged himself more zealously therein, than was conceived consistent with the gravity of so great a Prelate, to such who knew not that he and some Doctor Morris, were the only persons of note present at his table, where the discourse above mentioned paffed between him and Sr. John Lambe. This Ballad was the Seffion at Lincolne ordered to be kept by Prigion, as the reputed father thereof, but at a Seffions following, that order was reversed, and the child fathered upon one Borne, and Prigion acquitt'd; in the doing whereof, it is said Penel and Owen, two Agents of the Bishop, did maneace and tampete with the witnesses: But at a third Seffion, Prigion was again charg'd and Borne freed: yet this last order, being upon a Certiorari brought to the Kings-Bench, was there quaff'd as insufficient, and Prigion was after cleared from the child: Kivert nevertheless in the traverse of this affaire, let fall the first information in the Star-chamber, and proceeded upon that, whereon the Sentence before named was grounded, etc.

The Reign of King Charles the First.

To this proportion the King agreed, and the book 1637 fent by King James formerly into Scotland, was remitted to England, and after many tedious consultations and some alterations, made by advice of diverse of the Bishops, and Clergy of Scotland, then here it was prefixed, printed and published and sent into Scotland: The Bishops and Noblemen of the Kings Council, then present at Edinburgh, resolved, That the book should be first read in the great Church, on the before mentioned 3d of July, and on the Sunday before notice thereof was publicly given in the Church:
There were present both the Arch Bishops, many of the Privy Council, and others of the best Quality in Edinburgh, besides a great concourse of ordinary people: Amongst this multitude,
there appeared no signe of trouble, but no fonder
was the book opened by the Deane of Edinburgh, but a Number of the meaner fort with clapping their hands, and outcryes, made a great uproare and one of them, called Jane or Jane Goddis, (yet living at the writing of this relation) flung a little f-stone, flied, wherein the fite, at the Deane head, saying, You know false thief, difthen say the Malls at my Lipt, which was followed with a great noisy and confusion, that not any one could either hear or be heard, whereupon the Bishop of Edinburgh flung into the Pulpit, and hoping to appease them by putting them in mind, that the place, in which they were, was holy ground, and by interesting them to desist from the profanation of it, they were the more enraged, throwing at him curgills, flooes, and what else was in the way, even to the endangering of his life: Upon this the Arch Bishop of St. Andrews Lord Chancellor, called downe the Provost and Bailiffs of the city from their Sates to their affiliance, who (not without some difficulty) put the unruly people out of the Church, and made falt the doores: This done, the Deane proceded in reading the booke, the multitude in the meane while rapping and pecling the windowes with ftones, to disturb the exercise, but not withstanding all their clamor, the Service was ended, but not the people rage, who wanting the loop of his Lodging, whereupon he fell upon him, as he had beene refused by a strong hand) he had probably perished by their violence.

The same morning the Service Book was read in the next Church to St. Gyles, though not without noyle and tumult, yet not so great as in the other: In the Gray-Friers Church Mr. Rainfey refused to read it, and was attacled and supppled for the fane, but the Elefet Bishop of Argyll, his Colleague began to read it, but was interrupted, curfild and exalted against, that he was forced to give over;
In the Cowfie Church
Rollack one of the Preachers, who the Sunday before at the intimation of the reading had much commodated the Booke, and undertaken this day to read it, upon notice, how it was received in the Church of St. Gyles, broke the promise he made to read it, thinking it the safer course, to leave himselfe to the Cencup of all men for his levity, then offend the multitude, whose favour he sought; but he was supppled also.

The morning thus paft, the Council assembled at the Lord Chancellors Lodging, and sent for
for the Provost and Bailiffs, to advise with them how to prevent the like tumults in the afternoon, which they promised to endeavor, and it was so effected, That the book was read in the Church of St Giles, and some other Churches that afternoon, without any such disturbance as it had in the morning: onely the Bishop of Edinburg in his return to his lodging was rudely treated by the people, both by execrations and other ways.

All this time the Magistrates and Council of the City feared so to dislike those tumultuous proceedings, that when their Ministers craved a dispensation from reading the Book, until security were given for the Safeguard of their persons, They drew up an obligatory Act, both for indemnity of their persons, and also for their settled maintenance; and whilt this was doing, to express their zeale herein, they sent two particular letters to the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, into England, in which they defined him "To recommend to the King their fidelity to his "Service, and to undertake for them, their zeale "and forwardness for setting the peaceable prac- "tice of the Service-book; This undertaking of the Magistrates of Edinburg, made the King re- muc much of his intended Rigor against the offenders in the first uproar, hoping by that his Cle- mency to oblige them the more in their duty to- wards him: And now the Council were in con- sultation about appointing a new day, for renew- ing the exercise of the Service-Book, to which the Bishops, Ministers, and Magistrates agreed: But before the time came, The Magistrates and people were so praticed on by the silenced Ministers Rollie and Ramfey, and one Hender- son, a silenced Reader, that they began to relent of their former promises, and presented to the Council a Petition, requesting that the Service- book might not be imposed upon them, until the Kings Pleasure should be further known; which petition they alladged, they were neces- sitated to present by the Example and encoura- gement of all ranks from all parts of this King- drome; And the ministers also petitioned, that the orders, whereby they were enjoyned to re- ceive the Book might be suspended: There was nothing else of publike note done from Lam- mas (which is the day on which the Long Vacat- ion there begins,) till the first of October, for the time of Harvett drew all sorts of people (save the Citizens) into the Country. But so soon as Harvett was done, the Designers of the fol- lowing disorders had so corresponded, That the conflux of Nobility, Gentry, Ministers and Bishops, for so all parties came, to be very demonstra- tions at Edinburg, in expostulation of some great matters of Religion to be treated on in Council, at their first appointed day of sitting, and they were so tumultuous in their behaviour, that a pre- sent insurrection was feared, which forced the Council, on the 17th of October, the first ap- pointed day of assembling, to make three Procla- mations for appeasing the tumults in Edinbur- gh.

The second for removing the Steven, which is it with us called the Term, from Edinburg to Lith-gon, and the third for calling in, and burning a sedition book, enjoined A Dispute against the English Papis Ceremonies, obtruded upon the Kirk of Scotland.

These Proclamations rather fomented then extinguished the flame then began, for the next day the Bishop of Gallows being to fit with the Chief Justice upon some speciall Business in the Council Houfe, he was pursuad with vehement rayings all along the street to the Council-door, where he was no sooner got, but they surround- ed the house, and demanded the delivery of him to them: The Lord Treasurer advertised of the Bishops danger, came to his releif, but being got in, he was in no better plight then the Bishop, for the fury of the people thall increased, here- upon the Provost and Council and the City were called, to suppress the tumult, but their condi- tion was the same as the others, for they were in- compassed by the people, and threaten with fear of their lives to sign a paper, First, That they should adhere to them in opposition of the Service- book; Secondly, to restore to their places Rollie, Ramfey and Henderson; Upon notice of this, the Treasurer and the Earl of Triegon went in per- son to the towne Council-house, where they find the heate some-what abated, because the Magistrates had signd the Paper, and they were going back in hopes, that the disorders would be so far quieted upon this Condeccentia, that they might let the Bishop free: But no sooner had they appeared in the street, but they were affaulted, and the Treasurer had his white staff, and Cloak taken from him, and hardly got into the Council-house: In this great hazard, the Lords sent to some of the Popular Nobile- men, and Gentry in the Town, disaffected to the Service-Book, to come to their ayd, who readily came, as was desired, and they peace- ably guided the Lords to Hallywood-hous, and the Bishop to his Lodgings.

The Lords of the Council, after the tumults were dissolved, that very afternoon commanded another Proclamation to be made at the Croffe at Eden- burg, for the repreffing fish disorders for the time to come, but to this little obedience was yielded, for whereas the first tumults had been acted by theicum and brain of the people, and was decayed by all the better fort: This second was the fact of the most substantial Citizens (ex- cept the Magistrates,) who were now growing so in- fluent, that they sent Commissioners to the Council-table, to require, that their silenced Ministers and Reader might be restored, and have audience for what was promised to them by the Magistrates at the last interebration; and a while after, there were pretended to the Lord Chancellor and Council two Petitions; The first in the name of the Men, Women, children and Servants of Edinburg, against the Service-book; but the Second in the celloar and council in Edinburg,
Name of divers Noblemen, Gentry, Ministers and Burgesses, against the Service-book, and against the Book of Canons, as imposed contrary to Law (because not allowed by a general Assembly)
by the procurement of the Prelates, and there-fore they decline their authority, and crave they may not any of them fit in council, being parties

R e d
The Reign of King Charles the First.

1638 till their complainers be tried: This last petition was by the Council (sent to the King, who was so much displeased with it, that he refused to give any answer to it, but gave order to the Council, to signify to all his good Subjects his averments from Popery, and detestation of Superstition, the contrary whereof the heads of the motions had abused them with. The Council also finding Edinburg at this time a Seat of sedition, and disobedience to the King's authority, caused the Seifton to be adjourned from Libgoge (which was somewhat too near) to Sterling, about 24 miles distant, that so the disorderly multitude, there met together, might be dispersed by the necessary attendance of such as had any law business, where by the King's Command, The Lords of the Council published a Proclamation, for dispersing the great and dangerous multitude, yet together, and affiling the people of the Kings sincerity towards the Religion established in that Kingdom, upon the publication whereof, both at Sterling, Libgoge, and Edinburg, it was received, whilst it was reaching, with jeering, and after it was ended with a pronouncement against it by many Exiles, Lords, Ministers, and Burghers, and a conflux of all other sorts of people. And in pursuance of this Violation of the Kings authority, They began to invest themselves with the Maskes and Majesty of Sovereignty, erecting in Edinburg four principal Tables or Councils, one of the Nobility, another of the Gentry, a third of the Burghers, and a fourth of the Ministry, out of which there was a general Table of all Commissioners, chosen from the other four, who consulted of what was proposed to them by the other Tables, and what they did, was put in practice with strict obedience over all the Kingdom.

The first Act of this General Table, was the Renewing of a Confection of faith Subscribed by King James and his household, in the year 1550, taken after by all persons 1581. By Ordinance of the Lords of the Privy Council and Act of the General Assembly, and subscribed bygone 1590, by a new ordinance of council, and the definition of the general Affembly, with a general Band for maintenance of the true Religion, and the Kings person. This confection was called the negative confection, wherein the authority of the Pope, Transubstantiation, images, relics, open operations, mass, particular confection, prayer for the dead, and all the corruptions of the Church of Rome, as well as Doctrine, as outward rites are enumerated at large, and particularly abjured and a clause it inferred by which the Subscribers did call God to witness, that in their minds and hearts they did fully agree to the said confederation, and did not feign or diffame in any Sort.

The occasion of the first taking thereof, we shall make a little digression to relate, for the better understanding these proceedings.

The Earl of Lennox being nearer of blood to King James, always bred in France, in the year 1580, came from thence to visit him, and by his courteous and modest behaviour, grew so much into his favour, that he would not let him return thither, but gave him many preferences in Scotland. This gave a great disgust to some about the Court, and because he was of the Roman consecfession, the ministers exclaimed much against him, as sent from France to pervert the King in his Religion. The King to stay their declamations called the ministers to Edinburg together and acquainted them that he had taken great pains to convert his confederate, and had obtained his consent to take a minister into his house, which would serve to debarre Jesuaires and Roman Priests from him and win him by conference to a great liking of the Truth: Mr. David Lindsay a Minister of Leith, was held the fittest for this service, as well for his Skill in the French tongue, as for his moderation otherwise; by whose labours, the Earl was quickly brought to joyn hishelfe to the Church, and openly at St. Giles to renounce the Errors wherein he had been educated, yet did not this remove the jealousies of the people, which were incensed by the intercepting of certain discourses (sent from Rome, whereby the Romane Catholiques, were permitted to promise, Swear, subcribe and do what else should be required of them, so as in minde they continued to be firm, and did use their diligence to advance the Roman faith.

These dispensions being communicated to the King, he called in Chaplyaine Mr. John Craig, to form the confederation of Faith afo mentioned, which he himselfe for example to others, did publickly swear to and subscribe, and the like was done by the Earl and the whole Council and Court at that time, and it was afterward renewed at the times before expressed.

This confederation was not the National confederation of the Church of Scotland, for that was penned twenty years before, and containing the positive grounds of Divinity was ratified by Act of Parliament, in the year 1567, and registered in the body thereof, and confirmed by a number of succeeding Parliaments: but this Negative confederation, hath little more then the mandate of King James in his Minority (being but 15 years of age) on the occasion before recited, to which he himself afterwards manifested his dislike at the conference at Hampton Court saying, Mr. Craig the compellor thereof, with his Rennance, and Mr. De-serf, did disturb so many particulars, that Simple people were not able to conceive them, and so being amazed did either fall back to Popery, or remain still in their ignorance. If I (said he) should hold my self to that formes, the confederation of my Faith might be in my table-book and not in my head: but that which was an aggravation in the renewing of this confederation, by these confederates was not only the doing it without the authority of the King or his Council, but adding a Band or Covenant to it, farre different from the Band in the year 1590, wherein they make an interpretation of the confederation, contrary to the sense and true meaning of it, for the better carrying on of their intended reformation. The first Band was for maintenance of the Kings person and authority with their lives and fortunes in defence of the Gospel of Christ, and liberties of the Kingdom, but in this Covenant they Sweare to the mutual defence and offinance of another, with their beft council, bodies, means, and whole power against all persons whatsoever, wherein the King was not excepted.

This
This Confession and Covenant was first taken by the Tables, and afterwards imposed on all forts of people, wherein great violence and menaces were used in many places with beating, tearing of clothes, drawing blood, and exposing to thousands of injuries and reproaches, at Eden-burgh, St. Andrews, Aberdeen, Glasgow, Lan-rick, and many places more; all these Professors in Colleges, and Ministers, who, out of conscience towards God, and loyalty to the King, did either disavow others, or could not by their intreaties or threatenings be prevailed to it themselves; The Laws were positive against this manner of Leaguing; it being expressly declared in two Acts of Parliament, to wit: Act 13. and Parliament. anno Reg. Mari. All. 75. That all Leagues of subjects amongst themselves without the privity and approbation of the King, to be Sedition, and the Authors & abettors of them to be punished as movers of Sedition: yet so great was the transportation of Zeal in the people inflamed by the inflations of the chiefs of the confederates, that the Law could take no place.
All professors in colleges, and Ministers that resisted to subscribe their Covenant were removed,
for many good men that disliked the tumultuary way of offering it, were also clandestinely, at the interpretation by the Tables put upon it, for they declared, That this Confession was to be interpreted and ought to be understood of all the pretended Novations, no less then if every one of them had been exprest in the said Confession: by which, the five articles of Perth before published in the year 1618, concerning kneeling at the sacrament, private communion to the Sick, private baptism, confirmation of children and Observation of Festivals, as also the Service book, the book of Canons, the High-Commission, things which Mr. Craig never heard of (nor perhaps imagined to be wrong,) so that they made the living swear what was the minde of the dead, for in that conference, their Romish corruptions were only abjured which in that time had infected the Church: These 2-acts nevertheless when some eminent Ministers (who at their admissiouns had sworn obedience to and practise of these points (when they disputed this interpretation, and offered some qualification to it,) they suffered them they might sweare, with a rerefervation of not abjuring Episcopacy, the Articles of Perth, or any thing by Parliament or general Assembly established; urging that it would breed great division. if any alteration of the words wherein the Covenant was conceived, should be admitted.
The King being much displeased with these inlogies upon his Royal Authority, and their refusal of that satisfaction which he offered to redresst his complaints, intended to do that by power which perswasion could not effect: but the Marquefs of Hamilton then very prevalent with him, diverted that course, offering his service to compose the differences: The King being in his nature alwaies prone to lenity, was quickly induced to confedder to this motion, and sent him down in the quality of High Commissi rioner, authorizing him with large power to settle the peace of that kingdom. The Marquefs at his first arrival finding the City of Edinburgh filled with extraordinary numbers of persons from several parts of the Kingdom, because of the sitting of the Tables, went to a place called Dalkeith, a boat four miles from thence where he assembled the Council to consider of the best ways and means of serving the King in the prosecution of the truth committed to him: but whilst he was in these consultations, the Mairquefs of Eden-burgh preferred an humble supplication to him to repair to the Kings Palace at Edinburgh, where (as they pretended) they might more conveniently give demonstration of their affection to the Kings service; The Marquefs considering what great influence the City had over all the rest of the Cities and Burghs of Scotland, and ready to gratifie them in their requests, and told them that if they would undertake that their Citizens should behave themselves as dutifull Subjects, and take order that the multitudes now present there, (who call themselves Covenanters) and the Guardes which the Tables had lately fet about the Cattle of Edinburgh should be dismissed; he would repair to the City, or otherwise not.
The Marquefs undertook to perform all that the Marquefs proposed, adding that they feared some aliterations might be laid upon them of disloyalty to the King, from which they doubted not to clear themselves, when he should please to hear and examine their proceedings: The Marquefs upon their undertaking, went the next day to Edinburgh to the King's Palace at Holy-rood House, where after he was a while settled, he fell prently upon the main busines with the Confederates, to whom he made two Propofitions.
First, what they expected from him for satisfaction to their complaints; and next, what might be expected from them for returning to their formor obedience, especially in renouncing and deliering up their late Covenant: To which after some time, they made answer, That they reque-ted a General Assembly of the Church, and then a Parliament, in which two Indications they would represent and difcuss their Grievances: To the Second, They said, they could not acknowledge that they had ever parted from their obedience, and for their Covenant, they would rather renounce their Baptisms than abate one word or syllable thereof;
And presently after they had given their answers,
they distressed the people with many disreport,
and the Sermons of the Preachers of Edinburgh were filled with admonition, that they should take heed of crafty compositions, or yielding in the least point of their intended reformation.
The Marquefs seem'd much troubled at these actions, and thought the best expedient he could use to reclaim the People was to publish a Proclamation, which he had brought with him from the King of Grace and Favour towards them, for relieving their Grievances, and satisfying them with his forwardness for the maintenance of the true Religion, and his aveniences from Popery;
but before he did this, by advice of the Privy Council he wrote a Letter to the King, to define him to (weeten it with a favor of returning to the City of Edinburgh the Sitting of the Session, and the all Courts of Justice as a thing very acceptable to the Judges, Advocates, and all Dependent upon the Law, and to all others which had busines of the Session depending in the Courts, but chiefly to the City Assizes, and all Courts of Edinburgh, which complained much of being impo-
The Reign of King Charles the First.

A Proclamation, made for the first time, in 1638, pronounced the Court of Justice should be open to the people; and what is further fitting to be done, shall be agitated in a General Assembly and Parliament, which should be in continuation, and it is thought that he would not have them misled by any affected persons, who under pretext of Religion would draw them to disobedience to his grief and their ruin. This Proclamation was no sooner read, but the Confederates seized it in a Proclamation, which they caused to be publicly read, importing, that they never doubted the sincerity of the King in defence of the Protestant Religion, That what he granted them, was not a sufficient remedy for their grievances, in that he did not publish the Service-Book, nor the High Commission, which was imposed upon them contrary to the Laws of the Land. That no Proclamation could secure them from the re-entry of the Innovations, which this seemed to disfigure, and that an Assembly and Parliament are the only remedies of their evils, and means to prevent the like, and that their proceeding ought not to be interpreted a drawing to disobedience under pretext of Religion, and running headlong into ruin.

The Marquefs found by this manner of proceeding, he was not likely to reduce them to obedience, and were the people wanted to be brought to it, was an Expiration of their Covenant, whereby they pretended to expect great demonstrations or affection to the King, but when it was presented and read, little more was in it than a Jutification of the Covenant and their Covenant, professing they never had any intention to withdraw themselves from their dutiful subjection and obedience to the King Government, but whereas it was expected that to these words of their Covenant, whereby they bind themselves to mutual maintenance against all persons whatsoever, should have been added, except the King and his Successors, that was refuted.

The Marquefs was not satisfied herewith, but he told them he had spent all his Instructions, and could meet no further with them, till he had been with the King to acquaint him with his proceedings, and receive his further Orders, but he promised to come and meet them with the Kings final answer to their demands, which he would show to him, exhoriting them in the mean time to break up their meeting, and contain themselves in quietness and peace: This they promised to do, but added, if he did not return by the 5 th of August with such an answer as they expected, that then they would hold themselves free, and proceed in the courses they had resolved on.

The Marquefs went immediately to the King, whom he found at Greenwich, and to him he related the particular of all transactions; The King was offended at the incontinency of the Confederates, but was persuaded to try a little further; he could reduce them by gentle means; when he dispatched the Marquefs with new Instructions, and gave him order to call a General Assembly, and after that a Parliament, but as he should be first satisfied, by all informations he could conveniently receive of the constitution of a General Assembly, none having been kept for divers years.

As soon as he came into Scotland, he deputed some of the Lords of the Council to confer with 63 some of the chiefs of the confederates of all Orders concerning some necessary propositions first to be resolved on before the calling of the Assembly, both concerning the members of which it was to be constituted, and concerning the matters to be treated of; (two consultations usually previous to that meeting; for the omission whereof, in an Assembly of later times, they had so grievously complained, that in a Petition exhibited by the Ministers of their side it was alledged for a Nulity of that Assembly) but this was rejected as a limitation of the Assembly: The Marquesses then told them he could not call the Assembly till he had once again attended the King:

Upon this they caused rumors to be spread, that the Marquesses neither had power from the King, nor any intention from himself to give them satisfaction; Wherefore the Marquesses to disabuse

the people in this matter, reduced what he at first proposed to two heads, which he tendered to them in these words;

1. If the Lords and the rest will undertake for themselves and the rest, that no Laws shall have voice published in this Assembly, nor from the several Presbyteries to the General Assembly, nor none else but the Ministers of the same Presbytery.

2. If they will undertake that at the Assembly, they shall not go about to determine of things established by Act of Parliament, otherwise than by Remonstrance or Petition to the Parliament, leaving the determining of things

Ecclesiastical to the General Assembly, & things

Then I will presently Indict a General Assembly, and promise upon My Honour, immediately after the Assembly to Indict a Parliament which shall Cognosce of all their Complaints.

This would not be condemed unto, but they told the Marquesses, if he did not return from the King by the 16 of September, to Indict a General Assembly by the Kings authority; they would themselves call one: for they had about this time published a Book, wherein to one of other things it was alledged, that the power of Convoking an Assembly, in case the Prince was an Enemy of the Truth, or negligent in advancing the good of the Church, was in the Church it self.

The Marquesses hastened with all diligence to the King, and informed him of all occurrences that paffed, which occasioned many debates of the way to be used to bring that Kingdom to peace and quietness.

The Scots about the King advised that he should not have any recourse to Arms, but in an unnecessary extremity, the Lords of the Privy

Council in Scotland were many of them in private League with the Confederates, so that no ting could be relied on from them; And therefore that which was thought the best expedient,

was to take an exact view of all the Petitions,

Remonstrances and Protests of the Confederates which they had since the beginning of the trouble exhibited either to the King, or the Marquesses, or Privy Council, and to Grant them all:

And besides all these, because the heads of the Confederates had made it a principal motive to alienate the minds of the people from the King,

that he was inclined to Popery, and had an aversion to the Reformed Religion, It was adjudged and concentred to by the King, to command and urge the renewing of that Confession and Covenant by his authority, which they had without it, by which Legislation, to save the people who were to fear it from incurring the danger of those Laws, which made it very criminal to enter into any Covenant without his Authority:

And indeed of that unjust band of confederacy,

which they added to the confession to bind themselves to mutual maintenance and defence against all persons whatsoever: The King caused the General Band for maintenance of the true Religion, and the Kings person to be added in the same words as it was expressed, and taken in the year

1590. by an Ordinance of the Privy Council at the desire of the General Assembly.

With these concessions all drawn up in a Proclamation, the Marquesses returned into Scotland

within eight days after his first coming to Out-lands to the King, and arrived there before the time limited for his return: The Confederates had made many resolutions in his absence, and though they promised no election of Commissioners for the Assembly should be made before the 21 of September, the day agreed upon for his return, they gave order that the Election should be made the two and twentieth being the next day after, according to which order, Commissioners for the Assembly were elected in many Presbyteries before the Kings answer could be known, or before the Assembly was indited, which was not till some days after these elections,

and although they would admit of no conference with the Marquesses, for debating of what members the Assembly was to be constituted, and the manner thereof, which they said, would be a pre-limitation of it, they went out to every Pre-byterier several Articles, wherein many Qualifications were made limiting both the matter and manner thereof, with a form of Commision to be given to the Commissioners from every Presbytery, requiring that the persons elected should repair to Edinburgh after their Election, to consult before hand of what was to be said or done at the Assembly.

Notwithstanding all these disorders, the Marquesses assembled the Council at Holy-Rod hous,

and communicated to them the particulars of the Kings grace and favour for the appeasing of the troubles of the Kingdom, which they received with exceede joy, believing that nothing but right would not be able to restrain that party of the people from being fully satisfied: The news of this made the heads of the Confederates beffir themselves, fearing their reign was towards an end, and some of them came to the Marquesses sitting in Councel, and moved him to delay the Publishin of the Proclamation till the Monday following,

for the next day being Sunday, they intended that Ministers should in their Pulpits call such aspersions on it as might not easily be removed, but the Marquesses would not be premised with, and the Proclamation was that day published at the Martet-CrofF, which was to this effect: That the King did annul and refine all Acts and Proclamations, that had been made concerning the Se-

vice-Book, Book of Canons, and High Commission and the Pulpits of them: be also dispens'd with.

The Bar-

...the practice of the five Articles of Perth, and it was declared, that all persons Ecclesiasticall or Civil, of what quality, title or degree soever should be liable to the Tryall and Confusion of Parliament, general Assembly, or any other Judiciaries competent, and that no other Oath should be administered to any Minister, at their Entry into the Ministry, but that which is contained in the Act of Parliament: Likewise in manifestation of the Kings integrity to Religion, all persons should be enjoyed by his authority, to subscribe the Confession of faith, with the Band annexed, and that no doubt may be left in the minds of the people of the King intentions, it is declared, that the Marquess the King's Commissioner, has Warrant to summon a Free General Assembly, to be holden at Glascow, the 21st of November, and a Parliament at Edinburgh, the 15th of May.

All the Lords of the Council did seem very well to approve of this Proclamation, highly extolling the Goodness and piety of the King, in having offered so just means in the conversion of the purity of Religion, and the peace of the Kingdom: and in a letter, which they sent to him upon this Subject, they offered to defend his person and Royall Authority, in the profection of this confession, now by him authorized, which they all solemnly subscribed after the Marstefe, who represented the Kings person, and appointed Comissioners for all Countries, and places, to have it sworn to, and subscribed by all the people, throughout the Realme; many of the more moderate, both Magistrates, Ministers, and others in severall Townes and places, that had taken the Covenant injonied by the Confederates, were very well satisfied, with the expressions of the Kings confedentions, mentioned in the Proclamation, and did swear and subscribe to the confession and Band, by the King directed, which began now to be called the Kings Covenant: But the Lords, Ministers, and others of the Tables, and their Confederates did not acquiese therein, alleging that this Proclamation did in many parts of it tacitly confedn the precedent actions, and straine the Liberty of the Intended General Assembly, and to shew their dislike, they framed a long Protestation against it, a copy whereof they tened to the Kings Herald, at the time the Proclamation was proclaimed, which was to
to that effect.

That what the King granted in this Proclamation, did not free them from their just fears and apprehensions, and was not sufficient to cure the wounds of the Church and State: That the King scourd the laft Troubler to their fears of the innovation of Religion and Law, and not to the Innovations themselves, as if the cause were rather in apprehension, then in reality and substance. That the King having exoicted the present Government of the Church, according to the late innovated forms of service therein, they could not be secured with a bare subscription of their flag, if they were not formally taken away: That the General Assembly must be deprived of its just liberty, both in the Election of its Members, and the matters to be therein discussed, because the King appointed Bishops in the Induction of the Assembly, to be there present, though they ought not to be unlesse deputed by the Prefbyteries.

That the King declared, his intentions not to innovate any thing in Religion, whereas it depends on the general Assembly, to abolish all such Ec-

should be chosen thereunto, should be of the most rigid and most affectionate to their Covenant, and to exclude the Bishops from having any place there, they published, that any persons, censured as criminals before the Assembly, could have no voice there, and in pursuance thereof they drew up a Levell against the Archbishops and Bishops, which they exhibited on the 24th of October, to the Presbytery of Edinburgh, who proceeded thereon, as all the Bishops had been subject to their authority, and after some short consideration of the Levell, which was full of scandal and reproaches of the Bishops, they ordered, that it should be referred to the next Assembly, and that the Levell and their Order of Reference should be read in all Churches with a publice warning and citation to the Bishops, to be present at the Assembly, to answer to the complaints against them.

Many judged this proceeding so contrary to all the legal forms of justice, was done on no other deluge, but to render the Bishops odious to the people. For the Assembly, when they came to consider of this matter, enter'd not into the examination of the personal vice, with which the Levell or Bill of Complaint was filled, but upon the abolishing of Episcopacy it itself, though it is evident, that if they had had proofes, they would not have spared the Bishops, whom the confederates had represented so criminous to the people.

The day of the Assembly being come, the Marques his Commission was read, and nothing else done considerable that day. The next day a Declinatar of the Commissary was presently to the Assembly in the name of the Arch-bishops and Bishops against the Assembly, and conteying a nullity of it, but this was not read without great difficulty, nor was it this Declinatar of the Bishops the only objection against this Assembly, for the Presbytery of Glasgow, and many other places protested against the legality thereof, because of the admittance of Lay Elders, a thing scarce before heard of in that Church. But they made very much Scrutiny in the debate of their own constitution, for by one means or other they excluded every Commissary, that was not clearly agreeable to the minde of the Confederates. The Declinatar of the Bishops they would by no means allow of, but put it to the question, whether the Assembly, notwithstanding the Bishops reasons against it, were not lawful, and a competent Judge of the Complaints against them, and it was agreed in the affirmative. The Marques admired at this carriage, since the chiefe of the confederates, who so lately protected against the fitting of the Bishops in Council, as parties to their Complaints, and made a Declinatar of the Counsellors authority, and invalidated all their acts, made while they were fitting, could now oppose the like, though with more restion offered in this cause; for most or all of the members of the Assembly having bound themselves by Oaths, Covenants, Combinations and associations against the Bishops, and Episcopacy, which being antagocstic to judicial Acts had barred all the judgments from the Judges, either of the persons or calling of these Bishops: But the Marques had yet a deeper resentment of their behaviour, for an other cause, for the King having nominated six Lords of the privy Council to be affisseurs to him his Commissioner in that Assembly, they absolutely refused to enter into it, and on their refusal the Marques retailed and de- declared their Sides.

A Declinatar of the Bishops agaist the Assembly.

The Bishops Declinatar rejected.

The Marques concluding from these actions, that no good was like to be done by continuing the Assembly longer, November the 28th consulted with the Council, about its dissolution, and it being agreed in the Affirmative, he went to the Assembly, and said to them.

You are now about to settle the Lawfulness of this Judicature, and the competency of it against Bishops, neither of which I can allow; I am glad I have seen this Assembly meet, a thing which was supposed his Majesty never intended; and for the further clearing the integrity of his Intentions, I read, a paper, which I deliveir to the Clerks, to be read, before nine.

The paper then read by the Clerke, was a Declaration the same in every substantiall point with the Proclamation, discharging the Service-book, Book of Canons &c. This Declaration being read, the reading was signed by the Commissioner, &c required to be entred into the Books of the Assembly: Provided that this act of Regarding this declaration, should be no approbation of the Lawfulness of this Assembly, to the dissolution whereof he was next to proceed, and therefore protested, that whatsoever should be done or said in it, should not be obligatory, or be reputed an Act of a general Assembly: The very night of the intended dissolution of this Assembly, the Marques assembled the Council to draw up a Proclamation for dissolving it, which being refused upon what was subscribed by all, but the Earle of Argyle, who began now to shew himselfe for the Confederates.

The Proclamation being formed, and published November 29th, was encountered with a Protestation of the Confederates, that it is of a total dissolution of the Confederates, and the Assembly is abolished by the Assembly.

The Marques seeing all things tending to a present rupture, sent to desire leave of the King to return into England, which he obtained, but before he went, he saw an end of the Assembly, which made many Acts, not necessary here to be related, and by their own Authority ordained annuall assemblies, the first whereof was assign'd to meet at Edinburgh, the first of July, 1639.

As soon as the Marques was gone, the Confederates drew up a Declaration, addressed to all good Christians of England, to justify their intentions and actions, which had so many full reflections in it, from the Government, that it was suppressed by the Kings Authority, and he published a declaration, to satisfy all his faithful subjects.

Six Lords of the Privy Council nominat- ed by the King, as Affisseurs to the Marques, refused and declared their Sides.

As long as the Marques was gone, the Confederates drew up a Declaration, addressed to all good Christians of England, to justify their intentions and actions, which had so many full reflections in it, from the Government, that it was suppressed by the King's Authority, and he published a declaration, to satisfy all his faithful subjects.

A Proclamation for the dissolution of the Assembly.
The Reign of King Charles the First.

Subjects of the seditions practices of those in Scotland, who had, under Pretext of Religion, designed the subversion of his Royall Authority, which was commanded to be read in all Churches.

On the last of October this year, Marie de Medicis, the Widow of Harry the 4th, King of France, and Mother to the Queen, came into England, and was very honourably entertained: whist the flaid here, she was lodged at the Kings Palace at St James, but the finding the Kinglyke to be involved in troubles, to reduce his Subjects of Scotland to obedience, after some moneths they returned into Holland.

The Scots having made all things desperate to accommodation, made vigorous preparations for warre, and sent for succeft to such of the neighbor Princes and States, from whom they could expect any assistance: They also invited home many eminent Commanders of their Nation, from Sweden, to take employment in their Armies, many of which were at the begining of the yeare to come. They feized on the Castles of Edinburgh and Dunbar-town, and all other places of stength in the Kingdom, and tooke out of Dalbysth all the Kings Armes, and Ammunition, lidd there the year before by the Marquefs of Hamilton, next they chose Alexander Leffy, an old experienced Officer, to be Cayptaine Generall of their Armes, to whom all the chieffes of the confederates (who tooke armes) solemnely swore obedience in all orders of Warre, and he swore in like manner, faithfully to exercize his charge.

The Marquefs of Argyle was fet to take care of those places frontier of Ireland, and the Earl of Monroff had the charge of Aberdeem, and the more Northern parts, and Collonell Monroe was sent towards the borders of England, to keep all things quiet till the levies were perfect.

The King in that meane time was not idle, but made very great levies in all places, and having got his Army together, he gave the commend thereof in chief to the Earl of Arundell, as Generall, under whom the Earl of Effex was Liutenant Generall, and the Earl of Holland Generall of the Horfe, the rest of the Officers were many of them persones of the beft quality, And the Army in Generall consisted of the Flower of the Nobility, Gentry and Commonalty of the Nation: With this Army the King lets out on the 27th of March, and comes by easy marches, within two miles of Berwick, on the 28th of May, where he incamped, and Generall Leffy about the fame time, marched with the Scotch Army to the borders towards England, and in-camped at Dunce, within 4 miles of Berwick.

The King when he begun his March, had sent the Marquefs of Hamilton, with a Fleet of ships well furnished with Smithers, to Leith to attempt that place, and make what impression he could in those parts to hinder any new levies, and reduce Edinburgh, Leith, and what other forts and strengthes he could to obedience: He arrived in the moneth of May with his Fleet in the road before the towne called the Frith, where after some stay, he landed some of his men in a little Island, to give them breath and some refreshments, and there he received a visit from his Mother, a moft rigid Covenant, which made many of the Kings Friends suspeft his integrity; and the Scots upon the shore that saw this, were heard to say, They knew the Son of such a Mother would not do such burt.

The Army under Leffy, was but ill armed, for they had not three thousand Muskets amongst them, to that though they put a good face on the Business, they were better prepared for a treaty then a battell, nevertheless those of that Nation about the King were not wanting on their part, to make the preparations of their Countrymen very terrible, and the Earles of Tregaw and Anderby, and other Noblemen of Scotia land, who had permission to repaire to York to the King, as he was in his March, for meditating an attenation, did so pracke upon the Eng. lish Lords by their insinuations, that they mi-gated much the displeasure of some, and quite of others, that the King having been a while in his Leagues neere Berwick, he was easily disposed to receive Overtures from them, to be received into his grace and favor, which they made with great protestations of that Resolution upon his gracious Assurance of the preservation of their Religion and Lawes, to give example to others of all civil and temporal obedience, which could be required or expected from his loving subjests: This produced a Treaty, for which on the Kings part were appointed, The Earles of Pembroke, Salisbury Berkelfire, St. Henry Wake, and Secretary Cook; and for the Scots the Earls of Ruthouf and Dum-mering, the Lord Lordem, the Lord Douglas Alexander Henderson and Archibald Johnston:
These having had several debates, at length,
June the 17th concluded upon a Pacification, which on the Kings part was expreft by a Declaration of that date: So much whereof as is pertinent for the better understanding of these transsactions is here inferret.

We are pleased to conform and make good what soever the Marquess of Hamilton our Commissioner hath granted; And that all matters Ecclesiastical shall be determined by the Affemblies of the Kirk, and matters Civil by the Parliament, and other inferior Judicatures established by Law, which Assembly shall be kept once a year, or as shall be agreed upon by the General Assembly, and our Commissioner for the time being.

That a free and General Assembly be kept at Edinburgh the sixth of August next, where we intend (God willing) to be personally present, and thereafter a Parliament the 20th of August, and there an Act of Oblivion to be passt, And that upon their disarming and disbating of their forces, disposing and disbarging all their pretended Tables and Cowboys, and referring to the King the Marquess of Hamilton, and to every one of his Good Subjects, their Liberties, Lands, Goods, and Money whereof taken and deteniet since the late pretended General Assembly, The King will present thereafter recall his Fleet, and retire his Forces, and cause restitution of their Ships and Goods taken since the afo before time.

The Articles of Pacification were these, the 17th of June, 1659.

1. The Forces of Scotland to be disbanded and disbursed within 24 hours after the agreement of the Kings Declaration.
2. The Kings Captains, Ports and Ammunition to be delivered after the said Publication, so soon as be should tend to receive them.
3. His Ships to depart presently after the Delivery of the Captives, and in the meantime no interdiction of Trade.
4. All Persons, Goods and Ships detained by the King since the first of November to be restored.
5. No Meetings, Treatises, Consultations or Convocations of any of the Scots, but such as are warranted by Act of Parliament.
6. All Fortifications to be destroyed and to be remitted to the Kings pleasure.
7. To restore to every one their Liberties, Lands, Houses, Goods and whatsoever taken and detained from them by whatsoever means since the first of November last.

The King signed the Declaration on the 18th of June, and the same day the Commissioners on each party signed the Articles, and the Scots Commissioners subscribed a short Declaration subjoined in their words.

In Obedience to His Majesty's Royal Commands, He shall upon Thursday next the 20th of June dismiss our Forces, and immediately thereafter deliver his Majesties Captives &c. And shall ever in all things carry our spirits like humble and Loyal Subjects.

The Pacification being thus agreed, the King sent for some of the Scotch Lords, and informed them that he had given Orders to the Marquis of Hamilton to draw off the Fleet, and did intend to have been at Edinburgh at the opening of the Assembly, but that he had received letters from the Queen, which intimated a necessity of his presence at London about some military affairs, but he would depute the Earl of Traquary with full power and authority as his High Commissioner to hold the Assembly and Parliament.

Most men thought these graces of the King to his Scotch Subjects, would have obliged them to an intire submission to his authority, but the Confederates had some further designs of trouble: For no sooner was the Kings Declaration published, but at that instant they encountered it with a Protestation of several heads, first of adhering to the late General Assembly at Glasgow as a Free and General Assembly of the Church, and to all proceedings there, especially to the Sentences of Deprivation and Excommunication of the Bishops: Secondly of adhering to their Solemn Covenant and declaration of the Assembly, whereby the Office of Bishops is expired. Thirdly, in regard many of the Gentry and the Ministers, who had long attended at Edinburgh during the dissonance of the Pacification and the preparations to its peace to repair to their own homes, whereby such of them as had Suits depending at Law, could not stay at Edinburgh to attend them; they Declared, that if any members of the College of Ministers should attend the Session or Tourn, all their Acts and Sentences of Judgement should be void and in effect.

The King could not but relent this ingratitude, but was forced to temporize, in hopes that at the meeting of the Parliament, some moderate Councilors might temper the minds of the people: he had been so just to those conditions of peace which he granted them, that he immediately discharged his Army, which if he had kept together, or any considerable part of them, until he had seen their Souldiers disbanded, their Officers captured, their Forts and Castles delivered up to him, and some good issue of the Assembly and Parliament to be held at Edinburgh, he had preferred his Honour among Foreign Princes, and croft'd those practices at home which afterwards undermined his peace, and destroyed his glory.

The Scots did not punctually perform any one Article, the Castle of Edinburgh was indeed put under the command of Sir Patrick Ruben by the Kings Orders, but they did not flight their Fortifications at Loch, they still kept their Officers in pay, and continued their meetings and consultations, disquieting, molesting and frightening all of breach of different inclinations, and the more to stir up the people, they dispersed a Scandalous Libell Entituled, Some Conditions of His Majesty's Treaty with the Subjects of Scotland before the English Nobility are set down here for a Remembrance.

This Paper consisted of eight heads which were pretended to be drawn out of Notes taken upon the several Discourses with the King about the matter of his Declaration: This was put into the hands of the Earl of Pembroke at his coming from Berwick, who pretended not to have read it, but seald it up till he presented it to the King; The matter of it was very scandalous, and derogatory to the Kings honour; for all the substance of the Declaration was so qualified thereby, that the whole force and intention of it was perverted: The King therefore summoned all the English Lords that were privy to these transmissions, to meet in Council, who disapproved any such content of his Majesty as in that Paper was expressed, and therefore both they and all the rest of the Council became Petitioners to the King that it might be burnt by the common Hangman, as a false and scandalous paper, which was done accordingly.

Upon the 6th of August (old style) The General Assembly convened at Edinburgh according to the Kings Indiction, and late till the 14th, the chief matters passed were, the Confirmation of the Act of the Assembly at Glasgow, the abolishing Episcopacy, the five Articles of Persuasion, the High Commission, the Liturgy, and the Book of Canons, and ended with rending thanks to the King for his Indulgence towards them, in the absence of his Commissioner to their Acts, and assigned another to meet at Abercorn the next year in the month of July.

The Assembly now ended, the Parliament which was prorogued till the 15th of August, did the Parliament again come together, the first four days produced a high debate about setting their constitution to determine what estate should supply that of the Bishops now sobh'd, which being at last agreed, they fell upon other matters concerning Reforciary Acts of Former Parliaments, and several consultations tending rather totally to eclipse the Kings Regal power, and to new model his Government, than to reform abuses: so that he sent an express to the Earl of Tyrone to provoke the Parliament again till the second of June following.

To this Proclamation they very unwillingly submitted, declaring that the King had no power to prologue them without their consent, and they appointed some of every of the three estates to continue in Edinburgh till they had made a re- monstrance thereof to the King, before the separation they perfected, and the Earl of Don- fermein and the Lord Loudon were sent to present it to him: Thee coming to the Court without warrant from the Kings Commissioner, were sent back again without audience, and after a while the Commissioner himself comes up to inform the King of the present condition of Scot- land, which being reported to the Council, it was resolved, That the Disobedience of that Nation was not reducible but by force. And thus matters flood between the King and them about the beginning of December, which for the better con- nection of the Relations of that affair we have drawn thus far in time, but we must now look a little back to the affairs of England.

The Prince Elector in July this year arrived at the Court of England in prosecution of a design he had to get the command of the Army of Duke Bernard, Seven Years later lately dead, which consisted of a gallant number of Swedes, Germans, and other Nations: The King did like very well of the business, and proposed it to the French Embassador, offering that the Prince should join in a perpetual League with France, and that he would contribute what he could to his assistance. The Embassador feemed to be very well pleased with the offer, and told the King that he doubted not but his Master would approve of it, and that Cardinal Richelieu the chief Minister of that State would be willing to serve the King and the Prince therein, and thereupon he dispatched a messenger to Paris, to acquaint the French King with the matter, but in the mean while, it was sug- gested to the King, that Richelieu under-hand fomented the troubles of Scotland, whereby the confed- erate Covenanters had been encouraged to write a letter to that King for alliance, so that the reality of Richelieu was so much suspected, that the Prince was advised to go privately through France to Duke Bernard's Army, of which it was believed he might by his appearance easily get the Command. The Prince therefore in November paffed over to Paris, and from thence endeavoured to run by difguise through France, but at Ly- on he was discovered, and taken Prisoner: And the King of France interpreted this action of the Prince of no fair intentions towards him, because it was done in a time of trysty, so that he was kept under a strict guard.

The great business of this Summer was a Sea Fight between the Spanish and the Dutch, which we shall here infert in the words of Sir John Pennington, the King's Vice-admiral, who made this following Narration thereof.

The Spanish Fleet consisting of near seventy Ships bound and designed for Dunkirk in Flanders, with a recruit both of men and money, met with the Vice-Admiral of the Holland Fleet, having in his company seventeen tall Ships, September the 7th, and entered into a very fierce dispute with them, until the Hollander perceiving himself too weak, got to the windward, faying along towards Dunkirk, and continually firing their Ordinance to give warning to their Admiral, who lay before that Town with the refidue of the Fleet in the first Encouter the Hollander had two Ships sunk, and the next morning by two of the clock the Admiral came up, and joining with the Vice- Admiral between Dover and Calais, they fet upon the Spaniard, and continued a very sharp fight till past Noon, wherein they had much the better, having taken two Gallions, sunk another, and much battered the rest, though they were but 25 Sail to the Spaniards 60 and upwards, and at length forced them upon the English Coast near Dover, where they left them, and bare off for the coast of France, not willing to attempt any thing against them within the King of England's liberties.

The Spaniards being now got as they thought under the Lee of England's protection, began to plot how to get rid of their bad Neighbours; and the Spanish Resident importuned the King, that he would keep the Hollander in subjection two Tydes, that in the interim they might have the opportunity for shipping away for Spain; but the King being in amity with them both, was resolved to stand neutrals, and whereas the Spaniards had hired some English Ships to transport their Soul- diers to Dunkirk, the King upon complaint of the Dutch Embassador, strictly commanded, that none should take in any Spaniards, nor put bey- ond Gravesend without Licence, but the Span- iards and the Hollanders plotting a great while counter the one to the other, the Spaniard at length somewhat outwitted his Enemy, and by a stratagem in the night conveyed away 14 Dunk-irk Ships, and in them four thousand men.

In the beginning of October the King sent the Earl of Arundel to the Admiral of Spain, Don Antonio D'Oruando, defining him to retire upon the first fair wind, because he would not they should engage within his Seas, but the wind continued Eastwardly so long (a thing not usual in that Season) as the Hollander got daily fresh supply from Scotland, so that at length their Fleet was completed to an hundred Ships, wherewith they encompassed their Enemies within Pirotoll- flate for four days: But that which was so long an intermission of these two Fleets, at last turned to an engagement.

On the eleventh of the same month, upon Trump the Dutch Admiral charged the Spaniards with Cannon and Fire-ships so furiously, as made them all cut their Cables, and being 53 in number, 23 ran on shore, and stranded in the Downs, whereas of three were burnt, two sunk, and two per- ished on the shore. One of these was a great Gallion, the Vice-Admiral of Galleia commanded by Don Antonio de Calave, which had 72 braies pieces of Ordnance: the remainder of the 23 franded and deffered by the Spaniards, were man'd by the English, to save them from the Dutch: The other 30 Spanishe Ships under the command of the Admirals Don Antonio D'Oopendo, and Lope Admiral of Portugal, went to Sea, and kept in close Order until a great fog fell upon them, when the Dutch taking the advantage thereof, interpreted within the Admirals and their Fleet, and fought them valiantly till the fog cleared up, when the Admiral of Portugal began to flame, being fired with two Holland Fire-ships, which D'Oopendo perceiving, he presently took his course towards Dunkirk, with the Admiral of that place, and some few Ships more, far most of the rest were taken. Of these thirty, eleven were sent into Holland, three perished on the coast of France, one near Dover, five sunk in the Fight, and only ten escaped.

These two potent Enemies being both friends to England, the Britishe Seas ought by rule of State to have been a harbour of retreat to secure the weaker from the stronger, not the scene of their hostile engagement, and had this preump- tuous attempt of the Hollander been made in times of another temper it would not, it's like, have been so totally convin'd at, and their victo- ry might have cost them the loss of England's corresponding: But self-denial is a Christian, not a Martial virtue, and who is able to suppress the feu of an advantage, whereby he may def- troy his foe upon the necty of exceeding his just limits? Besides, The King, the Dutch well knew, was of a Genious as not quarrelous, if provoked very placable, and the disposition of his affairs as well as of his mind disdisted him at this conjunction from expoliating the matter with them.

About the 15th of November, being the Anniversary night of the Kings Birth day, a great part of the walls of the Castle of Edinburg fell down, and the King having given order for the repair there- of, the Condeferate Covenanters would not permit any materials to be carried in for that use, which added much to those resentments, which the King had perceived against him, so that prepare-ations of war went on against them, but the Kings treasure being exhausted by the late fum- mers expedition, he consulted with the Lords of the Confeil of his meares of Supply, who con- fidering the present exigent of Affairs, advised the calling of a Parliament, as the best expedient to aifift and strengthen him, both with money, and counfell, to this the King readily agreed, being ever ( till diverted by the prudifhe of intem- perate men) a great lover of Parliament, and in compliance with this advice, a Parliament was intimated to be assembled on the 13 of April. This resolution was taken the 5th of December, and the notice given for long before, for two rea- sons, first that the Lord Wentworth, Deputy of Ireland (being lately sent for hither on the oc- casion of these troubles) might in the mean time hold a Parliament in that Kingdom, which he did and managed so much to the Kings advantage, that an Army of 8000 horse and foot, were speedily raised, and money granted by the Parlia- ment there, to keep them in pay and furnish them with Ammunition and Armes, and all other ne-

The King calls a Parlia- ment in Scotland.

The Earl of Treverys, touching these matters, where things were handled with so much amity, that no good understanding could be arrived at, And at this very time their addresses to the King Supplication, the Confederates in Scotland acted very different from peaceable men, for they se- cured many of the Nobility, and Gentry of that Nation, who ffood firm to the King, and now again as they had done the last yeare, invited and procured to their service many Commanders from Holland, and other places, but that which ma- nifested most their bad intentions to the King, was a Letter written by the Lord Loudon, sub- mitted by himself, and severall others of the chief Confederates, to the French King, to favor their proceedings, and grant them his affiance, of which the Original came to the King's hands, and being known, to be Loudon's Chriften- character, he was therefore committed to the Tower.

Cardinal Richleau was no small incendiary in this difference betwixt the King and Scots, for the King making it always a great Masterpiece, to keep the balance even betwixt France and Spain, that neither of them being too strong for the other, the affairs of Chriftendom might be the evener poyted, he knew the French design of driving the Spaniards out of Flanders, and the rest of the Netherlands, could not be effect'd, un- less the King were iambroyled at home, So the A Loan for the Kings Admiration against the Scots sub- mitted to by many Lords of the Council and Bishops, etc.
he sent his Chaplin and Almoner, Mr. Thomas Chamberlayn, a Scotchman, to affit the Confederate rates in advancing the business, and to attempt all ways of exasperation, and not to depart from them, till he might return with good News, in this Project; Can also the Popes Agent to the Queen, a Scotch by Nation, and one Reed of the same Country, were very active, and many Scotch Jefuites, at this time in England, were not idle, and Hamilton Chaplyn had often secret communication with Can; all which practices were discovered in a great part by one Andrew Har- downfield, a Nobleman of Berwick, then become Paymaster to the Kings Sifter, the Palgrave Re- list, who made it also apparent that many of the Nobility of England, and the chief favourites at Court (among whom the Earl and Counsellor of Arundel, Secretary Weldebank, and Endymion Porter) were named to be acquainted, and confenting with their transactions. To this the King, out of the bounty of his nature, gave not to much credit as he ought, for in case of general disturbance nothing is more familiar, than for fe- veral factions, and of several and sometimes contrary inclinations, to drive on one and the same defige.

About the latter end of his yeare, John Spar- wood, Archbishop of St. Andrews, Primate and Chancellor of Scotland, dyed at London, he was one that by his just device arrived to those high dignities; in whom there always appeared great prudence in conduct, clearness of Spirit, and solidity of judgment; he left this world very aged, and was his happiest, to do it without seeing that defeqons which after happened to his Country, and to be inter'd, neere his beloved Master King James, in the Abbey church of Westminster, then which none perhaps conveyes more magnificent Trophies of death; Neere the same time also dyed, that Grave and learned Judge, St. Thomas Coventry, Privy Councilor to the King, and Lord Keeper of the great Seal of England fifteen yeares, one that was a truly loyal Subject, and a good Patriot, and in the administration of Justice so incorrupt, that make it fell stands mute in the blemish of his name: St. John Finch, the chief Justice of the Common-pleas, succeeded him in the Office of Keeper of the great Seal.

The Heere of Somerset, Ambassador from the States of the United Provinces, in the Month of January, had audience of the King, he had with him Count William of Nassau, and the Rhein-Graves, and a very splendid traine, his business was to give him satisfaction concerning the late attempts, made upon the Spaniards by the Dutch Fleet in the Downs, and the Embassy was sweated by some overture of a marriage betwixt the yong Prince of Orange, and the King's eldest Daughter, of which more hereafter.

On the 15 of April the Parliament sat, and the Deputy of Ireland, being not long before created Earl of Strafford and made Lord Lieutenant of that Realme, was led into the upper house by two Noblemen, where he gave an account of his service in Ireland, where he had obtained the grant of four Subsidies for the maintenance of an Army, as before was hinted; Mr. John Gielnest was chosen Speaker of the House of Commons, and generally the choice of members to that house was so good, that great probabilities were given of a happy Union between the King and this Parliament, but in the midst of this ex- pection some ill instruments at Court by their fataous contrivances undermine all; and amongst the, the chiefest imposition was laid on Sir Hen- ry Vane, then principal Secretary of State, who bore a grudge to the Earl of Strafford, for that he had causd himself to be made Barou of Ra- ley, for which he aspired, it being a manner granted to him together with Barry Castle from the Crown; and because he saw the Earl very earnest to incline the King to endeavors by all fair means to gain the affections of the Commons, out of a desire to see a good issue of this Parlia- ment, to the calling whereof it was generally believed none had more contributed than he had done; He resolved to endeavour that the Parliament should rather be abruptly dissolved, than any good success be produced by the Earls coun- cils, to effect which, on one side informations were made to some, of the dangers to be feared by the Army raised in Ireland in order to Reli- gion, and to others of the juncefes of the pretences of the Scots, and the good that might be obtained by favouring them in this conjunction; and on the other side every thing was represented to the King in the worst sense, and that so finely, as no in- direct intentions could be perceived; The matter of supply gave a fit occasion to heighten dis- contents: For the King being intent to vindicate his Honour, which he thought to be trampled on by the infidulces of the Scots, was very earnest in preparing for the War with them, and to enable him therein, he pressed hard for supplies, and offered to the Commons in recompence of their assistance to him, to quit for ever his claim of Ship-money, which at that time being warranted by a Judgement of all the Judges in the Exche- quer Chamber, had as good an establishment as our Laws could give it: The Commons were somewhat deliberate in this affair of money, and first they defined security from the King for re- dres of grievances in three particulars.

First, for clearing the Subjects property, Secondly, for establishment of Religion, Thirdly, for the Privileges of Parliament, The Lords seemed somewhat more sensible of the King's Proposition for supply, and after many conferences with the Commons, did at last dispose them to a compliance, but the Question, being in that house asked how much would serve to answer the present expectations, Secretary Vane demanded twelve Subsidies, which drew to which much higher discourses, that all became desperate, so that on the 9th of May by a unanimous consent of the King's Council, he was advised to their dissolution, and the Parliament was the next day dissolved.

It is said this fatal action was precipitated upon some intelligence, that the house of Commons meant to vote against the War with Scotland, which was suggested, for that the day before in the debates for money, some glances had been made at an inquisition into the cauifes of the War, which were improved to draw on that fatal coun- cel, and it was likewise reported, that the Mar- quees of Hamilton was a great Stickler in this matter, matter and that he had privately prevailed with the King to dissolve the Parliament before it was proposed in Council, thereby to improve his Majesties affairs the more, that he might confirm the Scorns and distract the English, to work his own advantages on both.

The King, in the mean time, was on their march Northward, and my Lord Convey marched with the Van some days before the rest could come up, and as he was marching, news was brought that the Scotch Army was march'd to Dunbar, which was their old Quarter the last year not far from Berwick: upon this advice he was ordered to halt forwards towards Newcastile; but he got thither, fresh intelligence came, That the Scotch Army was march'd into England on the 20th of August; The King met this advice in his way to York, and dispatched orders to Convey to do what he could to impede their advance, till the Army could come up, upon this advice Convey calling his Officers together, the result was, that they should keep the peace at Newborne upon fine to hinder their pillaging of Newcastile, where Sir Jacob Astley had newly entered with his Regiment, but had not time to make any fortifications: The King made all the haste he could, but by that time he reached Northallerton, about two days march on this side of Newcastile; The Lord Convey sent to him an account of a defect of the Forces under his command, which they had not receiv'd at Newborne; The subsistence of which provision was as follows:

August the 27th, the Lord Convey upon information of the march of the Scotch Army, and that they design upon Newcastile, drew up three thousand Foot, and about twelve hundred Horse to secure the peace at Newborne: The Foot he lodged behind a Brit't work newly ceas'd up for that purpose and placed the Horse in convenient posts to be ready to receive the Enemy if they came on. General Left marched the greatest part of his Army that night to the Rivers' side, and before morning planted there nine pieces of Ordnance, which he covered with bulrushes, that they might not be seen by the English; the next morning he sent a Trumpet with a Letter to the Lord Convey, desiring leave therein to pass towards the King with their Petition, to which he returned a letter, he would let a few pass, but not an Army; Left then commanded three hundred horse to advance into the River, whom the Marketers from the Works so gallantly received by some of the English Troops commanded by Commissary General Wilmot, Sir John Digby, Captain Neill, and Captain Daniel O Neale, but they were so over-armed with numbers, that they were forced to retreat; Left then discharged his Cannon upon the English foot, which so terrified them, that they quickly left their postion, and threw down their arms, and fled: The Scotch horse encouraged with this success, plunged into the River, and paffed over, and were gallantly received by some of the English Troops commanded by Commissary General Wilmot, Sir John Digby, Captain Neill, and Captain Daniel O Neale, but they were so over-armed with numbers, that they were forced to retreat in disorder, three hundred of the English being killed and taken in the encounter; Convey then defeated the rest, and left the Scotch Army without any further interdiction poffess Newcastile, which was a little before quitted by Sir Jacob Astley, as not at that time tenible, but he first sunk his Cannon in the River, Convey retreated with his Troops towards York, to which place the King and the Earl of Strafford with the rest of the Army were march'd before, and there by the Lieutenant General he was assured of not doing his duty duty at Newburne, which he as well as he could executed, but acquitted not himself thereby (in the opinion of many men either) of Cowards or Treachery, though matters proceeded not so far as to a publick Sentence Judicially upon him.

Whilesthe Scotch Army were on their march towards Newcastle, a party from Berwick marched to Donner, and drew of some Ordnance which General Leis had left there, but the Earl of Haddington, who had some Troops near to Guard the Borders, came in to oppose them, that they were forced to leave them, and return hastily to Berwick: The Earl a while after with two of his Brothers was smothered in the Ruines of the Castle of Dunlaw.

The Scots at their being in England had so formed a way of intelligence with some of the English Nobility and Gentry, that nothing succeeded well in the Counsels or actions of the King against them, and by this means they took courage to invade the Kingdom, which otherwise they might not have done, and this treachery was afterwards in the Uproar of Cromwell boasted to the writer of his Papers by Archbishop John- fon then Lord of sparrton, who valued himself to have been the chief contriver in it, as that which thereby gave the occasion of raising to the Royal Family of the STUARTS. Mr. Erastus Cambridge, afterwards Clerk of the Council of State in the year 1648, after the murder of this King was often imported to Scotland in that correspondence, and he carried his letters in a hollow staff to prevent discovery, and many others that were in those intrigues, who are yet alive, and we have charity to believe, never intended to see such sad effects of their Counsels as afterwards induced to the subversion of our Government, and the deloration of one of the most flourishing Kingdoms of Europe.

The Scots confederates in prudence of what their friends in England had agreed, declared in a Pamphlet, published at the head of their Army, (which was dispersed in London, and many other places) not to lay down Arms till the reformed Religion were setled in both Nations upon fire grounds, and the causers and Abetters of their present troubles brought to publick Justice in Parliament, and their Abettors they declared to be the Prelates and their adherents, but more particularly the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, and the Earl of Strafford: They pretended upon their march into England to take nothing from any of the English, but for ready money or bonds, but they were no sooner settled in New-Castle, but they seized on four ships laden with corn, and imposed a tax of 350 l. per diem on the Bishoprick of Durham, and 300 l. per diem upon Northumber- land, which was more than their whole King- donme could provide for some years after, when an English Army had the power of Scotland, though their trade was free and greater than it had been many years before, and when much money was monethly brought in by the English in Specie yet could not more than 6000 l. a moneth be rais'd in the whole Kingdom, and that not without extreemt rigour.

The King having lost the occasion of getting a reputation in arms by being perused to the lift years treaty at Berwick, and being now in great perplexity by the unfaitfulness of many of those about him, could think of no expedient to good as to call together the great council of his Peers to advise with them, and therefore Wills were inferred to them to assemble at York on the 24. of September, but this was not very well liked by those who favoured the Scots, whose chief design sim'd at the meeting of a Parliament, which they feared the meeting of the Peers might prevent wherefore the Earls of Bradford, Hesford, Exeter, Warwick, Mowbray, Bellington, and Brifford, and the Lords Say, Broke, P. G., Meneville, and the Lord Edward Howard presented a Peti- tion to the King, representing many great disperia- pers and dangers, threatening the Church and State, and his Royal Person, under seven heads. 1. The Danger and hazard to which he is ex- posed in the War, the waste of his Revenue there- by, and the discontents occasioned by the disorders of the Soldiers.

2. Sundry Innovations in matters of Relig- ion.

3. Increafe of Popery by implanting those of Religion in places of trust, in commanding men and arms in the Field, they being not permitted by Law to have any arms in their Hous's.

4. The great mischiefs that may ensue, if the Forces raised in Ireland should be brought into England.

5. The urging of Ship-money.

6. The heavy charge upon Merchandize, to the discomagement of Trade, and the multitude of Monopolies whereby the Makers of the King- don are burdened.

7. The grief of the Subjects by long intermission of Parliament, and the dissolution of such as have been called without effect.

"For Remedy whereof, They pray that a Parlia- ment may be summoned, whereby the causes of the Grievances that the people lye under may be taken away, and the Authors and Coun- selors be brought to tryal and punish- ment, as their occasions shall require. And that the War may be composed without blood, to the honour and safety of the King's person, the comfort of the people, and the uniting both Realms against the Common Enemy of the reformed Religion."

Many of the Citizens of London who were in combination with some of these Lords and the Scots, did influence the Common Council, that a Petition was framed in the name of all the Citizens of London, also to the same purpose as this of the Lords.

The King saw by these applications, what endeavours were used to weaken him in the opinio- ns of his people, and was forced to comply to the necessity of the time; wherefore he acquainted the Lords, that before the receipt of their Petition, foreseeing the danger that threatened himself and the Crown, he had summoned the Peers to consult with them what was best to be done for his own honour and safety of the Kingdom, where they with the rest might offer any thing conduces- sible to those ends. The
The Scots proceeded hand in hand with their friends in England: in the substance of a Petition to the King about this time presented, requesting that a Parliament might be called in England for settling a Peace between the two Nations, they sent the Petition to the Lord Lieutenant Secretary of State for Scotland, who delivered it to the King, but an answer thereunto was refused to the meeting of the Peers.

Of the 24th of September, the Peers assembled at York, and the King at the opening of the Assembly spake to them, to this effect, That an Army of Rebels being within the Kingdom, he thought it advisable according to the Privilege of his Predecessors in like cause to call them together, that into their advice and assistance, he and they might proceed jointly to the settlement of their injuries, and secure him and his good Subjects from their malice: He said, He had of himself resolved to call a Parliament to meet on the third of November next, and in the mean time to declare war. First, also, assign to give the Petition of the Rebels (for so he now on all occasions termed the Scots) and in what manner to treat with them: Secondly, how the English Army should be maintained till supplies from the Parliament might be had.

The Lords entered into Confutations of these matters, and for their better information, the King could a true relation to be given to them of the state of the whole business, and upon what reasons and advices, the unanimous consent of the Privy Council for this War was guided: After many debates, To the first point, they advised the King to a treaty with the Scots; and to the second, they used their mediation with the City of London for a Loan to the King for the present support of his Army: A message was hereupon sent to the Scots to intimate his Mjieties content that a treaty should be had at York between him and them, The Scots replied, They had no place left for security; The King's Ministers, considering that the Lieutenant of Ireland, who had his residence there, commanded his Mjeties Army, and who proclaimed them Traitors in Ireland before the King had done it in England, and against whom as a chief Incendiary they intended to complain; hereupon it was concluded that the treaty should be at Rippon, and the King appointed six Earls, and as many Bishops to be Commissioners on his part, and the Scots nominated as many Noblemen on theirs, and for the better understanding of the state of the Affair, the Earl of Trevaryq, the King's late Commissioner in Scotland, was ordered to be present, to give account as occasion offered of what had passed in Scotland from the beginning of the troubles; the Earl of Bristol managed the Treaty for the English, and the Lord London for the Scots, the great part of the demands of each side were acceded to without great difficulty, That which seemed hardest to the English, was to confer to the paying of monies in England for the Scots, having an Army of their own at the same time being: For the Scots notwithstanding their pretences of coming into England without a choice to the Nation, had by this time increased their levies to the sum of eight hundred and fifty pounds a day: Nevertheless, the English Lords willing on any condition to make peace, agreed with the Scots in the ensuing Articles; Which on the 26th of October were signed by the Commissioners, and afterwards by the King, but there were many other demands of the Scots referred to a further treaty, which the King consented to be afterwards holden at London. The Articles agreed at Rippon, were these following.

1. That there be a cessation of Arms both by Sea and Land from this present.
2. That all acts of Hostility do henceforth cease.
3. That both parties shall peaceably retire during the treaty whatever they poffes at the time of the cessation.
4. That all such persons who lived in any of his Majesties Forces beyond the River of Tees, shall not exempt their lands which lie within the Counties of Northumberland and the Bithoprick of Durham from such contributions as shall be laid upon them for the payment of eight hundred and fifty pounds per diem.
5. That none of the Kings Forces upon the other side of the Tees shall by any impediments put such contributions as are already allowed for the maintenance of the Scottish Army, and shall fetch no Victuals nor forage out of their bounds, except that which the Inhabitants and owners thereof shall bring voluntarily unto them, and that any restraints or detention of Victuals, Cattle or forage which shall be made by the Scots within those bounds for their maintenance, shall be no brake.
6. That no recruits shall be brought into either Armies from the time of the Cessation, and during the Treaty.
7. That the contribution of eight hundred and fifty pounds per diem, shall be only raised out of the Counties of Northumberland, Bithoprick, Town of Newcastle, Cumberland and Weiterneland: and that the not payment thereof shall be no brake of the Treaty, but the Countries and Towns shall be left to the Scots power to raise the same, but not to exceed the sums agreed upon, unless for other causes of driving to be set by a Prizer of the Forrage.
8. That the River of Tees shall be the bounds of both Armies (excepting alwys the Town and Caffie of Stockton, and the Village of Esgillif) and the Countries of Northumberland and Bithoprick, be the limits within which the Scottish Army is to reside, having liberty for them to send such Convoy as shall be necessary for the gathering up only of the contributions, which shall be unpaid by the Counties of Northumb and Cumberland.
9. That if any person commit any private infora, infece it shall be no breach of the Treaty, if upon complaint made by either parties, reparations and punishment be granted.
10. If no Victuals be delivered upon the prices which shall be agreed upon, and ready money offered for the same reatisfied, shall be no breach of the Cessation to take such Victuals paying such prices.
11. No new fortification to be made during the Treaty against either partie.
12. That the Subjects of both Kingdoms may in their trade of Commerce freely pass to and from without any say at all, but it is particularly provided that no member of either Army, pass without a formal pass, under the hands of the Generals, or of him that commands in chief.

at his first coming to the House of Peers, for he was not yet come from York, and this they resolved on to prevent, and be before hand with him in an Impeachment he had ready against Mr.
Pym, and some of the Leading Members of both Houses for holding intelligence with the Scots, which he intended to have offered in the House of Peers as soon as he had taken his place amongst them: Wherefore tho' in the Commons house that were concerned, were very industrious in their designs, and the house had not fate many dates before he was therein declared to be guilty of High-Treason, and a secret Committee of five were nominated to collect matter for an impeachment against him: This was to take up more time than the Prosecutors could with convenience to themselves allow of, so that the house were prevailed with upon affections of particular persons to vote that a General Impeachment of High-Treason should be made against him to the Lords, to endeavour thereby to have him impe-cated from that House. And on the 11th of November Mr. Pym was sent from the Commons to the Lords with a Message, which he de\livered in these words.

My Lords,

"The Knights, Citizens and Burgesses now assembled for the Commons in Parliament, have received information of divers traitorous designs and practices of a great Peer of this house;
And by virtue of a Command from them, I am to here in the name of the Commons now assembled in Parliament, and in the name of all the Commons England, to Mr. Strafford, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland of High-Treason; and they have commanded me to further to deprecate your Lordships, that it may be receiv'd from Parliament, and forthcoming committed to Prison; They have further commanded me to let you know, that they will within a very few days refer to your Lordships with the Particular Articles and Grounds of this accusation.

The Earl being required to withdraw, it was much debated by the Peers, whether he should be imprisoned on a General accusation without any particular Act of Treason charged against him, but upon the Question it was carried in the affirmative; and he being called in, kneel'd at the Bar, And after standing up, The Lord Keeper spake to him as followeth.

My Lord of Strafford,

"The House of Commons in their own name,
and in the name of the whole Commons of England, have this day acquitted your Lordship of the Lords of the higher House of Parliament, of High-Treason, The Articles they will in a very few days produce, in the mean time they have defined of my Lords, and my Lord's have accordingly Resolved, That your Lordship shall be committed to safe custody to the Gentleman usher, and be receiv'd from the House till you Lordship shall clear your self of the accusations that shall be laid against you: And hereupon he was immediately taken \into Custody.

The next day the Commons considering the great Prejudices of the Northern Counties by the two Armies that lay upon them, resolved that a hundred thousand pound should be forthwith layed for their maintenance, and till it could be regularly levied, a hundred thousand pound was borrowed in the City upon the Credit of some of the Members of the House of Commons. Many Petitions from all parts were brought to them for treds of Grievances, and to be relieved against Orders and Decrees of the Council Table, Stare-Chamber, and High Commiission Court, which were referred to several Committees, and devised where they were ordered out of Prison from them, especially Prynne, Burton and Baffuck, who seemed more eminent than the rest of the Sufferers, and a while after by the intervention of the Lords with the King, The Bishop of Lincoln also was freed from his imprisonment in the Tower.

The King willing to be rid of the Scotch Army, bought the Commons to the Lords who were employed in the Treaty at Rippon, or any ten of them to treat with the Scotch Commis-ioners, or any seven of them, being the Earl of Rishays and Damferjin, John Lord Lowden, Six Patrick Hepburn, Six William Douglas, William Drummond, John Smyth Bayliff of Edinburgh, Alexander Wedderburn, Hugh Kennedy, Alexander Hemerson and Archibald Johnson to take into consideration their demands, and compose all differences arising thereupon, which commission was put under the Great Seal of eight demands.

England on the 23rd of November, and in a while after the Scots presented their demands, which were eight in number, and afterwards put in seventeen heads, wherein One, (and that not the least considerable) was That some Scotish men of respect might be in places of trust a-about the King, Queen, and Prince: This was that which all their Pretences aimed at notwithstanding their Zeal to reformation of Religion, and though all they desired else was granted, they never attained their ends in this, for the troubles which they ray'd, did not only bring after them a misery to this Nation, but theirs also, and the ring-leaders of them wanted not their part thereof.

Sir Francis W Chandebank Secretary of State was aimed at as one of the great Delinquents in the opinion of the Parliament, Being one suspected in his Religion, a great favourite of Priests of the Romish Church; for whom he had obtained many Reprizes, and was thought to be guilty of misdemeanors of a higher nature: But he thinking himselfe not sufficient power to ride out the approaching storm, made his escape into France, where he dyed a Roman Catholic.

In the consideration of grievances, the charge imposed upon the Subject for providing and fur-ishing of Ships, and the Affetments for laying money for that purpose, commonly called Shipmoney, are voted by both House's to be against the Laws of the Realm, and all proceedings in the case both at the Council Table, Stare-Chamber, and Courts of Justice declared null and void. This was thought a strange way of proceeding; Pitt, because all the Judges had subscribed unanimously to the Unlawfulness of it in time of danger, of which danger the King was declared

The reign of King Charles the First.

The Council on both sides in the Courts of Justice, and by all the Judges in the Exchequer Chamber, they passed a definitive sentence for it on the behalf of the King: Thirldly, because the votes of the House of Commons were passed without hearing the King's Council, or calling the Judges to know the reasons of their opinions; and fourthly, because the arguments of Justice Coke and Justice Has ton for the illegality thereof were ordered to be put in print, and those of the other Judges for the legality of it suppressed; but those Votes were not by the makers of them deemed a sufficient security against imposing the like charge for the future, but they took in the King's aid to an Act of Parliament for the confirmation of them. And they now began to consider of a charge of High Treason against the Lord Keeper, Finch, and the Judges: In the first whereof they made some expedition, but more deliberate in that of the Judges being willing to keep a rod over them that nothing should be declared for Law against their intentions: This Debate of the Ship-money led them to consider of the first occasion of the raising of it, which was because the Parliament immediately preceding the last was dissolved without that supply the King expected from them; and from hence they were led into an Enquiry of several violations of the Privileges of Parliament by the permission of diverse members, and a Judgement against them in the King's Bench: And then all the Inconveniences were summed up that hapned by the Long intermission of Parliament, to provide against which, they resolved of a Bill for a Tryennial Parliament. These debates took up many days: but in the mean time, whilst their consultations were had for a reformation of the civil state, the Scotch Commissioners and their friends were not idle in their endeavours to reform or alter the Ecclesiastical State: In Order whereunto many Petitions from all places were delivered to the House of Commons against Ecclesiastical discipline, The Ceremonies of the Church, and the Government of it by Bishops, anoght which one was presented by Alderman Pennington, subscribed by fifteen hundred Citizens of London.

This Petition was very surprising to many sober men in the house of Commons, who were not unwilling to have the statutes in the Government of the Church reformed, but could not approve of the alteration of the Government itself, so that after some debate, the Petition was transmitted to another time, but those that favoured the business, though they were not successful in it, tell a while after upon another argument more plausible, which was an inspection into the legality of the late convocation, which produced this resolution of the Commons.

That the Clergy in a Synod or Convocation, had no power to make Canons, Constitutions or Laws Ecclesiastical to bind either Laity or Clergy without a Parliament: And that the Canons are against the Fundamental Laws of this Realm, against the King's Prerogative, Property of the Subjects, the Right of Parliaments, and do tend to Faction and Sedition.

The Clergy of this Convocation thought themselves hardly used in these Votes, who thought to have been called by themselves or their Council to have justified their proceedings, alleging that it was never known before, that the Convocation had dependence upon the Parliament, either in the calling or dissolving of it, nor in the confirmation and authorising of the Acts thereof, but only on the King himself, as appears by the Statute made in the 26th of Henry the Eighth, and the confent prattice ever since, and it is certain that before the Canons were subscribed, they were imparted to the King, and by him communicated to the Lords of the Privy Council, the Judges and the King's Council learned in the Laws of this Realm, being then attending. In the hearing of all which they were read, and by all approved, which had been strange if any thing tending to Faction and Sedition, or to the diminution of the Subjects' property and the King's Prerogative, or otherwise against the known Laws of the Land had been found in them; but the Reputation of the Commons was at this time so great, it was not safe for any to dispute their actions: The very same day that the Canons were thus voted down, the Scots Commissioners had presented a Paper to the Parliament, where in they named the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury an Incedary, and promised to bring in a complaint against him the morrow after, this produced an Order in the House of Commons for a Committee to draw up a charge against him, but the Scots laying to bring in their Complaint, the next day, Mr. Holli the day after was sent up to the Lords from the Commons with a General Impeachment of High Treason against him, praying that he might be impeached and impeached, and in a few days they would resort to them, with the particular ground of their accusation; immediately upon this the Scots Commissioners sent in their charge, upon the reading whereof he was committed to the custody of the Usher of the Black Rod, where he continued ten weeks before any particular charge was brought against him: The Lord Keeper Finch was the next great Delinquent against whom the Commons designed to proceed, whereas he having gained intelligence, he moved by his friends in that House, that he might be permitted to clear himself before them of several imputations that lay upon him, which the Commons agreed to, and on the 21st of December he made an Elegant and Queynt Oration, tending to the Vindication of himself in every particular, but notwithstanding all that he could say, they voted him that very day a Traitor, upon their considerations.

1. For refusing to read the Remonstrance against the Lord Treasurer Welton, 4 Carlii when the Parliament desired it.
2. For calumniating, pernading, and threatening the Judges to deliver their Opinion for the levying of Ship-money.
3. For several illegal actions in Forrest matters.
4. For ill offices done in moving the King to displace the last Parliament, and causing his Majesties Declaration thereupon to be put forth.

The next day he was accused before the Lords, but he wisely withdrew himself into Holland, and thereby escaped the danger that threatened him, and
and a while after Sir Edward Littleton was made Lord Keeper of the Great Seal of England in his place.

The King having been sometime in treaty with the Dutch Embassador for a match betwixt the young Prince of Orange and the Lady Mary his daughter, before he would make any conclusion therein, thought fit to communicate the same to the Lords in Parliament, which he did on the tenth of February; the consideration that induced to this treaty, he said were three; First, the matter of Religion, wherein there needed no dispensation, nor fear that his daughters consciences should be any way perverted.

Secondly, he esteemed a firm alliance and confederacy with the States, as useful to the Kingdom as that of any of his neighbours, especially considering their affinity, neighbourhood, and way of strength; And lastly, the use he might make of this alliance towards the establishing of his Sitter and Nephews; he told them, the articles of Marriage were in a manner concluded, but not to be ratified till that alliance should be ended and approved, which he said he thought not fit to enter upon without their assent, he then delivered to them, the propositions offered by him to the States Embassador, which he left to their consideration and free debate, desiring them to make as much expedition in their Councils as to great a business should require: The Lords communicated this favourable Proposition of the King to the Commons who receiv'd it very well, and indeed nothing from the King since the first sitting of this Parliament was so acceptable to both Houses, which was a wonder, considering the jealousies of the times.

About this time, a few days before the particular charge against the Earl of Strafford was brought up to the Lords by Mr. Pym under 3 Articles; They had a little while before exhibited some General Articles, to which he could not be forced to answer, but upon this further impeachment, the Lords required him to answer to the whole, and though the charge was very long, yet were the Commons so pressing for his answer, that by the 24th of February he delivered it to the Lords, and it was read in the House, the King being present.

Upon the carrying up of this Impeachment, he was taken out of the city of London, by the order of the Black Rod, and committed to the Tower, he moved the Lords to have Council allowed him, which was much opposed by the Commons, but his accusation having much in it of matter of Law, he had permission to have Council; The Articles as they consisted of first of Commons, and as they were after distributed into particulars, we shall never when we come to the relation of his Trial.

The King gives his Assent to the Bill for a Triennial Parliament.

The Bill for Triennial Parliaments having pass'd both Houses, was on the 16th of February offered to the King, it was entitul'd An Act for the preventing inconveniences happening by the Long intermission of Parliaments: and at the same time the Commons presented an Act for the relief of his Majesties Army, and the Northern parts of the Kingdom, which was a Grant of four intire Subsidies; to both which the King gave his Royal assent, and the Bill for Triennial Parliaments was an Act of as great Favour to the Subject as ever pass'd in Parliament, for if the King should refuse to summon a Parliament at the time therein limited, the Chancellor or Keeper might issue out Writs to summon the Peers, and for election of the Commons; and if the Chancellor or Keeper should not do it, any twelve of the Peers might summon the Parliament, and if the Peers should omit the issuing out of summons, the Sheriffs in Counties, and other Magistrates respectively might cause Elections to be made, and if the Sheriffs should refuse, the Freeholders in Counties, and all other persons that have right of choosing, might make Election of Members; And the Members so chosen, were under great penalties obliged to attend; with many other clauses to accomplish the end designed by the Act, which also had in it several expressions too reflecting on the Prerogative: but the King really believing most of the mischief's then complained of, proceeded from the too long intermission of Parliament, and being resolved for the future to communicate freely and frequently that way with his Subjects, he contented to it: And this Act of his Grace and Favour was so pleasing to the Parliament, that upon a conference with both Houses it was unanimously agreed to wait upon the King at White-Hall, and return him their humble thanks, and that night Bone-fires and other tokens of joy were made in the City by Order of Parliament.

On the same day the charge against the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury was carried from the Commons to the Lords by Sir Henry Vane the younger, whereupon he was ordered to the Tower, but upon his humble Suit to the Lords, his commitment was resolv'd till the first of March.

The Scots Commissioners laboured very much under-hand to introduce their Presbyterian discipline into the Church of England, and by their confederates had made an active party in the House of Commons, who took frequent occasion of airing the Bishops, and in these debates they spared not Episcopacy; also the debate of the forementioned City Petition was now refus'd, and many members spake for the eradication of the Episcopal Hierarchy, amongst which Nathaniel Pym the younger Son of the Lord Say was most vehement, but the Lord Falkland, the Lord Digby, and many others of great Learning and Integrity, did by the weight of reason so far prevail, that the Order of Episcopacy was yet preserved, though their power was much lessen'd by a vote pass'd in the House of Commons preparatory to a Bill, viz. that no Bishop shall have any vote in Parliament, nor any Judicial power in the Star-Chamber, nor in any High Court in temporal affairs, and that no Clergie-man shall be in Commission of the Peace: The next thing of note was the Tryal of the Earl of Strafford, which began on the 22d of March, and was so remarkable in the circumstances of it, that we shall be very particular in the relation thereof.

He came from the Tower about seven of the clock in the morning, accompanied with six Barges, wherein were 100 Soldiers of the Tower, all with Partisans for his Guard, and 50 pair of Oars: at his landing at Westminster he was attended with 200 of the Trained Bands, and was Tttt 3 Guarded.
Guarded by them into the Hall: The King, Queen and Prince came about 9 a clock, but kept themselves private within their closets, so that the King saw and heard all that passed, but was seen of none: When the Earl entered the Hall, the Porter asked the Usher of the Black Rod, whether the Axe should be carried before him or no, who answered that the King had expressly forbidden it, nor was it the custom of England to use that Ceremony, but only when the party accused was to be put upon his Jury. Those of the Upper house sat with their heads covered, those of the Lower house that were present (for they sat not there as a house) were all uncovered. The Bishops upon the Saturday before did voluntarily declare the giving of their Suffrages in matters criminal, and of that nature, according to the provision of the Cannon Law and practice of the Kingdom to this day, and therefore would not be present, yet whilst they gave in a Protestation that their absence should not prejudice them of that or any other Priviledge competent to them, as the Lords spiritual in Parliament, which was accepted.

The Earl of Arundel sate as Lord high Steward of England, and at the Earls appearing commanded the Provocutors to proceed, Mr. Pym being Speaker of the Committee of the Commons that were appointed to prosecute, gave in the Articles of Impeachment, which we shall here insert as they were read in Court.

1. That he the said Thomas Earl of Strafford hath traitorously endeavoured to subvert the fundamental Laws and Government of the Realms of England and Ireland, and infeft thereof to introduce an arbitrary and tyrannyal Government by Law, which he hath declared by tyrannous words, Counsels and Actions, and by giving his Majesty advice by force of Arms to compel his loyal Subjects to submit thereto.

2. That he hath traitorously affumed to himself Regal power over the lives, liberties, persons, lands and goods of his Majesties subjects in England and Ireland, and hath exercised the same tyrannically to the subversion of many both of Peers and others of his Majesties Leige people.

3. That the better to enrich and enable himself to go through with his traitorous designs, he hath detained a great part of his Majesties Revenue, without giving legal account, and hath taken great sums out of the Exchequer, converting them to his own use, when his Majesty was necessitated for his own urgent occasions, and his Army had been a long time unpaid.

4. That he hath traitorously abused the power and authority of his Government, to the increasings, consternating, and encouraging of Papists, that to him might settle a mutual dependence and confidence between himself and that party, and by their help procure and accomplish his malitious and tyrannical designs.

5. That he hath maliciously endeavoured to stir up enmity and hostility between his Majesties Subjects of England, and those of Scotland.

6. That he hath traitorously broken the great trust reposed in him by his Majesty of Lieutenant General of his Army, by wilfully betraying divers of his Majesties Subjects to death, his Army to a dishonourable retreat by the Scots at Newburn, and the Town of Newcastle into their hands, to the end that by the effusion of blood, by dishonour, and so great a loss of Newcastle, his Majesties Realm of England might be engaged in a National and irreconcilable Quarrel with the Scots.

7. That to preserve himself from being questioned for these and other his traitorous courtes, he laboured to subvert the rights of Parliament, and the antient course of Parliamentary proceedings, &c. by false and malicious Slanders to incense his Majesty against Parliament. By which words, counsels and actions, he hath traitorously, and contrary to his allegiance laboured to alienate the hearts of the Kings liege people from his Majesty, to fet a division between them, and to ruin and destroy his Majesties Kingdoms, for which they impeach him of High Treason against our Sovereign Lord the King his Crown and dignity.

3. And he the said Earl of Strafford was Lord Deputy of Ireland, and Lieutenant General of the Army there, (viz.) of his most Excellent Majesties for his Kingdoms both of England and Ireland, and Lord President of the North, during the time that all and every of the crimes and offences after bet for were done and committed: And he the said Earl was Lieutenant General of all his Majesties Army in the North parts of England during the time that the crimes and offences in the 5 and 6 Articles of bet for were done and committed.

The further Impeachment which was more particular, was thus express'd.

1. That he the said Earl of Strafford the 23th day of March in the eighth year of his now Majesties Reign, was President of the Kings Council in the Northern parts of England.

That he the said Earl being President of the said Council, on the 23rd day of March, a Commission under the Great Seal of England with schedules of instruction thereto annexed was directed to the said Earl and others the Commissioners therein named, whereby amongst other things, power and authority is limited to the said Earl and others the Commissioners therein named, to hear and determine all offences and misdemeanors, suits, debates, controversies and demands, causes, things and matters whatsoever therein contained, and within certain precincts in the said Northern parts therein specified, and in such manner as by the said schedule is limited and appointed.

That amongst other things in the said Instructions, it is directed that the said President and others therein appointed shall hear and determine according to the course of proceedings in the Court of Star-Chamber, diverse offences, delicts and falsities therein mentioned, whether the same be provided for by the Acts of Parliament or no, so that the fines imposed be not less than by Act or Acts of Parliament provided for by those offences is appointed.

That also amongst other things in the said Instructions, it is directed that the said President and others therein appointed, have power to ex-
mine, hear, and determine, according to the course of proceedings in the Court of Chancery all manner of complaints for any matter within the said Precedents, as well concerning Lands, Tenements and Hereditaments, either Freehold, Customary or Copy-hold, as Leases and other things therein mentioned, and to try proceedings in the Court of Common Law by injunction or otherwise by all wases and means as is used in the Court of Chancery.

And although the former Presidents of the said Council had never put in practice such instructions, nor had they any such instructions, yet the said Earl in the month of May in the said 8th year, and divers years following, did put in practice, exercise and use, and caused to be used and put in practice the said Commission and instructions, and did direct and exercise an exorbitant and unlawful power and jurisdiction on the persons and estates of his Majesties Subjects in those parts, and did disinherit divers of his Majesties Subjects in those parts of their inheritances, bestowed their postruption, and did fine, ran- some, punish and imprison them, and caused them to be fined, ranfomed, punished and imprisoned, to their ruine and deftruction, and namely Sir Conyers Darby, Sir John Bourcher, and divers others against the Laws, and in subversion of the same. And the said Commission and instructions were procured and inflicted by advice of the said Earl.

And he the said Earl to the intent that such illegal and unjust power might be exercised with the greater licence and will, did advise, counsel and procure further directions, in and by the said instructions to be given, that no Prohibition be granted at all, but in cases where the said Council shall exceed the limits of the said Instructions: And that if any writ of Habeas Corpus be granted, the party be not discharged till the party perform the Decree and Order of the said Council.

And the said Earl in the 13th year of his now Majesties Reign, did procure a new Commission to himself and others therein appointed with the said instructions and other unlawful ad- ditions.

That the said Commission and Instructions were procured by the solicitation and advice of the said Earl of Strafford.

2. That shortly after the obtaining of the said Commission dated the 21st of March in the 8th year of his now Majesties Reign, (to wit,) the last day of August then next following, he the said Earl, (to bring his Majesties Liege people into a dislike of his Majestty and of his Government, and to terrify the Justices of the Peace from executing the Laws; he the said Earl being then President as aforesaid, and a Justice of the Peace,) did publicly at the Assizes held for the County of York in the City of York in and upon the said last day of August, declare and pub- lish before the people there attending for the ad- ministration of Justice according to the Law, and in the presence of the Justices sitting, that some of the Justices were all for Law, but they should finde that the Kings little finger should be heavier than the Loynes of the Law.

3. That the Realm of Ireland having been
The warrant That Decree a Lordship of Ireland, did cause the said Earl of Strafford, without any warrant or authority of Law or offence discovering any such punishment: And he the said Earl did also at Dublin within the saidRealm of Ireland in the month of March in the 12th. year of his Majesties Reign without any legal or due proceedings or Tryal give or cause to be given against the Lord Mount-Norris, (then and yet a Peer of Ireland, and then Vice-Treasurer and Receiver General of the Realm of Ireland, and one of the Principal Secretaries of State, and Keeper of the Privy Signet of the said Kingdom) a sentence of death by a Council of War called together by the said Earl of Strafford, without any warrant or authority of Law or offence discovering any such punishment: And he the said Earl did also at Dublin within the said Realm of Ireland in the month of March in the 12th. year of his Majesties Reign without any legal or due proceedings or Tryal give or cause to be given against the aforesaid Earl Mount-Norris to be dispossessed and put out of his Freehold and Inheritance of his Manor of Templemore in the County of Armagh, in the Kingdom of Ireland, the said Lord Mount-Norris having been two years before inquiet possession thereof.

6. That the said Earl of Strafford without any legal proceedings, and upon a paper Petition of Richard Raaffone, did cause the said Lord Mount-Norris to be dispossessed and put out of his Freehold and Inheritance of his Manor of Templemore in the County of Armagh, in the Kingdom of Ireland, the said Lord Mount-Norris having been two years before inquiet possession thereof.

7. That the said Earl of Strafford in the Holy Trinity in the 13th. year of his now Majesties Reign, did cause a cafe of Tenures upon defeitive Titles to be made or drawn up, without any Jury or Tryal, or other legal Processe, and without the consent of Parties, and did then procure the Judges of the said Realm of England to deliver their opinions and resolutions to that cause, and by colour of such opinions and resolutions, did without any legal proceeding cause Thomas Lord Dilton a Peer of the said Realm of Ireland, to be put out of possession of divers Lands and tenements, being his freehold in the County of Mayo and Roscommon, in the said Kingdom, and divers other of his Majesties Subjects to be also put out of possession, and dispossessed of their freehold by colour of the same resolutions, without legal proceedings, whereby many hundreds of his Majesties Subjects were undone, and their Families utterly ruined.

8. That the said Earl of Strafford upon a Petition of Sir John Gifford Knight, the first day of February in the said 13th. year of his Majesties Reign, without any legal processe made a Decree or order against Adam Viscount Left of Ely a Peer of the said Realm of Ireland, and Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and did cause the said Viscount to be imprisoned, and kept close Prisoner on pretence of disobedience to the said Decree or Order.

And the said Earl without any authority, and contrary to his Commission required and commanded the said Lord Viscount to yield unto him the Great Seal of the Realm of Ireland, which was then in his Custody, by his Majesties command, and imprisoned the said Chancellor for not obeying such command. And without any legal proceedings did in the same 13th. year imprison George Earl of Kildare a Peer of Ireland against Law, thereby to enforce him to submit his title to the Manor and Lordship of Castle-Lagh in the Queen County (being of great yearly value) to the said Earl of Strafford will and pleasure, and kept him one year prisoner for the said cause, two months whereof he kept him close Prisoner, and reduced to enslave him, notwithstanding his Majesties letters for his enlargement to the said Earl of Strafford directed.

And upon a Petition exhibited in October 1635. by Thomas Hillis against Dame Mary Hilles Widow, to him the said Earl of Strafford, the said Earl of Strafford recommended the said Petition to the Council Table of Ireland, where the moft part of the Council gave their vote and opinion for the said Lady, but the said Earl finding fault herewith, caused an Order to be made against the said Lady, and threatened her, that if she refused to submit thereunto, he would imprison her and fine her 500L, that if she continued obstinate, he would continue her imprisonment, & double her fine every moneth by moneth: Wherethere the said Earl of Strafford, the said Earl finding fault herewith, caused an Order to be made against the said Lady, and threatened her, that if she refused to submit thereunto, he would imprison her and fine her 500L, that if she continued obstinate, he would continue her imprisonment, & double her fine every moneth by moneth: Wherethere the said Earl of Strafford, and the said Earl in like manner did imprison divers other of his Majesties Subjects upon pretence of disobedience to his Orders and Decrees, and other illegal commands by him made for pretended debts, titles of lands, and other causes in an arbitrary and extrajudicial course, upon paper Petitions to him preferred, and to other causes legally depending.

9. That the said Earl of Strafford the 16th. day of February in the 12th. year of his now Majesties Reign, affining to himself a power aboven and against Law, took upon him by a General warrant under his hand to give power to the Lord Bishop of Downe and Connor, his Chancellor or Chancellors, and their several Officers thereto to be appointed to attach and arrest the bodies of all such of the meaner and poorer sort, as should not only refuse to appear before them, or appearing, should omit or deny to perform or undergo all lawful decrees, sentences and processes issued against them, and them to commit and keep in the next Gaol until they should either perform such sentences, or put in sufficient Bail to show some reason before the Council Table, of such their contempt and neglect; and the said Earl the day and year last mentioned signed and issued a warrant to that effect, and made the like warrant to all other Bishops and their Chancellors in the said Realm of Ireland to the same effect.

10. That the said Earl of Strafford being Lord Lieutenant, or Lord Deputy of Ireland, procured the sequestration of the Merchandize exported out and imported into that Realm to be farmed to his own use.

And in the ninth year of his now Majesties Reign, he having then interest in the said sequestrations (to advance his own gain and lust) did cause and procure the raise commodities of Ireland to be rated in the book of Rates for the Customs (according to which the sequestrations were usually gathered) at far greater values and prices than in truth they were worth. That is to say, Every Hicce at 20., in which it truth it was worth but five shillings, Every fene of Wooll at thirteen shillings flillings four pence, though the same ordinarily were worth but five flillings at the utmost, by which means the customers which was before but a twentieth part of the true value of the commodities, was enhanced sometimes to 4 l. a part, and sometimes to 4½ l. a part of the true value, to the great appeasement of the Subjects, and decay of Merchandize.

11. That the said Earl in the 9th year of his now Majesty's Reign, did by his own will and pleasure, and for his own brave restrain the exportation of the commodities of that Kingdom without his license, as namely Pipe-flakes and other commodities, and then raised great sums of money for licensing of exportation of those Commodities, and dilpensation of the said restraint imposed on them, by which means the Pipe-flakes were raised from 4 l. 10 s. or 5 l. per thousand to 11 l. per thousand, and other Commodities were enhanced in like proportion, and by the same means by him the thirty-first day of January.

12. That the said Earl being Lord Deputy of Ireland on the 9th of January in the 13th year of his Majesty's Reign, did then under colour to regulate the importation of Tobacco into the said Realm of Ireland, give a Proclamation in his Majesty's name, prohibiting the importation of Tobacco without license of him and the Council there, from and after the first day of May 1638, after which restraint the said Earl notwithstanding the said restraint, caused divers great quantities of Tobacco to be imported to his own use, and freighted divers Ships with Tobacco, which he imported to his own use; and that if any Ship brought Tobacco into any Port there, the said Earl and his Agents used to buy the same to his own use at their own prices; and if that the owner refused to let him have the same at under-values, then they were not permitted to vent the same, by which means, the said Earl having got the whole trade of Tobacco into his own hands, he sold it at great and excurrent prices (such as he left to impose) for his own profit.

And the more to abuse the said Monopoly of Tobacco, he the said Earl on the twenty-third day of February in the 13th year aforesaid, did issue another Proclamation commanding that none should put to sale any Tobacco by whole-sale from and after the last day of May then next following; but what should be made up into Rolls, and the same sealed with two Seals by himself appointed, one at each end of the Roll: And such as was not so sealed to be seized, appointing 6 d. the pound for a reward to such persons as should seize the same; And the persons in whose custody the unsealed Tobacco should be found, to be committed to goal, which last Proclamation was covered by a pretence of the restraining the sale of unwalloped Tobacco, but it was truly to advance the said Monopoly.

Which proclamation the said Earl did rigorously put in Execution by seizing the goods, fining, imprisoning, whipping, and putting the offenders against the same Proclamation on the Pillory, as namely Barnaby Hubbard, Edward Coveweh, and John Tumen; and divers others; and made the Officers of State and Justices of Peace and other Officers, to serve him in committing and executing these unjust and undue cooyties, by which Cruelties and unjust Monopolies, the said Earl raised an hundred thousand pounds per annum, to himself: And yet the said Earl though he enhanced the customs where it concerned the Merchants in General, yet drew down the impost formerly taken on Tobacco from 5 d. the pound to 3 d. the pound, being for his own profit to do. And the said Earl by the same and other rigorous and undue means, raised several other Monopolies and unlawful exactions for his own gain, viz. on Starch, Iron-pots, Claret, Tobacco-pipes, and several other commodities.

13. That Flax being one of the principal and Native Commodities of that Kingdom of Ireland, the said Earl having got great quantities thereof into his hands, and growing on his own lands did issue out several Proclamations, viz. One dated the 21st day of May in the 11th year of his Majesty's Reign, and the other dated the one and thirty-first of January in the same year, thereby prescribing and enjoining the working of Flax into yarn and thread, and the ordering of the same in such wages, wherein the Natives of that Kingdom were unpractised and unskilful; which Proclamations so issued were by his commands & Warrants to his Majesties Justices of Peace and other Officers, and by other rigorous means put in execution, and the FLAX wrought or ordered in other manner then as the Proclamation preferred, was feared and employed to the use of him and his Agents, and thereby the said Earl endeavoured to gain, and did gain in effect the sole sale of that native Commodity.

14. That the said Earl of Strafford by Proclamation dated the 16th day of October in the 14th year of his Majesties Reign, did impost upon the Owners, Malters, Pasters and Bostwains of every Ship, a new and unlawful Oath, viz. that they (two or more of them) immediately after the arrival of any Ship with any Port or Creek in the said Kingdom of Ireland, should give in a true invoice of the outward bulk of wares and merchandizes, and number of goods, and the qualities and conditions of the said Goods as far as to them should be known, and the names of the several Merchants proprietors of the said Goods, and the places from whence they were freighted and whether they were bound to discharge, which Proclamation was accordingly put in Execution, and sundry persons enforced to take the said unlawful Oath.

15. That the said Earl of Strafford traitorously and wickedly devised and contrived by force of arms in a war-like manner to subdue the subjects of the said Realm of Ireland, to bring them under his tyrannical power and will, and in pursuance of his wicked and traitorous purposes aforesaid, the said Earl of Strafford in the 8th year of his Majesties Reign, did by his own authority without any warrant of Law, tax and impose great sums of money upon the Towns of Balmoral, Bandoorbridge, Towang, and divers other Towns and places in the said Realm of Ireland, and did cause the same to be levied upon the Inhabitants of those Towns by Troops of Souldiers with force and arms in a war-like manner; And on the 9th day of March in the 12th year of year of his now Majesties Reign, traytorely did give authority unto Robert Savile a Sergeant at Arms, and to the Captains of Companies of Souldiers in severall parts of the Realm, to send such numbers of Souldiers to lie on the lands and houses of such as would not conform to his orders, until they should render obedience to his said orders and warrants, and after such submision (and not before) the said Souldiers to return to their Garrisons: And did also give his like warrants unto divers others, which warrants were in warlike manner with force and arms put in execution accordingly, and by such warlike means he did force divers of his Majesties Subjects of that Realm to submit themselves to his unlawful commands.

And in the said 12th year of his Majesties Reign, the said Earl of Strafford did traytorely cause certain Troops of Horse and Foot armed in warlike manner, and in warlike array with force and arms to expel Richard Butler from the possession of Castle Crowther in the territory of Idough in the said Realm of Ireland, and did likewise, and in the like warlike manner expel divers of his Majesties Subjects from their Hones, Families and Possessions, as namely Edward Bromley, Owen Oberman and Sir Cooper Horseylade, and divers others, to the number of about a hundred Families, and took and imprisoned them and their wives, and carried them prisoners to Dublin, and there detained them till they did yield up, surrender or release their respective estates and rights.

And the said Earl in like warlike manner had during his Government of the said Kingdom of Ireland, subdued divers others of his Majesties Subjects to his will, and thereby, and by the means aforesaid, hath levied war within the said Realm against his Majestie and his liege people of that Kingdom.

16. That the said Earl of Strafford the 12th of Feb. in the 7th year of his now Majesties Reign, intending to oppress the said Subjects of Ireland, did make a proposition, and obtained from his Majestie an allowance, that no complaint of injustice or oppression done in Ireland, should be received in England against any, or adjudged it first appeared that the party made first his address to him in Ireland: And he restored divers Fryeries and Maft-houses (which had been formerly suppressed by the precedent Deputies of that Kingdom, two of which houses were in the City of Dublin, and had been affilgued to the use of the University there) to the pretended owners thereof, who have since employed the same to the exercise of the Popish Religion.

17. And in the month of May and June last, the said Earl did raise an Army in the said Realm of Ireland consisting of eight thousand Foot, all of which except one thousand and thereabouts, were Papists, and the said 1000 were drawn out of the old Army there consisting of 2000 Foot, and in their places there were 1000 Papists put into the Army by the said Earl. And the more to ingage and rye the new Army of Papists to himself, and to encourage them, and to discourage and wear out the old Army, the said Earl did so provide, that the said New Army of Papists were duly paid, and had all necessaries provided for them, and permitted the exercise of their Religion, but the said old Army were for the space of one whole year and upwards unpaid.

18. And the said Earl being appointed Commissioner within eleven several Counties of the Northern parts of England, for compelling with Recusants for their forfeitures due to his Majestie, which commission beareth date the 8th day of July in the 5th year of his Majesties Reign that now is, and being also Receiver of the composition money thereby arising, and other debts, duties and penalties for his Majesties use, by Letters Patents dated the ninth day of the said July: he to engage the said Recusants to, did compound with them at low and under-rates, and provided that they should be discharged of all proceedings against them in all his Majesties Courts both Temporal and Ecclesiastical, in manifest breach of, and contrary to the Laws and Statutes of this Realm in that behalf establisht.

19. That the said Earl having taxed and levied the said impostions, and raised the said Monopolies, and committed the said oppressions in his Majesties name, and as by his Majesties Royal Command, he the said Earl in May in the 15th year of his Majesties Reign, did by his authority continue and frame a new and unusual Oath, by the purport whereof among many other things, the party taking the said Oath, was to swear that he should not protest against any of his Majesties Royal commands, but submit themselves in all obedience thereunto, which Oath he to contrivd to enforce the same on the Subjects of the Scottish Nation inhabiting in Ireland, and out of a hatred to the said Nation, and to put them to a discontent of his Majestie and his Government there, and compelled divers of his Majesties said Subjects there to take the said Oath, some whereof he grievously fined and imprisoned, and others he destroyed and exiled, and namely the tenth of October An. Dom. 1639, he fined Henry Stewart and his Wife who refused to take the said Oath, five thousand pounds a-piece, and their two daughters and James Gray 3000l.p.a-piece, and also detained them for not paying the said fines. The said Henry Stewart and his wife and daughters, and James Gray, being the King's good people of the Scottish Nation, and divers others he used in the like manner, And the said Earl upon that occasion did declare, that the said Oath did not only oblige them in point of allegiance to his Majestie, and acknowledgement of his supremacy only, but to the Ceremonies and Government of the Church establisht or not establisht by his Majesties Royal Authority, and said that the refusals to obey he would prosecute to the blood.

20. That the said Earl in the 15 and 16 years of his Majesties Reign, and divers years past, laboured and endeavoured to beget in his Majestie an ill opinion of his Subjects, namely those of the Scottish Nation, and divers and sundry times, and especially since the Pacification made by his Majestie with his said Subjects of Scotland in Summer in the 15th year of his Majesties Reign, he the said Earl did enquire to perform, incite, and provoke his Majestie to an offensive war against his said Subjects of the Scottish Nation: and and the said Earl by his Counsell, actions and endeavours, hath been, and is a principal and chief incendiary of the war and discord between his Majesty and his Subjects of England, and the said Subjects of Scotland, and hath declared and advised his Majesty that the demands made by the Scots in their Parliament, were a sufficient cause of war against them; The said Earl having formerly expressed the height and rancor of his mind, towards his Subjects of the Scottish Nation, viz, the 15th day of October in the 15th year of his Majesties Reign, he said that the Nation of the Scots were Rebels and Traitors, and he being then about to come to England, did further say, that if it pleased his Matter (meaning his Majesty) to send him back again, he would root out of the said Kingdom, (meaning the Kingdom of Ireland) the Scottish Nation both root and branch. (Some Lords and others who had taken the said Oath in the precedent article only exempt.) And the said Earl hath caused divers of the Ships and Goods of the Scots to be stayed, seized and molested, to the intent to let on the said War.

21. That the said Earl of Strafford shortly after his Speeches mentioned in the last precedent Article, to wit, in the 15th year of his Majesties Reign came into this Realm of England, and was made Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and continued his Government of that Kingdom by a Deputy; At his arrival here, finding that his Majesty had with much widome and goodness compold the troubles in the North, and had made a pacification with his Subjects of Scotlanl; he laboured by all means to procure his Majesty to break that Pacification, incensing his Majesty against his Subjects of that Kingdom, and the proceedings of the Parliament there; And having incensed his Majesty to an offensive War against his said Subjects of Scotland by Sea and by Land, and by pretext thereof to raise money and forces for the maintenance of that War, he counsell'd his Majesty to call a Parliament in England, yet the said Earl intended, if the said Proceedings of that Parliament should not be such as should stand with the said Earl of Strafford's malicious designs, he would then procure his Majesty to break off the same, and by wares of force and power to raise moneys upon the said Subjects of this Kingdom.

And for the encouragement of his Majesty to hearken to his advice, he did before his Majesty and his Privy-Council then sitting in Council, made a large Declaration, that he would serve his Majesty in any other way, in case the Parliament should not supply him.

22. That in the month of March before the beginning of the last Parliament, the said Earl of Strafford went into Ireland, and procured the Parliament of that Kingdom to declare their asfittance in a War against the Scots; and gave directions for the raising of an Army consisting of 5000 Foot, and 1000 Horse, being for the most part Papists as aforesaid, and confederating with one Sir George Ratcliffe: did together with him the said Sir George, treacherously conspir'd to employ the said Army for the mine and destruction of the Kingdom of England, and of his Majesties Subjects, and of altering and subverting the fundamental Laws of this Kingdom. And shortly after the said Earl of Strafford returned into England, and to fundry persons declared his opinion to be, that his Majesty should first try this Parliament here, and if that did not supply him according to his occasions, he might then use his Prerogative as he pleased, to levy what he needed, and that he should be acquitted both of God and man, and if he took some other courses to supply himself, though it was against the will of his Subjects.

23. That upon the 13th day of April last, the Parliament of England met, and the Commons House (then being the supreme representative body of all the Commons in the Kingdom, did according to the trust reposed in them, enter into debate and consideration of the grievances of this Kingdom, both in respect of Religion, and the publick liberty of this Kingdom, and his Majesty referring chiefly to the said Earl of Straf-ford and the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury the ordering and disposing of all matters concerning the Parliament: He the said Earl of Strafford with the assistance of the said Arch-Bishop, did procure his Majesty by sundry Speeches and messages, to urge the said Commons House to enter into some resolution for his Majesties supply for maintenance of his War against his Subjects of Scotland, before any course were taken for relief of the great and professing grievances, wherewith the Kingdom was then afflicted; whereupon a demand was then made from his Majesty of 10 Subsidies for the release of Ship-money only;
and while the said Commons then assembled (with expriessions of great affection to his Majesties Service,) were in debate and consideration of some supply before resolution by them made; He the said Earl of Strafford, with the help and assistance of the said Arch-Bishop, did procure his Majesty to dissolve the last Parliament upon the 5th day of May last. And upon the same day, the said Earl of Strafford did tre-cherously, falsely and maliciously endeavour to incence his Majesty against his having and faithful Subjects, who had been members of the said House of Commons, by telling him, that they had sued to supply him; and afterwards in the fame moneth, did treacherously and wickedly counsell and advise his Majesty to this effect viz, That having tried the affection of his people, he was loote and abdoluted from all rules of gowment, and was to do every thing that power would admit, and that his Majesty had tried all waies, and was refused, and should be acquitted both of God and man; And that he had an Army in Ireland (meaning the Army above-menconcded confining of Papists his Dependents as aforesaid,) which he might employ to reduce this Kingdom to obedience.

24. That in the same moneth of May, he the said Earl of Strafford, falsely, treacherously and maliciously published and declared before others of his Majesties Privy Council, That the Parliament of England had forsaken the King, and that in denying to supply the King, they had given him the advantage to supply himself by other waies, and divers times did malitiously, falsely and wickedly publish and Declare, That seeing the Parliament had refused to supply his Majesty V V V
in the ordinary and usual way, the King might provide for the Kingdom in such ways as he should think fit, and that he was not to suffer himself, nor the Commons, to be muzzled by the frivolities of the People.

And having so maliciouslyandered the said Earl of Strafford, he did with the help and advice of the said Arch-Bishop of Canterbury and the Lord Finch late Lord Keeper of the Great Seal of England, cause to be printed and published in his Majesties name a false and scandalous Book, entituled, His Majesties Declaration of the Causes that moved him to dissolve the last Parliament, full of bitter and malicious invective, and false and scandalous aspersions against the said House of Commons.

25. That not long after the dissolution of the said last Parliament, viz. in the month of May and June, the said Earl of Strafford did advise the King to go on rigorously in levying of the Ship-money, and did procure the Sheriffs of several Counties to be sent for, for not levying thereof, divers of which were threatened by him to be tried in the Star-Chamber, and afterwards by his advice were tried in the Star-Chamber for not levying the same, and drivers of his Majesties Levying Subjects were sent for, and imprisoned by his advice about that and other illegal payments.

And a great Loan of 10,000,000, was demanded of the City of London, and the Lord Mayor and Aldermen and the Sheriffs of the said City were often sent for to the Council-Table to give an account of their proceedings in raising of Ship-money, and furthering of that Loan, and were required to certify the names of such Inhabitants of the said City as were fit to lend, which they with much humility refused to do, he the said Earl of Strafford did use these or the like speeches, viz. That they deserved to be put to fine and banishment, and that no good would be done with them, till an example were made of them, they were laid by the heels, and some of the Aldermen hanged up.

26. That the said Earl of Strafford by wicked Counsel having brought his Majestie into excessive charges without any just cause, he did in the month of July last (for the support of the said great charges) counsel and approve two dangerous projects.

1. To seize upon the Ballion, and the money in the Mint.

2. And to embase his Majesties coin with the mixtures of brass.

And accordingly he procured one hundred and thirty thousand pounds, which was then in the Mint, and belonging to divers Merchant-strangers and others to be seized on and stayed to his Majesties use: And when divers Merchants of London owners of the said Ballion came to his house to let him understand what great mischief that course would produce here and in other parts, and what prejudice it would be to the Kingdom by discrediting the Mint, and hindering the importation of Ballion; He the said Earl told them that the City of London dealt undutifully and unthankfully with his Majestie, and that if any hurt came to them, they might thank themselves; and that it was the course of other Princes to make use of such moneys to serve their occasions.

And when in the same month of July, the Officers of his Majesties Mint came to him, and gave him divers reasons against the embasing of the said money, he told them, that the French King did use to lend Commissions of Horse with Commissions to search into men's estates, and to peruse their accounts, that so they might know what to levy of them by force, which they did accordingly levy: and turning to the Lord Conway said, That this was a point worthy his Lordships consideration.

27. That in or about the month of August last, he was made Lieutenant General of all his Majesties forces in the Northern parts against the Scots, and being at York, did in the month of September by his own authority, and without any lawful warrant, impose a Tax on his Majesties Subjects in the County of York of 8d. per diem for maintenance of every Soldier of the Trained Bands of that County, which sums of money he caused to be levied by force: And to the end to compel his Majesties Subjects out of fear and terror to yield to the payment of the same, he did declare that he would commit them that refused the payment thereof, and the Soldiers should be fabled out of their Estates, and they that refused it, were in very little better condition than guilty of High Treason.

28. That in the month of September and October last, he the said Earl of Strafford being certified of the Scots Armies coming into the Kingdom, being then Lieutenant General of his Majesties Army, did not provide for the Town of Newcastle as he ought to have done, but suffered the same to be lost, that to he might the more incense the English against the Scots: And for the same wicked purpose, and out of a malicious desire to engage the Kingdoms of England and Scotland in a National and bloody War, he did write to the Lord Conway the General of the Horse, and under the said Earls command, that he should fight with the Scotch Army at the passage over the Tyne, whatsoever should follow, notwithstanding that the said Lord Conway had formerly by letters informed him the said Earl, that his Majesties Army then under his command, was not of force sufficient to encounter the Scots, by which advice of his, he did contrary to the duty of his place betray his Majesties Army then under his command, to apparent danger and loss.

After these Articles were read, the Earls answer thereto which he had delivered in writing into the Lords house was also read, and this took up the time till two in the afternoon: at which hour the Court rose, and the Earl was remanded to the Tower, with orders to be there again the next day at eight in the morning.

On Tuesday He came accompanied as before, and cited in the Exchequer-Chamber till nine in the morning, at which time the Court being late, and the King, Queen and Prince within their Closets, the Earl was brought in.

Mr. Pym one of the Protectors first added aggravating the charge which was the day before read with many superlative expressions.

The main points whereof were, viz. That it was a Treason...
"Treaty far beyond the reach of words, that a Native Subject and a Peer of England, the prime Governor of Ireland, the Commander of his Majesties Forces, and a Protestant in Religion, should have in such an impious and grotesque manner recomposed his Majesties favors, abused his goodness, and drawn all his Dominions into hazard and peril of their Religion, Lives, Goods and Privileges: That one of these faults alone had been enough and too much for the fulfilling of the exorbitance and wickedness of any one man, and what punishment could be thought upon sufficient to expi-are crimes of such a transcendent nature.
The Earl with great moderation spake in his own defence to this purpose: He modestly recounted his services done to the King and "Crown of England, and his endeavors for advance as well of the nation as commodity both of England and Ireland; and as to Ireland he said, There had been more Pari-saments there since his Government than in fifty years before, that he had opposed divers projects and Monopolies, and improved the King's revenue from 5000 lb. per Annum., to 12000 lb. per Annum. That he had restored the Churches, and suppressed the Oathsworn, established obedience to Royal Authority, and restrained the tyranny and usurpation of Great ones over the Commons, yet for the effect of all these actions, he repented himself the most weak and meanest instrument.
Mr. Pym after the clofe of his Speech, told the Lords, there were three new Articles that the Commons had adjourned to his Charge by an after-search, and moved that he might pretend reply to the same: Whereunto the Earl answered, It was very strange that after the clofe of the Procels, and where matters were come to be tried and examined by proofs, that any new Charge should be given in, yet left he should seem to decline the maintenance of his own innocence, and the just defense of his honor, he gave him that he was willing to hear them, and live them as altered, provided that a convenient time might be allowed to make his replies to them.
But Mr. Pym excepted against this, and told them,
That the House of Commons did conceive it to be dangerous to grant any further time on this occasion: Upon this importance, the Lords did retire themselves, and after a little time of day returned, and declared, that they had found the Earl fute to be equitable in defiring further time for answering, yet seeing the Articles themselves neither for number nor weight seemed to be of that importance, but that he might furnish out a present answer, they thought it fitting to grant no delay. The Earl then interest them to pardon the weakness of his extemporary answers, deried to hear the Articles read, which were there.
1. That he had within these two years withdrawn 50000 lb. relating from the Exchequer in Ireland, and imposed it to his own private uses.
2. That in the beginning of his Government, the Garrisons in Ireland had been maintained by the English Treasury.
3. That he had advanced Popish and infamous persons, as the Bishop of Waterford and others to the prime Dignities of the Church of Ireland.

The Earl begins to make his an-defence.

were either in expression or action. The expressions were:

1. "That in the presence of the Justices some-ting at 7 o'clock, some were all for Law, but they should find, That the Kings little finger should be heavier than the loyals of the Law.

To this, being the substance of the second Article, the Earl replied, "That having spoken sufficiently before to his justification in general, he would, by their Lordships favour add these few words, That it did strike him to the heart, tobe accused of such a wicked crime, and that fuch honourable persons were the Companions of his youth, and with whom he had spent the bett of his days, should now rise up in judgment against him; yet he thanked God for it,
It was not guilt but grief, that so much troubled him; he added, That it was a wonder how he had gotten strength sufficient in such infortuity of body and anguish of mind, to collect his thoughts and say anything at all for himself:
"But the Almighty God who knows him to be innocent, had furnished him with some abilities of giving testimony to the truth and a good Con-sience: He therefore intreated, that if either in judgment or memory, he should at any time fail, it might be imputed to his great weakness:
And although the Gentlemen his Accusers should seem more ready in their Accusatins, than himself in his defence, that it might not prejudice his cause, who in very unequal terms, had to do with learned and eloquent Lawyers, bred up a long time and inured to such judiciary pleadings, &c. whose Rhetoric he doubted not might prevent many things to their view in a multiplying Glass; he told them farther, that for these many years he had been weary of Public like service, and that now it was his resolution after he had vindicated his honor to retire him-telf, and to enjoy his much longed-for priva-ty: And yet he could not but say, it had been his hearty wish and desire to have rather vo-
'lluntarily resigned his places of honor like a ripe fruit fallen from the tree, than to be violently pulled from thence as a fruitful and unprofitable withered branch.

"To the charge of Treason, he said, That under favour he conceived, although all the Articles contained in his impeachment were venrished against him, yet they could not all amount to Treason, neither simple nor accumulative, for, said he, I do not understand by what interpretation of Law, the diversion of Justice can be called a subversion of the same, or the exceeding of a Commission, the Upraration of a new Power: To the particular allledged, he replied, that his words were inverted, for that his expression was, That the little finger of the Law, (if not supported by the Regal Power in granting Pardons for the Penalties of the same) was heavier than the Kings loyals. That this was his expression, he verified.

1. First by the occasion, for he spake the words a long time since to some who had been impretioned at Cork, and were then by the Kings favorite at liberty, whom he incited to thankfulness towards his Majesty by this expression.
2. "Secondly, by Sir William Pennymason, Member of the House of Commons who was there present and heard the words: which Sir William declared to be true.

In the examination of the witnesses against him to this Article, he convinced one of them of untuth by interrogating, where he was when the speech was heard, and how far distant from him, which the man replied, He was twelve yards from him: the Earl then said, It was impossible for him to hear a man three yards off, by reason of a deafness he had, which held him fourteen years, which being found true, the witness was rejected.

Another witness Sir David Fawly was brought against him, against whom he excepted as his known and protest enemy, but that was not allowed of, because in matters of Treason, a mans enemy may witness against him pro Dottino Rege;
this was all that was done for that time.

On Thursday he appeared again, and the second expression in the third Article of the Charge, was charged against him, viz.

That he had declared that Ireland was a Conquered Nation, and that the King may do with them what he pleased: and speaking of the Charters the former Kings of England made to the Ci-y of Dublin, he said, They were nothing worth of, but did bind the King no farther than he pleaded. This was aggravated as a prime note of his ty-nannical will and disposition, that would permit no Law to bind the Subject, but what himself and such as he should appoint might draw by fi-nitious informations from a gracious and well-meaning Prince, and if this were admitted, the whole power and liberty of the Republicke would utterly be lost.

To this he replied, "That the first part of it is not true; and to the second, That he had said only, That the King was the Law-giver, but which he hoped none could deny without incurring the crime of Treason; and that the Kings sentence was a Law in matters not determined by Acts of Parliament, which all but dilatory Subjects would grant: prescribing without that, it had been ever his endeavour to have the liberty of the Subject, and the Royal Prerogative follow both in one channel, knowing that, if either of them crossed other, we could expect nothing but a subversion of the Common-wealth, either by tyranny or rebellion:

"That the Prelativat was like the first; the li-iberty of the Subject like the second Table, either both or neither can be preferred: That in his duty, he flood obliged, first to the King as Gods Anointed, then in the second place to his Country, if it did not cross the Regal power: And therefore hoped that what he had said was so far from being Treason, that he thought a thousand such expressions would not make up one Felony. This was all the proceedings of this day.

On Friday, two other expressions were urged against him out of the 4th Article:

1. That he would not have Law or Law

preffions out

2. In speaking of the Earl of Cork, he said, he would make him and all Ireland know, to love him, as he had the Government, That any Act of State

4. That he had a particular Warrant in his Commission for this power.
5. That in the Lord Mount-Norris his Case, he was commanded to execute the same by the Kings particular letter, both which he could not refuse.

To the second he said, he was not a Judge in the Tryal, but a party which appeared, in that he fact bare in the Court all the same of the Tryal, and gave him no assurance in it, and for further evidence of his being a party, he caused his Brother Sir George Wentworth in regard of interest of blood to decline all acting in the proues.

To the third he said, That he being not a Judge in this matter, the Court of War was to be answerable for their own proceedings, and that after a long reasoning he had heard them say, No delay could safely be granted in Marital Courts.

To the fourth he answered, That he was not in this answer to the third head.

2. That he was both party and Judge in Mount-Norris his caufe.
3. That he proceeded summarily in the matter.
4. That he had not heard the exceptions made by Mount-Norris against his Witnesses.

To the first he answered;
1. That all Armies have been, and must be governed by martial Law.
2. That there is a standing Army in Ireland, and therefore the case is all one in issue of Peace or War; And that the Army might be used if they should not be of Military Law, but were to expect remedy for the losing of a Martyr, or a Want of Obedience from the Common Law.
3. That it had ever been the practice of the Deputies, particularly of Wilmot, Faulkland, Chichester, Sir Coke himself, and therefore was no new thing brought in by him: This he proved both by the production of the military Ordinances, and by divers Witnesses who knew sentenches given in that kind by them.

To the second he said, he was not a Judge in the Tryal, but a party which appeared, in that he fact bare in the Court all the same of the Tryal, and gave no assurance in it, and for further evidence of his being a party, he caused his Brother Sir George Wentworth in regard of interest of blood to decline all acting in the proues.

To the fourth he answered, That he was not in this answer to the third head.

2. That he was both party and Judge in Mount-Norris his cause.
3. That he proceeded summarily in the matter.
4. That he had not heard the exceptions made by Mount-Norris against his Witnesses.

To the first he answered;

The Reign of King CHARLES the First.

To this he replied, without the least semblance of Palliation, Than at any time he had done An Act inferior to the House of Commons, he thought his whole life well spent, nor could they ever go great study to remand him, as to give Commission to that Gent. emans to express so much before that honourable Assembly, but wish'd, he said, if ever any such thing was done by him, he intended it might now be remonstrated, and sent to over-balance some slight and mean over-guard committed by him, which he hoped should never make him guilty of treason, unless it were treason for a man to have any wit and prudence than God and Nature had bestowed upon him. And so much for Saturday.

0. Monday the Court sat again, and the Earl appeared and was charged with the sixth Article, concerning the disposition of the Lord Mount-Norris of the Manor of 7 times, which the Protectors intirely with many arguments, saying this was an Act of the 7th of Henr. 6, which provides all matters to be determined by the ordinary Judges.

2. Against the praise of all Deputies before that time, wishing they added, that it was a tyrannical thing that could not be express'd, to exercise this power over the persons of the Peers of the Land and their Goods.

To this he replied, that for his part in matter of justice (under favour he spake it) he thought there was no distinction to be made between a Peer of the Land, and one of the Commons, except they did think that either for or against should do something, which had no place in him. He said, 1. that the Act of Henr. 6, answer'd its self sufficiently, both because it exceeded the Court of Requests (that and his proceedings were made else in Ireland, and as it makes an express reformation of the King's Provisions, which he saith was his Struggle, because he desired his Commission from the King, and that the Act was the most express warrant in the word for him. 2. That the King's Proclamation mentioned come not out in five years, wherefore he thought this hard to have a displeasure objected to him for a thing that was not in being, adding that he mistrust'd from his heart they would respect the Kings command and Commissions, with that tenderness of affection and obedience as he did his Proclamations: He then proved that the like course by summary proceedings before the Deputies of Ireland, was the constant practice of all Deputies that went before him, but nevertheless, he said, he was tender to exercise that power till the King (induced by the humble Remonstrance of the meaner sorts of people) had soj peremptory and upon just reasons commanded him, causing the King's letter in that behalf to be read.

3. That neither he nor they had ever given sentence or determined any thing concerning matters of inheritance, but only concerning violent interruptions, which was this cause in question, and which fell directly within a suit of Equity: And in deciding this controversy he had, he said, the Lord Chancellor, the Master of the Rolls, and Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, to assist him, nor did he think the business till the Complainant by Petition had complained of delay of Justice in the Chancery, where the suit had long depended, & upon the proof exhibited in that Court, he made the Decree. He said moreover, the Nortives would unwillingly be deliver'd of relief in this summary way of proceeding, because they had that dispatch in a day or two which the Common Law would not yield in so many years, that as to this matter charged on him, seeing he had done nothing therein but what was ordinary necesary and equitable, and the sentence just, be expedite rather thanks from the state than a charge for ill department ; he likewise foresaw with that extremity and violence the Lord Mount-Norris had taken seizure of that piece of Land, and made the action to appear on his part very fast, and as last he concluded saying, That he had done no more in Ireland, than the Court of Requests in England equally doth, and that the Chancery Court in Ireland doth the same, and Lord Chief Justice never charged for such proceedings, though his power and authority was less than his. But the difference of the perfen and his authority (it seems) doth difference the matter. And this was the business on Monday.

On Tuesday March the 31st, he was charg'd by the 7th Article, to which he answered, that the Lord Dillon with others producing his Petition, according to a Proclamation on the behalf of his Maj's, the said Petition was quizz'd, upon which a cause was drawn and argued by Connel, and the judges delivered their opinions thereupon. But the Lord Dillon or any other was not bound thereby, nor put out of their posessions, but might have trysted the office, or otherwise been legally proceed, notwithstanding the said opinion. They then proceeded to the 8th Article concerning a Petition exhibited by Thomas Hibbert against the King by the 8th of Mar. last, which he had sign'd, and he was answer'd, that true it is he had once signed against the Lady Hibberts, and thought he had reason so to do, for the said Lady being discovered by fraud and contamination to have bargained for lands of a great value for a small sum. And he denied that the said Lands were after sold to his wife, or that the Deputy of the Council board voted for the Lady, the contrary appearing by the sentence under the hand of the Clerk of the Council: which being true, he said, he might well threaten her with commitments in cases he disbelieved the said Order; Neither had he any understandings with Sir Robert Meredith, for the Lady had her own land back from him, he also declar'd with what fraud and deceit the Lady had come to her Lands. After this Article they fell the same day upon the ninth, about the giving of Warrants to the Bishop of Durham and Cowes, for apprehending all such persons (and presenting them before the Council Table) as concerned the Ecclesiastical Order

This was aggravat'd as a new and Tyramical form of proceeding against the liberty of the Subject,
To this he replied:

First, He produced the Primate of Ireland, Arch-Bishop Utber’s testimony under his hand, (the being himself sick;) that the same cause had been urged in Ireland before, and that Bishop Montgomery, the Primate Predecessor in the Bishoprick of Meath had had the same Warrant.

Secondly, He proved the equity that such affiduities should be given to Churchmen, who otherwise because of Papers and Schismatics either to God or the King, would have no respect or obedience given them in that Kingdom.

Thirdly, He proved by two writings, that such Warrants were in use before time.

Fourthly, He said, He had never granted any but that one, and had presently within some few moons he could say the same in again; What (said he) was the Bishop of Down’s carriage in it, he had no reason to answer for; but he presumed the Bishop could give a satisfactory answer for himself when he Should be called in question, and to be concluded, That a matter so soft, so necessary, so confederary and practical before, he hoped should not be charged upon him as an introduction of a new and Tyrannical form of Government. And therefore submitted himself to the mercy of God, and the equity of his Peers in his Tryal thereon. And this was the work on Tuesday.

On Wednesday they charged him with the 12th Article, which was pressed hard upon him by Mr. Glyn, who said, That the Earl of Strafford having established an Arbitrary and Tyrannical Government over the Lives, Linds and Liberties of the King’sSubjects, his next design was to make intimation upon the Crown it fell. That by applying to his own use, the publick Revenues he might be the more enabled to accomplish his disloyal and traitoroustraditions to which end having by a new Book of Rates enhanced the Customs he had gotten by advantage of a Lease from the Dutchers of Buckingham (which he procured for her far different from a former Lease to the Duke her Husband,) above twenty six thousand pounds yearly, which was a crime of a higher nature than those contained in the preceding Articles, because in those there was some color or pretext of Justice; here none; those in particulars, this in general; those against the Subject only, this against the King himself.

For the proof of the Charge, they produced the Lease of the Duke of Buckingham, which was read and compared with that Lease to the Dutchers of Buckingham (which the Earl hath now by alinement) and some differences were shewn arizing to the sum of 20000 l., in the Dukes Lease, the moiety only of concealed and forfeited goods were due to him: but the whole goods to the Dutchers in the Lease. After the King’s Excise of taxes did not pay customs in the Dukes Lease, in the Dutchers they did: Again, the Impost of the Wines (then belonging to the Earl of Carlisle) was not in the Dakes Lease, in the Dutchers it was: Lastly, Whereas the Earl of Strafford paid but 40000 l. per annum for the Customs, it was worth to him, they said, as was apparent by the Books of the Exchequer 400000 l. Witnesses were examined.

First, Sir James Hay, who deposed that the Earl of Carlisle had an advantage of 16000 l. per annum by his Lease of Wines.

Secondly, The Lord Ranleigh, who deposed that by the inspection of the Books of Accounts, he had found the Customs to be Anno 1636, thirty six thousand pounds. Anno 1637, 39000 ib. Anno 1638, 54000 ib. Anno 1639, 59000 ib.

With the Proofs they concluded the Charge; That notwithstanding the Lord Strafford pretend-ed a great measure of zeal and honesty in his Majesties service, yet it is evident, he had abused the trust put upon him, and by withdrawing to great sums of money from the Crown, had weakened the King, prejudiced the Subject of the protection they were to expect from him, and had been the cause that the extraordinary ways of Impost and Monopolies had been taken, for supplying of the Royal necessity: And that this Act therefore was not sought to be enough to make the Charge and Impeachment of High Treason laid against him.

The Earl replied, That he conceived he had given full satisfaction to all his critics brought against him, both his pretended arbitrary Government, nor would be spend time in vain repetition, and for the present Article, though in all parts it were granted to be true, yet he could not perceive by what interpretation of Law it could imply the least tit of Treason, and when it should be directly charged upon him as a point of Misdemeanour, Oppre-ffion, or Felony he made no doubt, but he should be very able to clear himself abundantly in that point also, yet left any prejudice might stick to his Honor by those bold assertions; He was content to step so far out of the way as to give answers.

First, That it concerned him nothing, what particulars in the Lease had pass betwixt the King and the Dutchers of Buckingham; or whether the had obtained more ease conditions than the Duke her Husband, especially seeing the fame was granted some years before his coming to that Government; yet thus much he could say, that the Dutchers had paid thirty thousand pounds fine, and therefore no marvel that her yearly Rent was no less.

Secondly, For the Book of Rates (wherein in the chief matter of oppreffion and grievances seemed to rest,) the same was there establisht by the Deputy Falkland; Anno 1638, three years before his going into Ireland, and therefore it was exceeding strange in his apprehension, how that could rise up in judgment against him.

Thirdly, That he had his interest in the Customs by affiliation of a Lease from the Dutchers of Buckingham, which was granted before his Government, and he never heard it before he alleged as a crime of Treason, for a man to make a good bargain for himself.

Fourthly, That not of his own accord, but at the Kings special command, he had undergone that Charge, on hopes that upon the enquiry into the worth thereof, the Customs might be improved for the benefit of the Crown, and the true value thereof discovered; this he proved by the Lord Cuttington and Six Arabus Ingram.

Fifthly, That when a new Book of Rates

was recommended to him by the Council-board of England, in the time of his Leafe, which might have been of great advantage to him, he did prefer rather a fear he had, that the trade of Ireland might thereby be discouraged, before his own commodity, as he presumed in all humility to refate the said Leafe, and tendered his reasons thereof to the Kingdom and Council-board of England.

Sixthly, That he never understood that the Customs might arise to those great sums allleged, but though they should yet his advantage was but small; for from the fourteen thousand pounds he paid to the King into eight parts, five parts thereof was yearly given in upon Oath (and that procured first by himself) at the Exchequer-board, the other three parts was divided amongst four of them, which were equal sharers in the Leafe, granted before his time: And therefore he was confident, he said, the Lords would rather take his acculation in this Article as an exercise of Rhetorick in the Gentlemen his Adversaries, than as a thing spoken in good earnest by them.

The same day the 11th. and 12th. Articles were charged against him. In the 11th. concerning Licences for exportation of Pipe-taxes, he answered, That Pipe-taxes were prohibited in King James's time, and not exported but by licence, paying 5l. 8d. a thousand, and that he had not raised to much thereby to himself as his Predecessors had done for such Licences. The 12th. Article was more inquitled on, and in the opening of it, Mr. Glyn said, That for the further advancement of his tyrannical and avaricious designs, he had of himself establisht a Monopoly for the restraint of Tobacco in that Kingdom; where they offered five particulars to the proof:

1. That he had restrained the importation of Tobacco.
2. That in the mean time he had brought in a great quantity himself, and sold the same at exorbitant prices.
3. That of Tobacco already imported, he had forbidden any to be sold, but what was first sealed by his Officers.
4. That upon a pretended disobedience, he had punished a great number of people by seizure, imprisonments, fining, whipping, pillory and such like cruel and inhuman usages.
5. That by these means he had gained 10,000l. yearly.

For proof thereof they produced:
1. The Proclamation for restraining Tobacco, which was read.
2. The Proclamation about Sealing the same.
3. Some witnesses who declared that ships had been restrained from landing Tobacco.
4. Others who had known some Tobacco seized on as forfeited.
5. A Remonstrance of the House of Commons in Ireland, declaring that the Earl had sold 500 Tuns of Tobacco, which sold at 2s. 6d. per pound, amounts to an hundred thousand pounds. This was concluded the Charge. That he had shed the Blood of the Kings Ligue people, and had by this one point of opposition raised greater er sums to himself than all the Kings Revenues in that Kingdom extended unto, and therefore was liable to the crime of Treason, for troubling the peace, and bereaving the people of their goods, who were intuited into his care, and Government.

The Earls Reply to this was:
1. That long before his coming to Ireland, the same restraint had been of Tobacco, and the same Impost of eighteen pence per pound, enjoyed by King James.
2. That at that time the Treasurers for this Commodity paid but 20l. a year to the Crown for the Impost, but now 400l.
3. That the Parliament in Ireland 1628, had Petitioned to have the Impost fixed by an Act of State for ever afterwards as a part of the Revenue of the Crown.
4. That he had express command from the King for refusing those Proclamations, and therefore could not imagine more danger in them, than in others for Monopolies in England in the worst sense.
5. That the Proclamations were sent forth not by himself alone, but by the whole Council-board of Ireland.

For the Proclamations, he told them, 'As his own opinion (and if he failed in it) he humbly craved pardon, and hoped that it should not be Treason to have no more judgement than God had bestowed on him,) that the King was induced by God with a power to make temporary Laws, and caufe the same to be promulgated for the good of his people, upon sudden emergent occasions, to which Laws, Obedience is due, till they be abrogated by ensuing Parliaments: that he restrained no man from importing Tobacco, who was willing to pay the appointed Impost; that for his part, he had never traffiquted in all his time therein, nor had any part with the Contractors: And if any Tobacco was seized on, it was in contempt of the Proclamations; and if any person were confedered to the Purloins or whippings, it was for known piracy, the ordinary and usual punishment in such a case: Concerning the Tobacco imported, he said, No consideration was taken of the prices given for the Tobacco beyond Seas of the King's Revenue of 4,000l. of the Merchants pay, and danger in bringing the same home; for his part, if any advantage were made, surely it was not his, nor could be annual every Contract or Leafe made by the King: And therefore seeing his interest was none, he had done nothing but at the Kings direction, and at the advice of the Council-board; since the same Impost was in King James's time, and Petitioned for by themselves in Ireland; he hoped his carriage in the business should be so far from a crime of Treason, that it should rather be thought no crime at all.

So much for Wednesday.

On Thursday he was charged with the 13th Article, to which he made this ensign answer:

That he did endeavour to advance the Manufacture of Linnen rather than of Woolen, to the 13th Article, and because the last would be the greater detriment to England; That the Priests of Ireland, the Archbishop of Dublin, Chancellor Leflie, and the Lord Monte-Norris all of the Council,
The Reign of King Charles the First.

4. and subscribers of the Proclamation were liable to the charge as himself: That the reducing of that Nation by Orders of the Council to the English customs from their more savage usage, as drawing Horsey by their tails, etc., had been of former practice: that the project was of soil avail to him, as he was the worst for the Manufacture, thirty thousand pounds at least by the Looms he had set up at his own charge: As for the Warrants that were issued out to seize upon goods, he affirmed the same to be necessary, because there ought to be no contempt of Proclamations: but that any part did accrue to him, he fully denied: And if any rigor was used in the execution, he said, Not he, but the Officers were to answer for it, for this might happen in the most just and necessary commands, nor was there ever any complaint presented to him of any such matter.

The same day they proceeded upon the later part of the 15th Article, waving the 14th and the former part of this, Mr. Jeffry Palmer urged upon him in these or like words: That the Earl having by a Tyrannical power inverted the ordinary course of Justice, and given Sentence upon the Lands and Goods of the King's Subjects under pretence of disobedience to his Orders, in prosecution whereof, he had laid Soldiers upon the same to their utter ruine: This Article, he said, of itself did contain an individual Treason, that is to say, if there were more than this, it were more than sufficient to convince him of his impeachment: two things were offered in proof:

1. The Testimony of one Savil a Sergeant at Arms, who was called forth, and produced the Copy of a Warrant, upon which he had seffed Soldiers.

2. He began to name some Statutes, by which such seffing was Treason. But before he went on to that, the Earl desired to be heard against Savil testimony, and said, he hoped their Lordships would not upon an Article of such importance admit of the Copy of an Order: he said, No Transcript but an Original can make fafe before the Kings Bench in a matter of Debt, and therefore he thought in matter of life and death before the Supreme Judicatory, less would not be allowed off: Moreover, if Copies be at any time received, they are such as are given in upon Oath to have been compared with the Originals, but this was not so.

His answer to the latter part of the fifteenth Article.

Dr. hereupon replied, that this Order ought to be admitted, since it was produced by the Officer himself, who had known it, having executed the same.

The Earl answered, 'That was the best argument he could use why it should not be admitted: for (said he) Mr. Savil may be charged with Treason, for seffing men of war upon the Kings Subjects, he hath nothing for his defence but a pretended warrant from me: Now what he swears to my prejudice is to his own advantage, nor can a man by any equity in the world be admitted to testify against another.' In such justification this answer seemed so weighty to the Lords, that they rofe and went up to their House; and after an hour's stay, they returned, and declared that after much deliberation, they had resolved, that this Copy should not be admitted, and willed them to proceed to other proofs: which after a little pause they did.

1. The Lord Ranalagh affirmed that he heard of such a Warrant, and knew sometimes three, sometimes five Soldiers billeted by it.

2. Mather Clarke declares the very same.

3. Another Deposed, that he had seen such a Warrant under the Deputies hand and seal; and so much for the proof.

For the Statutes alleged one of Ed. 3. 6. that whosoever should carry about with them English Enemies, Irish Rebels, or Hooded men, and carry them upon the Subject, should be punished as a Traitor. Another of Hears. 6. 7. That whosoever should cause Men of War, in his Majesties Dominions, should be thought to make War against the King, and punished as a Traitor.

The Earl's Reply was,

'That in all the course of his life, he had intended nothing more than the preservation of the Earl, the lives, goods and welfare of the King's Subjects, jefts, and that he dared protest, that under no proofs.

Deputy, more than under himself, had there been a more free and uninterrupted course of Justice.

To the charge he answered,

1. 'That the Councel of Ireland differ'd his answer exceedingly from the Councels of England, as Charge.

2. That even in England he had known Soldiers preffed upon men, by the Presidents of York and Wales, in case of known and open contempt, and that both in point of Ouatlawy and Rebellion, and also even for fame of debt, between party and party, there is nothing more ordinary than these ceilings to this day in Scotland, whereby the chief house of the Owner is seiz'd upon.

3. That to this day hath been nothing more usual in Ireland than for the Governors to appoint Soldiers to put all manner of Sentences in Execution, which he proved plainly to have been done frequently, and familiarly exercised in Grandisons, Fauls, Landes, Chiufes, Coares, and all preceding Deputies times.

And had even been done for Outlaws for the Kings debts in the Exchequer, of collections of Contribution money, and (which comes home to the point) for small sums of money between party and party; so that he merervied gain from or with what boldness it could be called an Arbitrary Government lately brought in by him.

To this the Lord Dillow, Sir Adam Lefter, and Sir Arthur Teringham depo'd: the last of whom told, that in Faulskland's time he knew twenty Soldiers seffed upon a man for refusing to pay fifteen shillings flatting.

4. That in his instructions for executing his Commission, he had express warrant for the same, as were in the instructions to the Lord Faulskland before him, both of which were produced and read.

5. That
5. That although all these Presidents were not, yet it were not possible to govern the Kingdom of Ireland otherwise, which had been from all times accustomed to such summary proceedings.

6. That no Testimony brought against him, can prove that ever he gave warrant to that effect; And for the deeds of the Sergeant at Arms, he did conceive himself to be answerable for it.

As for the Acts of Parliament, he had referred it to the dispute of his Lawyers, but was content to say thus much for the present.

1. That it is a ground in the Civil Law, that that where the King is not mentioned, there he cannot be included. But (with all distance to his faced person be it spoken) he conceived himself to be in his Master the Kings place (for to his Comission did run) in that Kingdom of Ireland.

2. The words in the Statute are not applicable to him, for God knows, he never went about in Perfon to lay Souldiers upon any of the Kings Subjects.

3. That the Kings own Souldiers, requiring in a Customary way, obedience to his Orders, could in no construction be called, Irish Rebels, English Enemies, or Hooded men.

4. That the use and custome of the Law, was the best interpreter thereof, and for that he had already spoken enough.

5. That it favoured more of prejudice then conscience to start out such an Old Statute against him and none others, (though culpable of the same fact,) to the overthrow and ruin of him and his Potesty.

6. That (under favour he conceived it) for any Irish Custome or upon any Irish Statute, he was to be judged by the Peers of Ireland.

7. That Statute of what force forever was repealed.

1. By the 10th of Henr. 7, where it is expressly declared nothing shall be reputed Treason hereafter, but what is so declared by the present Statute, now not a word is there of any such Treason.

2. By the 11th of Queen Elizabeth, where expressly power is given to the Deputy of Ireland to ceffe and lay Souldiers, although the same be reputed Treason in any others.

To the Statute of Henr. 6, he replied,

That a tender answer might serve, he hoped that no man would think him so inconsiderate to war against the King of Britain and Ireland, by the setting of five Souldiers: That he had been charged by many for taking Arms for the King, but to that time never for taking Arms against him; And that he heartily wished that no man in all his Majefties Dominions had more prattices with Rebels and Rebellious designs than himself. So much for Thursday.

At the close he defined the intermission of a day, that he might recollect his spirits & strength against the next time of charge, and with much difficulty obtained rest till Saturday.

On Saturday they proceeded to the 16th Article, which Mr. Palmer charged thus: That the Lord of Strafford having establi {ed a Tyrantical and Independent authority, by giving summary Decrees and Sentences, had deprived the subject of all just remedy; for in that Kingdom there was no supreme to himself to whom they might appeal: And left their just grievances might be made known to his Majesty, he had obtained a restraint, that no complaint should be made of injustice or oppression done there, till the first address had been made to himself, and that no person should come out of that Kingdom but upon license obtained from himself.

To which the Earl replied to this effect.

That the Deputy Fawkland had brought the same Proclamation, That the same restraint was contained in the Statute of 25 Henr. 6, upon which the Proclamation was founded: That he had the Kings express warrant for the Proclamation. That he had also power to do it by the Comission granted to him; and that the Lords of the Council and the Justices not only yielded, but pressed him unto it. That it was done upon just cause, for had the Ports been open, divers would have taken liberty to go to Spain, to Downey, Rhemes or St. Overt, which might have proved of dangerous and mischievous consequence to the State. That the Earl of Desmond stood at the time of this restraint charged with Tresfon before the Council of Ireland for prafticing against the life of one Sir Valentine Coke. That the Lord Roch was then a Prisoner for debt in the Castle of Dublin, and therefore incapable of a licence; That he was not fined for coming over without licence, but for several contempt s against the Council-board in Ireland, and that in his sentence he had but only a casting voice, as the Lord Keeper in the Star-Chamber: He concluded, that he hoped the least suspicion of Tresfon could not accrue to him from these actions: and for oppression or misdemeanor when it should be laid to his charge, he made no doubt but he was able to answer it.

The 17 and 18 Articles were waved, and on the close of the day Mr. Whitside charged him with the 19th Article, laying, That he did not only Tyrannize over the bodies, but also over the conveniences of men, and to that purpose did contrive and frame a new and unusual Oath enjoyned to the Scots in Ireland, and because some of tendernesse of conscience did refuse to take the same, he had fined them in great sums of money, banished a great number from that Kingdom, called all that Nation Traitors and Rebels, and laid if ever he returned home from England, he would root them out flock and branch.

For proof of this,

1. Sir James Montgomery was produced, who declared at large how that Oath was contrived.

2. Sir Robert Maxwell of Ochyarden who spoke to the same purpose.

3. Sir John Clowworthy, who declared that a great number had fled the Kingdom for fear of that Oath.

4. One Mr. Samuel, who deposed that upon the 10th of October 1638, he heard the Deputy say these Words, That if he returned, he would root them out flock and branch.

They
They concluded, That this was one of the chiefest crimes he had done against the Priviledge and Liberty of the Subject.

The Earl replied: "That every new Article acquainted him with a new Trea or; that if he had done any thing in all his life acceptable to the King, and Country, he conceived it to be this: And to these particulars he an tered in this purpose.

1. "He defined the Lords would call to mind the condition of those times, no man (pointing to my Lord Steward) knows better than your Lordship, who had in the expedition against the Scots, the chiefest place in his Majesties Service: I would be very sorry (said he) to rub old fores, especially seeing I hope things are in a fair way to a firm peace, and I wish that I may not be deceived, that is, that it may be so; only thus much I may say, we had then greater fears and apprehensions in Ireland, lest the Scots in that Kingdom (who were above 100000) might have joined with their Country-men for the diminution of our peace: and we detected a Treason of betraying the Castle of Knockfergy, to a great man in that Kingdom (whose name I now spare) by one Freeman, who upon the discovery was executed.

2. "By the Council-board in Ireland resolved to prescribe the Scots an Oath whereby they might declare their discontent to their Country-men proceedings, and oblige themselves to the Kings Service; But while we were about this, they of their own accord came to Dublin to Petition for it, and took it with a wondering derelv alacrity and free heartedness, so that it is a marvellous thing for any man to say it was invented or violently enjoyed by me.

3. "About the same time the same Oath, Verbum Verbo was, by the Council of England pre scribed to the Scots at London and Elsewhere, which was no small encouragement to us in Ireland.

4. "I had (said he) which I never fhewed, because I had no need before this time, a special Warrant from the King, all written with his own hand to that effect: And when the King commands a matter not contrary to Law, truly, I (said he) do conceive it both contrato Law and Conscience, not to yield him all due obedience.

For the proof brought against him, there was nothing infifted on, to be of any moment but the words.

For the first words, "That he had called all the Nation Rebels and Traitors, He said,there was no proof at all, nor indeed could there be any, for I had said it (said he) I had been perfectly out of my wits, and he thanked God, such irrational speeches sild not to escape him: For I am assured that the King very much, because it was the Native Soil of our dread Sovereign, his Gracious Master, and because he knew a great part, yes (he hoped) the greatest part of them had been and ever will be at loyal and dutifal to the King as any other of his Subjects; and of those who had faberblished that unhappy Combination, he knew a great many had done it against their hearts and wills, and "would ever be ready upon occasion to remonstrate the same, by adhering to the King's ser-vie; so that this accusation was nothing but a wresting and perverting his words and meaning of purpose to make him odious, and irritate a whole Nation against him.

For other words they were proved only by one-witnefs, which could make no sufficient faith, and that witness too he could evince, if not of perjury, yet of a notable mistake; for he had sworn positively that he had spoken those words the 10th of October, whereas he came out of Ireland into England the 12th of September before, and was at London the 21st.

For those that had fled the Kingdom because of that Oath, he knew none such, and if they did, they fled into Scotland, which might sufficiently argue their intention and resolutions:

for his part, if they were not willing to give that testimony of their Loyalty to their Prince, although he had known of their departure, he would have been very loth to have kept them against their wills, but should have been gladly rid of them, and have made them a "Bridge to be gone rather than to stay.

Upon Monday, Mr. Whistlock proceeded to the 20th Article, but said, because the matter was commitis naturae, they would join the fifth the next Articles together, because all of them tended to one period, to shew what bad design he had to have subdued the Kingdoms both of England and Scotland by force of Arms, to reduce them to that arbitrary Government he had lately introduced into Ireland.

The Earl intrested they would proceed Article by Article as they did hitherto done, he said, five Articles were many, the matter weighty, his Memory treacherous, and his Judgment weak.

It was sharply replied by Mr. Glyn, that it doth not become the Prisoner at the Bar to prehend them in what way they should give in their evidence.

The Earl modestly answered, "That if he "stood in his place, he would crave the like favour, unless his abilities did furnish him with "more strength than he could find in himself, for "his part he was contented they should proceed "any way, always provided they would grant him "a competent time for replying.

Then Whistlock went on, and told the Lords, that somethings in those Articles concerned the Scotisb, something the English Nation, that which concerned the Scotisb he reduced to five heads.

1. "That the Deputy had said at the Council-board, that the Scots demands contained sufficient matter to perimade to an offensive War.

2. "That the same demands did strike at the Root and Life of Monarchical Government, and were only to be answered by the Sword.

3. "That he had caused some Scotisb Goods and Ships to be seizd on in Ireland.

4. "That he had engaged the Irfeh Parliament by their Declaration in that War against the Scots.

5. "That by all possible means he put bad thoughts and suspicions into his Majesty against his Scotisb Subjects, and laboured to make a Na-

The Reign of King Charles the First.

The quarrel between them and England: which, if the Kings Priety, and the Prudence of better States-men had not prevented, could not have been fooured up again without much blood.

Concerning England his speeches were either before, or after the Parliament.

1. Before his Creature and bosom friend Sir George Ratcliff, he had laid to Sir Robert King, when he was doubting how the King might have moneys to pay the Armies, that the King had 400000l. in his parti 30000 men in the field, and his (wold by his side, and if he wanted money afterwards, who would put him.

2. That his Brother Sir George Bowneworth had laid to Sir Robert Barrington, upon the dissolution of the last Parliament, that seeing the English would not grant supply to the King, it seems they were weary of their peace, and design to be conferred a second time.

3. That he himself upon a discourse with the Primate of Ireland, had said, That he was much of the mind of those English Divine, who maintained it lawful for a King, having tried the affection and benevolence of his people, and then denied their help, upon an inevitable necessity, and to prevent danger of the Kingdom, that he might use his Prerogative for his own supply, and the defence of his Subjects.

4. To the Lord Conway in a discourse he had laid, that if the Parliament (meaning the last Parliament) should not grant a competent supply, then the King was acquitted before God and man, and might use the Authority put into his hands.

5. He did say at the Councel-board, that if the Parliament should deny to help the King, he would take any other way he could for his Majesties service and subsistence.

His expressions after the Parliament were two.

1. That the Parliament had forsaken the King, and denied to supply him, and that the King should not suffer himself to be overmastered by the stubbornnes, obstinacie, and stubborness of his people.

2. That if his Majestie pleased to employ Forces, he had none in Ireland, that might serve to reduce this Kingdom.

The Proofs of the Scots particulars were these:

1. The Earl of Traquair, who told them that when he gave in the demands of the Scots, he heard himself, That it was time for the King to put himself into a posture of War, but that first all the Council of England said the same as well as he. 2. That it was a double supposition, First, that the demands were truly given in; Secondly, that there was no other remedy left but Arms to reduce them.

2. The Earl of Morton testimony, being sick himself, was produced, and it was one and the same with the Article.

3. Sir Henry Vane was examined, who declared that he had heard the Earl advise the King to an offensive War, when his own Judgment was for a defensive.

4. The testimony of the Earl of Northumberland was produced, which was the very same with that of Sir Henry Vane.

5. The Lord Treasurer deposed the same with Traquair.

6. One Beane from Ireland deposed, that he had known ships seized on there, but by whose procurement or warrant he knew not.

To the Articles about England.

1. Sir Robert King, and the Lord Ranelagh, deposed the same, that they had heard Sir George Ratcliff speak those words in the Article.

3. The Lord Primate of Ireland Testimony, who was sick, was the same with the Article.

4. The Lord Conway deposed the same with the Article.

5. Sir Henry Vane deposed, he did hear those words laid at the Council-board, if the Parliament should deny to help the King, he would take any other way he could for his Majesties service and subsistence.

For the two expressions after the Parliament.

Sir Thomas Fermoy, the Lord Newburgh, the Earl of Bristol, and the Earl of Holland were examined to the first: but the testity they gave did not reach to prove the words.

And to the second, Sir Henry Vane was examined, who declared that he said either those words, or the like.

At this some of the Lords spake,

1. The Lord Savile, who desired of Sir Henry Vane to know whether he laid, their, or this, or that Kingdom, and withal said it was very hard to condemn a man for such pris circumstanccs.

2. The Earl of Southampton desired to know whether Sir Henry Vane would swear these words positively or no. Sir Henry said, positively either them, or the like. The Earl replied, that under favour thole, or the like could not be positive.

3. The Earl of Clare desired to know, what could be meant by this Kingdom; for his part, he said, he thought it meant of the Kingdom of Scotland, to which the word (this) might very well be relative, that Kingdom being only mentioned in the preceding discourse: And that he was the more ready to be of that opinion, because he could not see, by what Grammatical construction it could be gathered from his words, that he meant to reduce England, which neither then was, nor is now (God be thanked) out of the way of obedience, nor upon rebellious courses.

The Proctors at last concluded the Charge, that the words were no monstrous that to aggrieve them was to ally them, and therefore they would ignobly leave them to the Judgment of the Lords.

The Earls reply was:

"That though the heaping up of those Articles had put him to a great confusion, yet he would, endeavour to bring his Answer to the first and best method he could, and first he would reply to the Proof, then add something in general for himself, in what a hard taking and lamentable condition he was to have his private Divil courtesies, his intimate and bosom friends touch and fitted to the least circumstance, that he might seem guilty of that, which by God's sal-
The Reign of King Charles the First.

"To the Lord Treasurer: Depositions, he thought their proofs did not much stick upon him; for upon the supplications, Birth, that the demands were true: Secondly, that they were not justifiable: Thirdly, that no other course could prevail: He could not see what other advice he could possibly give the King, than to put himself into a posture of War, especially seeing that there was frequent reports of the Scots Invading or entering into England, neither was he of any other mind, than all the rest of the Council-board.

For that of Morison, he doth not positively remember the words, but if the demands were read, perhaps they would imply nothing less, and if so, how otherwise to be answered but by the Sword? All other means being first essayed which is ever to be tuped.

For Sir Henry Vane, and Northumberland, testimony about pervading of an offensive of War, He said, he remembered it very well, and thought it as fit for him to give his opinion for an offensive, as they for a defensive war: Opinion ons (said he) if they were attended with obtinacular or pertinacity, may make a Hereticck, but that they make a Traytor, I never heard till now, nor under favour shall I be unwilling to acknowledging to extinguish my weakness, and correct my Errors, whereas no man hath more, nor is more tenable of them, than my self; yet if that opinion of mine had been followed, it might perhaps have spared us some money, and some reputation too, of which we have been prodigal enough.

For the laft about the ships, it proves nothing, but what he would willingly confefs, viz. that some ships were there detained, and that by himself, and his own direction, as Vice-Admiral of Comynas, but it was at the Command of the Lord Admiral the Earl of Northumberland, and produced his Letter to that purpose.

To the English proofs, he marvelled much (he said) how Sir George Raceffer words could be put upon him; Sir George (though attainted to be his bosome friend) yet had thought of his own: No man (said he) can commit Treason by an Attorney, and should I by my friend Sir George as by a Proxy, it would be something strange.

For his Brother, he never knew him before so rafely, but that was nothing to him, except they could prove a nearer identity than nature had instituted, and that his Brothers words and his were all one; yet, whilst he was convinced, that his Brothers words might be very well understood of the Scots conquering England, but not at all of the Irish; and so he submitted with all his heart he had no mpkin something which is like the Prophet.

To the Primate's testimony (with all reverence to his integrity he is in favour he is by no means) and in Law can prove nothing: add to this (said he) that it was a private discourse between him and me, and perhaps spoken by me tendering gratia, and bow for this should be laid to a man charge, Let your Lordship judge.

This, in some degree, is against humanity itself, and will make the Society of men so dangerous and loathsome to us, that our dwelling houses will be turned to Cells, and our Towns to Deserts: That which God and Nature have bestowed upon us, are Tongues (for the greater comfort of unveiling our own conceptions, or creating the advice of wise and learned men) shall become to be scarers and burdens to us, by a curious and needleless fear: Yet if my words be taken (said he) with all that went before and followed after, I see no danger in them.

To the Lord Conway, I may reply the same, with this addition, that it is a very natural motion for a man to preserve himself, every Creature hath this privilege, and shall we deny it to man, provided this be done in a lawful, though in an extraordinary way; this grain of fault will be added to all my disservice.

To that of Sir Henry Vane, of offering me service to the King, I thank him for the intimation, and think he hath done me much honour thereby, but if he or any body else dost profess that his Majesty will employ me in any unprofitable enterprises, it shall think a better mode more liable to the Charge of Treason than my self.

And then he went on saying; To the first of the subsequent Testimonies, concerning that expression, That the Parliament had forsaken the King, and denied to supply him, &c. (pretended in the Charge against me, to be the same day of the dissolution of the Parliament, and urged as a consequence of malice in me, for having first advised the dissolution, and then endeavored to incense his Majesty against his people) though no testimony has yet proved the words, nor is it I hope, believed that I was the principal cause of the dissolution of the Parliament, yet I shall crave leave to relate the matters that occurred previous thereto.

Before I came to the Council-Table, it was proposed by the Lords to demand twelve Subsidies, and Sir Henry Vane was ordered to demand of me, but coming in the interim, I persuaded the Lords not to Vex it again, and refuse the debate; whereupon it was agreed, that if the Parliament would not grant twelve Subsidies, Sir Henry should descend to eight, and rather than fail or fix, but he not observing his infallibilities, demanded twenty only without abatement or going lower, so that the height of this demand, urged the Parliament to deny, and their denial moved his Majesty to dissolve the Parliament, whereof Sir Henry Vane, as I humbly conceive, was the chief occasion.

To that part of the testimony proved by Sir Henry Vane, That is, if his Majesty pleased to employ Forces, he had some in Ireland which would serve to reduce the Kingdom: He said to this purpose:

"This lies fore upon me, but to that which the Earl of Clarendon hath said already, give me leave to add this, That the testimony of one man is not a sufficient Witness, nor can a man be accused, much less condemned of Treason upon this: and for that read the Statutes of H. 7. 12. and of Ed. 6. 5. But to give you farther satisfaction, I shall declare all the Lords of the Council which were then present, may be examined, whether they heard those words or not, there were but eight present, with the Arch-Bishop, and Sir Francis Windebank: Sir Henry
The Reign of King Charles the First.

"Henry VIII. gives the Testimony, I deny it, for only remain. Upon this the testimony of the Lords was taken.

1. The Earl of Northumberland testimony was read, wherein was declared expressly, that he had never heard those words, nor any like them, but that he spake with great honour and regard of England to the King. But, would had never been preferable to this, for the Prerogative of the Crown and the Priviledge of the Subject went in one pace together, and that Parliaments were the happiest means to keep a correspondence between the King and people.

The very same was delivered by the Lord Treasurer, and the Lord Chancellor. 'Now, my Lords, (said he,) you may marvel how these words rested only on the ears of Sir Henry Vane, but my Lords, (said he) that I may remove all scruples from you, I will make it evident, that there was not the least intention that the 13th Army should set a foot in England; and then I hope you will conceive that I had no meaning to reduce this Kingdom.

This he made clear by the testimony of the Earl of Northumberland, the Oaths of Marquees Hamilton, Lord Cottington, Lord Treasurer, Sir Thomas Lucas, who only were private to that matter.

"For other of my words, my Lords, (said he) I define you would not take them by halves, if so, who should be free from Treason? Certainly if such a President take footing, misfortune shall be more troubled with Treason than with Common Law: Look therefore to the and the Law and contrary of my speeches, and you shall find the State of the Question clearly altered: The Antecedents were upon an absolute or inevitable necessity upon a present invasion, when the remedy of Parliament cannot be expected; the consequences to the Kingdom with accomplish afterwards to the Parliament: The Qualification too in a lawful, convenient and ordinary way, so far as the present necessity can permit. Add but these, and which of you are not of my mind? Is the King endowed with no power from the Law? Is he not Publicus insellor regni? stands it not in his hand to do something on present necessity?

And that these were his words, he then proved again, by the Marquees, the Lord Treasurer, Lord Cottington, Sir To. Bole, Termine.

My Lords, What I have kept to the last (said he) is this, and I would intreat you seriously to think of it. If there be a man, his bed, his house, his brother, his friends, (and that too after they have given an Oath of Secrecy) are to be rack'd to find out Treason against him? Let my misfortune, my Lords, be your advertisement, your wife Ancestors were glad to put the bands and limits to this Lion Treason, if you give it large scope of words to range into, he will at last pull you or yours all to pieces.

But my Lords, I never did think till now, that matter of opinion should be objected as matter of Treason.

"For first, Opinions are free, and men may argue both Pro and Con in all faculties without any stain of reputation, otherwise all consultations were vain.

2. I may be of another judgement, then I declare my self to be of opinion perhaps to gain better arguments for the maintenance of my own Grounds.

3. "Many and my self oftentimes have pronounced an opinion yet upon hearing better Judgements, have presently changed it.

4. We use to train our opinions too high, sometimes that we may meet in a just moderation with those whom we conceive in the other extremity to be too low.

5. "It is expressly commanded by the Stat. Httr. 6. 9. that though a man should say the King is not lawful Heir to the Crown, and may be deposed, yet he is not to be charged with Treason, but only with Felony, and I hope my Lords, those words are of a more transcendent and superlative nature than any alledged by me to be spoken; But, my Lords, said he, Lay it to your hearts: it must come to you, you and yours, your Politery are they whom God and Nature, Birth and Education, have fitted to beautifie the Royal Throne, and to sustain the weighty affairs of the Kingdom, If to give your Opinions in Political agitation shall be accounted Treason, who will be willing to serve the King, or what a Dilemma are you in, if being from Connellors you speak not your minds freely, you are convicted of Perjury, if you do, perhaps of Treason; what detriment, what injustice shall fall to the King and Kingdom?

If this be permitted: Which of you hereafter will adventure, yea dare adventure so much as to help by your advice, unless you be weary of your lives, your Estates, your Politery, your very honour; Let me never live longer than to see this confusion, ay I may say it, this inhumanity in England, for my part, my Lords, I here confess my self, I ever have, and ever shall speak my opinion freely in any thing that may concern the Honour and Safety of my Glorious King, or my Dear Country, though the Sword be two-edged, fearing him rather who killeth the Soul, than he whose power reacheth only to the body.

"Nor do I see how I am culpable of Treason, unless be for Treason for not being infallible, yet if be so, my Lords, you have this rag of mortality before you loaden with many infirmities, though you pull this into threads, yet there is no great loss, there may be perhaps a great gain; if I have seemed to have dared too far to give testimony to the World of an innocent counsel concerning words God, and resolute loyalty towards my Prince (which have ever been my only Pole-flax in the whole course of my life) and if by spilling of mine there he not a way found to trace out the blood of the Nobility, (which I hope ye Lords ships will look to) there will be no disadvantage at all suffered by the los of Me.

Tuesday was a day of Rest.

Upon Wednesday Mr. [whitlock] charged thus: That
The Reign of King Charles the First.

That the precedent Articles were of so high a consequence, and of so transcendent a nature, that nothing wanted to make up the perfect measure of the molt horrid Treason and monstrous attempt that ever by a Natvre was intended against his King and Country; But putting these designed projects into Execution, which had undoubtedly hapned to the subversion both of Church and State, had not the clemency and goodness of the Prince and the pity and carefulness of the well affected Peers timely foreseen and prevented the same, that full the Principles of Tyranny and Oppression had lodged within his bosom, and therefore had built forth into these expreftions and advices contained in the following Articles, where first they charged him in the 25th. with these

1. That he had advised the King to rigorous and unlawful execution of Ship-money.

2. That he had given Council, that if the Sheriffs should deny their best inducements and afliffance to that Effect, they should be sent for and fired by the Star-chamber and Imprisonment.

3. That when the Alderman of London had in all humility presented the caufes why the Ship-money could not be collected amongst them, and had given in their reasons why they refused to give a lift of their names within their City, who were able to afford the Loan-money, He in a contemptuous and tyrannical manner in the face of the Council-board had said to the King: Sir, these men became of their own obstinacy and forwardness delir'd very well to be fined, renounced and laid by the heels: And it will never go well go well with your Service until some of being hang'd for example on others.

The proofs were these,

1. The Bishop of London, Lord Treasurers, who declared that he remembered the words very well, that the Earl had advised the King to cause the Ship-money to be gathered in, but he remembered withal that both himself and all the Council had done the like, and that it was upon a present necfSity and defcit of money for entertaining the Army, which (the condition of the Army considered) they all conceived was by any means to be kept on foot.

2. Alderman Whitchurch declared, that upon an humble Remonstrance made to the Council-board, that the City would take it ill, if a Tax roll should be delivered of their Estates who were thought able for the Loan-money; the Lord Stafford faid, they desire'd to be fined, renounced, and laid by the heels. But for the words of hanging them up, he heard not at all. The Earl of Bridgewater declared, that the Lord Stafford had faid, that upon the refult of each a Service enjoyn'd by the Kings peremptory command, it was his opinion they might be fined.

3. Alderman Garrow attested the preceding words, and withal added that the Earl to his belt remembrance, had faid, it was well for the Kings Service if some of them were hanged up.

They closed up the charge, saying, That by such undutiful Expreffions he had invaded the propriety of the Subjeft, and had put such discontent upon the City, that they were the lefs willing un-on occasion to concur for advantage of the Kings Service.

The Earl replied, "That though all the charge were, in the most strict and rigid way verified against him, yet he could not conceive by what Interpretation of Law it could be reach'd home to High Treason, and to that common objection (that the Treason was not individual, but acumulative) he replied, that, under favour, he thought that were as much as to fly, No Treason at all,Because,

1. "That neither in Statute Law, Common Law nor pratique, there was ever till this time heard of such a matter as acumulative Treason, or a Treason by way of consequence, but that it is a word newly coined to attend, a charge newly invented, such as one as never was before.

2. "That Treason was a thing of a simple and (speculative nature, and therefore could not be) by accumulation, but either must be so in some or either of the Articles, or else could not be so at all.

3. "That a heap or Accumulation should be, and not be of Ho~na-genus things, and therefore that which in its first being is not treasonable, can never confer to make up an acumulative Treason, Cumulius, an heap of grain, so called, because every or at least one of the individuals are grain, if otherwise, an heap it may be, but not an heap of grain: Just so perhaps, these Articles may make up an heap of felonies, Oppressions, Errors, Misdemeanors, and such like (and to the things themselves, I shall give an answer, when under that name they shall be charg'd against me) but they can no wails confer to the making up of Treason, unless some, at the least be Treason in the individual.

2. "That the Testimonies brought against him, were all of them fingle, not two one way, and therefore could not make faith in matter of debt, much lefs in matter of life and death: That it was against the Statute expressly to impeach a man of High Treason under the Evidence of two famous Witnesses, much lefs to adjudge and convince him upon attention of one.

3. "To the Lord Treasurers testimony, he did with all his heart contedee unto it: but upon these grounds only, that there was a present necessity of money that all the Council-board had so voyced with him, yea before himself, and he always thought it preparation in a man not to follow the wiser and more Judicious.

And that then there was a fenetence of the Star-Chamber for the right of paying thing-money; for his part he would never be more prudent than his teachers, nor give judgement against the judges: And therefore he thought it not fair or wise to advise the King for collecting of that which by Law was his own, in such a present and urgent necessity, and although his opinion (and it was no more) had been amifs, he hoped, that though in case of Religion being attended with stubbornneffe and pertinacy, it might come home to Herefie, yet could it not reach so far as Treason; unless it be Treason..." for a man to speak his judgement freely, when he is upon his Oath to do the same.

4. For the words about firing, he had already acknowledged them in his General answer to be true, but with these qualifications, that it was his opinion only, that it was upon the refusal (as he conceived) of a just remedy, that he had spoken them by no means to prejudice the Citizens, but to make them the more quick and active in the Kings Service: That no ill consequence at all happened upon them: that they were words might have been spared indeed, but innocently, though suddenly spoken, which he hoped might proceed from a man of such a high and incorruptible honor as himself (made both by nature and his much infinity of body) without any mind at all to Treason;
And that if all Choleric Expirations of that nature should be accounted Tresonable, there would be more faults of that kind fly up & down Heilmaister-Hall than Common Law.

5. To these words attested by Alderman Gurney, he positively denied them, and hoped they should never rise up against him in Judgement, because the testimony was single and not positive, but only to his bel's remembrance, and that it was exceeding strange, that not any one man neither of the Council or the other Aldermen were so quick to observe them, but only Alderman Gurney, which he thought sufficient to difprove that single testimony, except he could demonstrate himself to have more familiar knowledge of the close, he defined the Lords from his misfortunes to provide for their own Safety, and seriously to consider what a way was chalked out to ruin them, both in their lives and their estates, if for every opinion given in Council, or words suddenly or hastily spoken, they (who are born to deal in the great affairs of the Kingdom) should be artaigned and sentenced as Traytors.

Then they went to the 26th Article, and charged thus,

That the Lord Strafford having by his wicked advices exhausted the Kings Treasury, did also concern him,

1. To embaze the coyne by alay of copper money.

2. To seize upon all the Bullion in the Mint.

3. That in discourse with some of the Aldermen, about the business he had said, the City was more ready to counteract and relieve the Rebells than the King: And that the King of France did manage such business not by Treasons or Requests, but by sending forth his Commissions to take account of mens Estates, accompanied with Troops of Horfe.

The proofs were,

First, Sir Thomas Edmunds, who declared that in his discourse with the Lord Strafford, having remonstrated unto him that Merchants goods were feized on beyond Seas because of the money taken out of the Mint, he told him that if the Londoners suffered it, it was deservedly, because they had refused the King a small Loan of Money upon Security, and that he thought them more ready to help the Rebels than the King.

Secondly, Mr. Palmer declared, that he spake something about the King of France, but whether with relation to England or not, he did not remember.

Thirdly, Sir William Parkifhe attested in the same words and withal, that the Lord Cottingdon was then present; and could declare the whole business.

Fourthly, Sir Ralph Freeman declared, that in a discourse with the Lord Strafford, he had said that the Servants in the Mint-bouche would refuse to work in Copper-money: And he replied, that then it was well to fend those Servants to the House of Correction.

They closed the Charge, That by such indisputable Council and words he had given more than sufficient proof of his design and purpose to fab-due this Kingdom and subvert the Fundamental Laws and Privileges of the fame.

The Earl replied:

That he expected some proof to evidence the two first particulars, but heard of none:

for the 27th,
following words were confessed, probably they might speake, which were procured from the door of his lips: nor did he think it much weigh, considering the present purpose to call that faction Rebels: As for the last words objected against him in that Article, he said, that being in conference with some of the Londoners, there came to his hands at that instant
a Letter from the Earl of Leicester, then at Paris, wherein were the Guizot enclosed, relating to what the Cardinal had given order to levy Money by Sounds. This he only told the Lord Cot-tington standing by, but made not the least application thereof to the English affairs: he said
moreover, there was no great liking had that he had committed real acts of Treason, when his adverse party was content to rise up for a much time about words, neither was there any Treason in them, though they had been fully verified; and therefore in that (as in all other Articles) he referred a power for his Council to dispose in matter of Law.

They then went to the 27th Article, and charged thus, That immediately after his appointment to be Lieutenant General to the Army here in England, he shewed what principles of Arbitrary Government linked within his bosom, for by his own immediate authority, without and a gainst Law, he had laid Impoits upon many of the Kings Subjects; whereof they mentioned three particulars:

1. That he imposed 8d. per diem for a Souldier upon the County of York, for entertaining the trained bands there one whole moneth.

2. That he sent out Warrants for collecting the fame, and threatened to imprison such as refured to pay.

3. That he said it was a crime nigh to the crime of High Treason not to pay the fame.

4. They added in his general replies, he had brought two things for his defence: 1. That the money was freely and voluntarily offered by those in Yorkshire. 2. That the great Council of the Peers had notice of the fame: but to both they had the following answers to make, viz.

To the first, That a Petition was indeed preferred by the Yorkshire-men to the King, and a moneths pay offered. But that the Lord Strafford had refused to present the same: upon this exception only, because in the name they had petitioned for a Parliament, whereby he evidently declared.
red what little inclination he had to that way.

To the second, they appealed to all the Lords whether any such order did pass before the Council of the Peers at York.

The Earl's answer was:

1. A Warrant signed by Colonel Pennymans, for this money, and another by Sir Edward Osborne, for $200,000.

2. Mr. John Barrow, who declared that he was Clerk to the Great Council, but did remember of no order, and wished added that it might have passed at that time when he was at Rippon.

3. Mr. Danfan, who declared, that he had known that money to be levied by some masketiers.

4. By Sir William Ingram, who declared that he heard the Earl say, that to refuse the same came nigh to the crime of High-Treason.

They concluded the Charge, that by these particulars, it was more than evident what unhappy purposes and traitorous designs he had to subdue this Kingdom; and subvert the fundamental Laws and Privileges.

The Earl replied:

To the Petition, That it was true, a Petition was drawn up by the York-thire Gentleman, and as true that he had refused to present the same, because that Clafs gave the Parliament, but the matter was else. At his Majesties coming to York, it was thought necessary for the defence of that Country to keep the Trained Bands on foot, because the Enemy was upon the Borders; and therefore the King directed him to write to all the Freeholders in York-thire to set what they would do for their own defence. The time and place were designed by the King, but the night before the meeting a small number convened and a private and tumultuous may did draw up that Petition, and at the morrow as their appointed Diet, in presence of the whole number, the Petition was presented to him, where he did adjourn them to leaze out that Clafs, and that because he knew the King out of his own gracious disposition had intended to call a Parliament, which he did desire, should rather to freely do them upon the consultation and importance of Petions. Moreover, it would seem a mercenary thing in them at one and the same time to offer a benevolence, and wish to Petition for his favour: Upon this Remonstrance they were all willing to recall the Petition, and directed him by word of mouth to offer unto the King the numbers pay in their names, which he did accordingly, in the presence of them to their no small advantage.

This he proved by Sir William Pennymans, Sir Paul Neal, Sir George Worthy, Sir William Swifit, Sir Thomas Danby, who all of them declared as much in ample terms, and wish added, That nothing was done upon better grounds of necessity and obedience, than the offer of that money, and that they never had heard any man grudge a grant to this time.

For the second about the Council of Peers, he alleged, That he never made mention of any Order of theirs, but he remembered very well it was twice propounded before them, and the King had approved it at that time as a just and necessary act, and none of the Council contradicted it, which he conceived as a tacit approval and an Order in equivalence.

Bt though that had not been, there was no thing done in the business, but at the special desire of the Gentlemen themselves, and for their necessary defence and protection.

And though he had done it by himself alone, yet he conceived he had so much power by his Commission, causing the Commission to that effect to be read. That he did not forget to mention that military proceeding are not always warranted by the Common Law, yet, it should not be imputed as an Act of Treason to him. And to this effect a read a Statute of 7 Hen. 2.

To the proof:

1. Colonel Pennymans Warrant, or Sir Robert Osborne's nothing concerned him, but he doubted not that those worthy Men could justify their own acts, and that he had enough to do and answer for his own misdemeanours.

2. For Sir John Barrows, he was at Rippon, where that Proposition was made.

3. That at the Warrant, so neither the Exception troubled him at all.

4. For Sir William Ingram, he was but a single testimony, and that such an act as he could produce an evidence to testify, he had mischance himself in his testimony upon oath, if it were not to disadvantage the Gentleman.

He concluded that he had done nothing in that business, but upon the Petition of that Country, the Kings special command, the connivance at least of the Great Council, and upon a present necessity for the defence and safety of the Country.

And to much for Wednesday.

Upon Thursday, the Committee for the Charge declared, That they had done with all the Articles, and were content to wave the last for reasons well known to themselves; only Sir Winter Earl added, that he had some objections to bring forth upon the 22nd. Article which he conceived might do much to prove the Lord Stafford's design for landing the Irish forces in England. And they were:

1. That in his Commission he had power to land them in Wales, or in any part of England or Scotland, which were altogether superfluous, unless there had been some purpose for the same.

2. That within two days before the date of the Commission, Letters were sent to the Lords Bridgewater, and Penbrook from Sir Francis Windowbank to affit the Earl of Worcester, in laying Forces for the Kings service, and these might be supposed to have intended a joining with the Irish.

3. That the Lord Ranelagh at the raising of the Irish Army did fear such a design as this.

4. That the Town of Ayr in Scotland, where the Lord Stafford pretended he would land those Forces, was fortified with a Balwark, a Garrison, and Blockhouse, which would prohibite landing there, but that the Earl of Argyll's bounds were divided thence by the Sea, and that the Bar or entry into the Town was very dangerous and shallow.

The proofs were only the reading of the Commission granted to the Lord Stafford.
The Earl's reply,

1. "That his Commission was the same Verification with Northumberland for England, and that it was drawn up by the Council-board here, and (sent over unto him) to no more des-ign in him then in the Gentlemen of the En- glish Army, nor larger than that was put up-on him.

2. "That this was the first time that he heard of any such Letters, neither did they concern him more than any of the house.

3. "That he was not bound to purge the Lord Ranaleagh from all his tears; and that he had his own fears too, which God forbid should be evidence of Treason against any man what- ever.

4. "That it seemed the Gentlemen had bet- ter information from that Kingdom than him-self, yet he would be confident to say, at Ajay, there was never such a thing as Blackhouse or Garrillon: But to remove all scruples (for in-deed the Road or Landing-place is not there safe,) he declared that it was his intention to have landed some miles above Ajay, and made only his Magazine at that Town.

"To the Earl of Argyll bounds, he hoped the Gentleman knew they came not on foot out of Ireland, but had ships to wait and trans- port themselves, and on one of his prime Houses ( Rosse) was within some few miles of the same.

The Lord Digby finding Sir Walter Earle a little prizell’d, endeavoured to bring him off, and told the Lords in such a business as the plot- ting of Treason they must be content sometime with dark probabilities.

The Earl having thus answered the Charge agaist him, it was moved by one of the Proce- durers, that if he have any thing to say further in his defence he should do it presently; but he desired time till the next morning, which was (not without difficulty) granted.

The next morning the Lords met, but the Lieu- tenant of the Tower appeared without his Pri- soner, certifying that the Earl was taken with a great fit of the stone that night, and continued so ill as he could not go abroad without danger of his life. The Commons thought this an excuse to gain time, but the Lords believed the relation, Mr. Glyn moved that if he did not appear upon Saturday morning, he should lose the Privilege to speak in his own defence afterwards, and they permitted to proceed: But the Lord Stew- ard said, That the Lords had appointed some of their number to go to the Tower, and learn the just cause of his stay, and if by any means he were able, he should be obliged to come, but if not, humanity and common equity would excuse him. These Lords that went to the Tower found the Earl much exiled of his pain by the applica- tion of some remedies, which the Physicians had administered unto him; so that the next day he appeared before them, and one of the Proce- durers professed new proofs concerning the two and twentieth Article, upon which the Earl craved the freedom for himself concerning some testi- monies not yet exhibited on his behalf, whence ensued a hot contest between the two Houses, which took up two days debate, but at last the reasons of the Lords prevailed, who declared that in the common dispensation of equity, the accused should have equal allowance to superin- dict new proofs as well as the Accusers, and it was agreed that all further testimony should be waved on both sides.

Upon Tuesday the Earl appeared, and the Lord Steward told him, that the Lords had orde- red, that both their testimonies should be waved, and if he had any thing to say further in his own defence, he should proceed, so that that day might put an end to what concerned the matter of fact. The Earl replied, That in all humility and obedience he would submit himself to that or any other their Decrees whatsoever, though it should reach as far home unto him as his own life: but without humbly begged, That if here- after he should be troubled (for they were to speak left) with new matter, or with supplicat- ement proof, he might have leave to speak some- thing in his own defence.

The Lord Steward answered, It is all the rea- son in the world:

Whereupon the Earl made a summary repeti- tion of the several particulars of the former de- fence, which ended, he continued his Speech thus:

There remains another kind of Treason, The Earl of..." what else than the lives and honours of Peers, it will be wretched for your Selves, for your Power, for your Fertility, and for the whole Kingdom to cast into the fire these bloody and mysterious Volumes of constructive & arbitrary Treason, as the Primitive Christians did their books of curious Arts and amuse your selves to the place of the Law and Statute, that telleth what is and what is not Treason, without being more amitious to be more learned in the Art of killing than our Fore-fathers: It is now full 450 years since any man was touched for this alleged Crime to the height before my self; Let us not awaken those sleeping Lions to our destractions, by taking up a few mutiny Resolutions that have lain by the walls so many ages, forgotten or neglected. May your Lordships please not to add this to my other misfortunes; for my fins be-flame me, not for Treason; let not a President be defined from me, so disdained as this will be in the consequence to the whole Kingdom. Do not through me wound the interest of the Common-wealth; And howsoever these Gentlemen say, they speak for the Common-wealth, yet in this particular I indeed speak for it, and shew the inconveniences and mistakes which will fall upon it; for as it is laid in the Statute of the King of Henry 4. No man will know what to do or say for fear of such penalties. Do not my Lords, put such difficulties upon Ministers of State, that men of Witty, of Honour, of Fortune, may not with cheerfulness and safety be employed for the publick; if you weigh and measure them by grains and earpulses, the publick-affairs of the Kingdom will lye waffe: no man will meddle with them who has any thing to looke. My Lords, I have troubled you longer than I should have done, were it not an interest of those dear pledges a Saint in Heaven hath left me. [At this he stopp'd a while, offering up some tears to her affe.] What I forfeit my self is nothing, but that my indirecction should extend to my Povertie, it woundeth me to the very soul: you will pardon my infirmity, something I should have added, but am not able; therefore let it pass: And now, my Lords, for my self, I have been by the bleeding of Almighy God taught, that the afflictions of this present life, are not to be compared to the Eternal Weight of Glory which shall be revealed hereafter. And so, my Lords, even so, with all tranquility of mind, I freely submit my self to your Judgement: and whether that Judgement be of life or death,

—TE DEUM LAUDAMUS.

As soon as the Earl had ended, Mr. Glyn and Mr. Pym spent some time in repetition of the charge, wherein they proceeded Article by Article, endeavouring by Rhetorical declamations to render his offences as odious as they could.

Matters of fact being thus transacted, the Earl moved that he might be allowed to plead by his Council as to matter of Law; to which the Lords agreed, but the Commons would not till after three days Conference about thereunto; and on Wednesday when they met in their house, they considered and debated much in what manner to proceed further against the Earl of Strofford.

By the modell of his behaviour he had much inflam'd into the good opinion of the Lords & many of the Commons, and by the clearness of his answers to the several parts of his charge, his Crimes appeared not to be specifically comprehended under the letter of any Statute Declaratory of Treason, but the Prosecutors perceiving hereby that the Judgement of the Lords upon the whole matter might not answer their Expectation, urged, that though he were not guilty of Treason, or any of those offences enumerated in the Statute of 25 Ed. 3, yet to great were his Crimes, that according to a branch of that Statute, they ought to be declared Treason. For it is therein mentioned, that if any other case suppos'd to be Treason, which is not in that Statute specified, shou'd happen, no judgements should be given till the cause he solv'd, and declared before the King and his Parliament, whether it ought to be judged Treason, or other Felony. This branch (they said) gave the Parliament power to declare Treason, & in the enumeration of his offences, they argued, That his intentions to subvert the fundamental Laws of the Kingdom, was Treason at Common Law before the making of the fore-named Statute: and such Treasons were not thereby taken away, but by the words before recited, might be declared as often as occasion should require, but because many doubts arose concerning many Treasons, the wideness of those times thought it not fit to submit the Judgement thereof to any lets authority than the Parliament: Thefe Debates produced a resolution in the house to declare him guilty of Treason: but because they had no precedent since the first of Henr. the 4th. of any fact declared Treason in Parliament, that was not express'd in the letter of some Statute, they doubted a little of the way of Declaring Treason, but at last concluded to do it by Bill of Attainder.

This was most oppos'd by Selden, Bridgeman and Halborne, three Eminent Lawyers, at that time Members of the Commons House, who made it manifest that the Salvo of the Statute of the Earl of Strofford, 15. 1 Ed. 3. was repeal'd, and that no man could be convict of Treason but by the letter of that Statute; nevertheless, being put to a question, the Majority of Voices carried it for a Bill, and a Committee was appointed to prepare it.

The Arguments by those and others then us'd against it, shall not be here intrept, because most of them were alledge by the Council for the Earl, and when those come to be mentioned, they will be related. There had been three Conferences between the two Houses of these matters.

The Lords at the first, of the two last of the three Conferences for the Earl, and when those come to be mentioned, they will be related. There had been three Conferences between the two Houses of these matters.

The Lords at the first, of the two last of the three Conferences (for the first was not a free Conference) told the Commons that they had resolv'd to give full audience to the Earl of Strofford's Council in matter of Law, and that they, as competent Judges by themselves give Judgement in the cause, as that which was most suitable to the Practice, Laws and Statutes of the Kingdom, the safety of the Nobility, and to Common Justice, to which those of the Commons resolv'd, that their House was resolv'd to go on with the
the Bill of Attainder, and if the same should be rejected by the Lords, they fear'd a rupture and division might ensue to the ruine and destitution of the Kingdom, for no content would be given to the Subject, unless the man who had so much intruded upon their right, might be punisht as a Traitor: and for the practice and laws of the Kingdom, they said no man had ever found such a favourable hearing; and that the Process against the Duke of Norfolke and Somerfet, and the Earl of Effex, were all of them clotted on one day.

On the next day they met at another Conference, where the Lords told those of the Commons, that they should expect nothing from their House, but what should tend to the Peace and Prevenation of the Kingdom, nor was there a more forceable argument for that, than to preserve the Laws and Customs thereof, least innovation to much complaining of by them, might unhappily be found among themselves, that the Subjects should have all their justice controll'd, but an Act of Indict justice would never give satisfaction to the world, nor satisfy themselves, the eyes of all foreign States being fix'd upon the business in agitation, and the willome of our Nation either to be much advanced or depress'd by their Judgments in this case: That the Process against Norfolke and Effex (for Somerfet was convict only of Felony, and had not so much animadversion to save himself by his Book) were for direct and formal Treason comprised in one or two individual Acts, but this against the Lord Strafford only Arbitrary and accumulative, to be pick'd out of the Articles. And therefore that it was impossible to have a full examination of them all, to give Sentence against him, And thofe Noble-Men were charg'd with some breach of Statutes formerly made, but here a new Statute was to be made, or else he to be found guiltles. They concluded that they had given Order for his appearance on Saturday, And that in the great Hall at Westminster where the House of Commons might, if they pleased, be present.

After some deliberation with their House, the Commons Conference answer'd, that since the Lords had so resolve'd, they should deny to be there, and to hear what his Council could say for him, for to reply any more in publick, they neither could nor would, because of the Bill already read, only if their Lordships should take any scruple in the matter of Law, they would be ready to give them satisfaction in a private Conference, and to give publick satisfaction also therein.

The next day the Lords and Commons convened in the great Hall, but they that were of the Committee for the prosecution did not stand at the Bar as before, but sat promiscuously with the rest of their fellows; to that a month was not open for the House of Commons all that day: After they were fet, the Lord Steward told the Earl, "That the Lords had resolve'd to give him a fair hearing in the matter of Law, and therefore defined that the Council in urging thereof "might keep that distance, moderation, and respect to the Judiciary, that was fitting, and not "at all to meddle with the matter of fact."

The Earl replied, "That in all humility he acknowledged that favour from the Lords, and "that it was such an one too, as he could not but "expect from such honourable Peers, and just "persons, in whose integrity and goodness ( un- "der which that he had placed above) he had re- "joiced his chiefest confidence; for his Council "they knew much better than himself, what "concerned the point of discretion and Reve- "rence, and that he doubted not but that they "would give all satisfaction and obedience there- "in."

Then his Council were called to the Bar, which were Mr. Lause the Princes Attorney, Mr. Gardner the Recorder of London, and two o- thers.

Mr. Lause spake first to this purpose: "My Lords, I shall not at all touch the mat- "ter of Law farther than to clear your judg- "ments in one Statute only, viz. 25 Edin. 3. "because when the same was alleaged by the "Lord Strafford in his own defence, that not be- "ing convict of the Letter thereof, he could not "be convict of Treason: I remember the Statu- "es that the Statute was much laughed at by those "from the House of Commons, as much con- "cording to their ends. My Lords, I will first "speak of the Statute itself, and then of its "Suits or provision: The Statute is (that if "any man shall intend the death of the King, his "Queen, their Children; Kill the Chamberlain, or "Judge upon the Bench, imbrace the Kings Coyn, or "counterfeit the Bowes, etc. shall be con- "vict and punished as a Traitor.) "That the Lord "Strafford comes not within the Letter of this "Statute, is not so much as once alleaged, nor "indeed it cannot be with any reason; all that "can be said is, that by relation or by argument, "a minore ad majus, he may be drawn into its yct "that this cannot be, I humbly offer these confi- "derations,

"First, This is a declarative Law, and such "are not to be taken by way of consequence, es- "quity or construction, but by the Letter only, "otherwize the Statute should imply a contradiction to "themselves, and be no more declarative Law; "but Laws of construction or conclusive.

2. "This is a penal Law, and such (if our "grounds bisherto unquestioned held good) can "admit of no constructions or inferences, for pe- nalites are to persude the keeping of known "Laws,not of Laws concessional, ambiguous, and "by consequence (which perhaps the most learn- ed may not in their disputes question, much less "the subject (who is not obliged to interpret "the Statute) doubt of in the point of obedience, "yes, rather without any doubt, he is rather to "obey the Letter of the Statute, and conceive "(and that truly) that he is not liable to the pe- nalty.

3. "We have a notable Law 13 Eliz. cap. 2. "whereby it is declared that the bringing in of "Balls from Rome, to fit up the Subject to mu- "tiny and Rebellion, shall be punisht as Treas- "on: Now if by interpretation or by conse- "quence this fence might have been thrust upon "the preceding Statutes, the making of this had "been impossiible; yea, the persons then charr- ed with that Crime, might have been impeach- ed of Treason, even before the making of this "Act.

"26 Eliz. 2. We have a Statute, de- claring
The Reign of King Charles the First.

clarifying that for a Servant to kill his Master is an

Aet of Treason; and in the 23 year of the same

King, a Proces of Treason was framed against a man for killing his Father, grounded upon the same argument a minora de majis: But it was found (and the Sentence is yet in the Records)

that although in the 21 yr. of Edw. 3. that Argument might have been admitted, yet in the 27 it could not, by reason of the declaration of Law, intervening in the 25 year; and this

Cafe comes very home to the point in Law.

My Lords, I will not demand what kind of offence it may be for a man to subvert the fundamental Laws of the Kingdom, the Crime doubts is unnatural and monstrous, and the punishment must keep the same proportion,

only I premise to offer these few things to your

Lordships consideration:

1. That one or more Acts of Injustice whether malignantly or ignorantly done, can in no fense of Law be called the Subversion of the Fundamental Laws; if so, as many Judges (perhaps) so many

Treasons; it is very incident to man's nature to err, nor doth the Lord Stafford plead his innocence

in overights but in Treason.

2. I remember the Case of John de la Pole

Duke of Suffolk, this man in the 28 of Hen. 6.

was charged by the House of Commons with Articles of Treason, and these too very like those against my Lord Stafford.

1. That he had given the King bad advices.

2. That he had embossed his Coxon.

3. That he had called men of War.

4. That he had given out summary Decrees.

5. That he had imposed Taxes.

6. That he had corrupted the Fountains of Judice.

That he had professed the King to unnecessary

War, and the giving over of Anjou in France.

And for all these though he was charged with High Treason for wronging the right of the Subject, and subverting the Fundamental

Laws of the Kingdom, yet after a long agitation, the matter was found by the Lords of Parliament not to imply Treason, but only Felony.

Add to this another who in the 23 of Hen. 8.

was charged for subverting the English Laws, and yet no Treason charg'd upon him. Add to both the charg of Richard Lark pleading at the Common Pleas, who was charg'd with

Treason for subverting the Law, but convicted only of Felony, by which you may see, my

Lords, what to this time hath been subverting the Laws.

3. It is very considerable that the Lord

Strafford is not charg'd to have subverted, but only to have intended to subvert the fundamental Laws, and this I conceive if there were no more might keep him free from that Statute of the 25 of Edw. 3. For although as touching the King, his Queen and Children, intention is treasonable; yet in all other things

there mentioned there must be action before intention, for it is not said if a man do intend to kill a Chancellor, it shall be Treason, but if he doth kill him; and if he doth actually counterfeit the Broid Seal; and although a man should prepare a furnace, make ready his flame, melt his Ballion, yet it giveth not the King's impress upon the Coin, all his intentions

yes, his preparations will not serve to make up a Treason.

Ye see therefore, my Lords, that the body of the Statute cannotlick against the Lord Stafford, nether in Letter nor Consequences, this is not, that must not be; all that can be said is, that the fact may be Treason by the Common Law. For my parts

I protest my ignorance, who ever thought the Common Law might declare, but never make a Treason; it might be presupposed that there is a Statute ubereason to build a declaration, and thereto may be told there is no Statute for it, it is as it is no Treason at all; is the Statute ever made in Treason: and to be declared Treason either by Common Law, or by Parliament, are but two different ways of proceeding, and must both referre into one Principle, nay and which comes home to the point. In the 21 of Edw. 3. To kill a man imployed in the King's War was a treason; and the 27, to kill the King's Messenger was a treason-declaration of the Common Law, but always by treason of the Statute, yet none of these are trea-

sons, but Felonies only, because of the intervening

Statute of the 25 th of Edw. 3, such hath ever been thought the force of its Letter and Declaration: and so I will leave it a word or two of the Silvo, which is this, that because all particulars could not be enumerated, therefore what the Parliament should declare to be Treasnable in time to come, should be punisht as a Treason.

And according to this referentive, in the 8th year of King Richard 2, one charg'd before the King's Bench, was afterward referred to the Parliament, and there though the fact was not contained in the body of the Statute, yet because of the Proviso aforesaid, it was adjudged Treas-

on.

In the 11 th. year of the same King the Duke of Ireland and Neual Archbishop of York were impeached of High Treason by Glocetter, Arund-del, and Warwick, and being brought the Statutes were convicted thereof by the Silvo; but in the 21 th. of the same Richard 2, the tide turned, and the King had such a hand with the Parliament, that the Sentence was recalled, and all the three Nobles before were adjudged Trasors. Again in the 1 of Hen. 4, his Successor, that Resolution of the 21 R. 2. was recalled, and the Sentence of the 11 th. of his Reign stilleb-ed; such were the feelings too and fro of Treason,

and all because of that uncertain Provio.

Therefore it is that in the same Parliament the

1 of H. 4. A Petition was preferred by the Nobility to have Treason limited within some Statutes.

Because they have not what to speak or what to do for fear thereof: And in Cap. 10, an Act was made upon this Petition, that the Silvo should be helden repealed in all times to come, and nothing effective Treason but what was literally contained in the 25 of Edw. 3. and therefore it is said in the Records, That there was great joy at the making of this Act, in that the drawn blood hanging over every man's head by this slanderous and consequence or illusion, was removed by that

Act.
The Reign of King Charles the First.

Add tothis, that in the 1st of Qu. Mary, Cap. 1. the same is repeated, That no man shall be punished in life or citize as a Traitor, but for the Crime contained in the Statute of the 25 Edw. 3, without the least mention of the pretended Salvo.

The Earl of Northumberlands Cape comes nigh to the point, he was charged with Treason, the 5 of Hen. 4. and if the Statute of the 1 of H. 4. Chap. 10. whereby this Proviso is repeated had not intervened, no doubt he had been condemned of Treason, but it was only council of Felony, and that because he could not draw within the Letter of the Statute of the 25 of Edw. 3. And I dare confidently say it, that since that Act was made the 1 of Hen. 4. Chap. 10. whereby the Proviso is repeated, no man hath ever been declared a Traitor either by King or Parliament, except it were upon that, or some other Statute literally and declaratively taken. I keep two things I do offer to your Lordships considerations: That the Lord Strafford cannot be impeached of Treason by the Statute of the 25 Edw. 3. and that the Salvo contained in the same, stands repeated almost two hundred years ago. And this is all I conceive to be necessary for that Statute which was alluded to by the Lord Strafford in his defence for matter of Law.

The Recorder said, he could add nothing to what the former Counsel had spoken for matter of Law; but if their Lordships would State unto him any further questions, he was ready to give his resolution according to his best ability.

No answer was made to this motion, but the Lords & Commons adjourned to their respective Houses without appointing any time for their next meeting.

The Commons were resolve to proceed upon the Bill of Attainder, which was so extraordinary a thing, that it did not pass without great debate. The Lord Digby then a Member of the Commons House, and one of the most active Prosecutors of him, was so satisfied with his Answers at his Trial, that he could not but shew a dislike to the paffage of it, upon every occasion that occurred in the reading or debating thereof, which made him and some others that were resolve on the business, to do what they could to blast his credit in the house, but yet when the last reading of the Bill was in the Commons House, he gave to generous a testimonie against it. That it may not be unfit to record what he then said in this History:

Mr. Speaker,

"We are now upon the point of giving (as much as in us lies) the final Sentence unto death or life, on a great Minifter of State, and Peer of this Kingdom, Thomas Earl of Strafford, a name of hatred in the present age by his practices, and fit to be made a terror to future ages by his punishment.

"I have had the honour to be employed by the House in this great business, from the first hour that it was taken into consideration: it was a matter of great truth, (and I will lay it with confidence) that I have not only served the House in it with industry, according to my ability but with most exact faithfulness & secrecy,

"And as I have hitherto discharged my duty to this House, and to my Country in the prosecution of this great cause; so I trust I shall do now in the last period of it to God, and to a good Conscience.

"I do with the peace of that unto my self, and the blessings of Almighty God to me and my P. floity, according as my judgment on the life of this man shall be conformant with my heart, and all the best of my understanding in all integrity.

"I know well, Mr. Speaker, that by some things I have said of late, whilst this Bill was in agitation, I have raised some prejudices upon me in this cause.

"Yes, some (I thank them for their plain dealing) have been so free as to tell me, that I suffered much by the backwardness I have shown in this Bill of Attainder of the Earl of Strafford, against whom I have been formerly so keen, so active.

"Mr. Speaker, I desire of you and the rest of this House a full and frank Judgment concerning me till I have opened my heart unto you freely and clearly in this business.

"Truly Sir, I am till the same in my opinions and affections as unto the Earl of Strafford, I confidently believe him the most dangerous Minister, the most intolurable to free Subjects, that can be character'd.

"I believe his practices in themselves as high, as tyrannical as any Subject ever ventur'd on, and the malignity of them, hung so aggravatingly by those rare abilities of his, whereas God hath given him the ufe, but the Devil the application. In a word, I believe him full that grand Apologist to the Common-wealth, who must not expect to be pardoned in this world, till he be dispatched to the other. And yet let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, my hand might not be to that dispatch, I protest as my Conscience stands informed, I had rather it were off.

"Let me unfold unto you the Mystery, Mr. Speaker.

"I will not dwell much upon justifying unto you my seeming variance at this time from what I was formerly, by putting you in mind of the difference between Prosecutors and Judges.

"How mis-becoming that favour would be in a Judge, which perhaps was commendable in a Prosecutor. Judges we are now, and must put on another personage.

"It is honest and noble to be earnest in order to the discovery of truth, but when that hath been brought as far as it can to light, our judgment therefore ought to be calm and cautious.

"In prosecution upon probable grounds, we are accountable only for our industry or remissness, but in Judgment we are deeply responsible to God Almighty, for its rectitude or obliquity. In cases of life, the Judge is God's Steward of the parties blood, and must give an Account for every drop.

"But as I told you, Mr. Speaker, I will not infit long upon this ground of difference in me now, from what I was formerly.

"The truth on it is, Sir, the fame ground whereupon I with the rest of the five to whom you first
The Reign of King Charles the First.

First committed the consideration of my Lord of Strafford brought down our opinion that it was fit he should be accused of Treason, upon the same ground I was engaged with earnestness in his prosecution, and had the same ground remained in that force of belief with me, which till very lately it did, I should not have been tender in his condemnation. But truly Sir, to deal plainly with you, that ground of our accusation, that put to our prosecution, and that which should in the bais of my judgment, of the Earl of Strafford as unto Treason, is to my understanding quite vanisht away.

This it was Mr. Speaker: His advising the King to employ the Army of Ireland to reduce England. This I was affur'd would be proved, before I gave my consent to his Accusation. I was convinced in the same belief during the prosecution, and fortified in it by all these, Henry V an, preparatory examinations, by the interlocutions which that worthy Member Maitel gave me, that his Testimony would be made convincing, by some Notes of what past at the Junto concurrent with it, in which I ever understanding to be of some other Concern, you see now prove, but a Copy of the same Secretaries Notes, discover'd and produc'd in the manner you have heard, and those disjointed fragments of the venomous part of diabolic, no results; no Conclusions of Councils, which are the only things that Secretaries should regifter; there being no use at all of the other, but to accuse and to bring men into danger.

But Sir, this is not that which overthrows the evidence with me, concerning the Army of Ireland, nor yet that all the Junto upon their Oaths remember nothing of it.

But this Sir, which I shall tell you is that which works with me, under favour, to an utter overthrow of this evidence as unto that of the Army of Ireland: Before whilst I was a Protector, and under tie of seceretie, I might not discover any weaknesses of the cause, which now as a Judge I must. Maitel Secretary was examin'd thrice upon Oath at the preparatory Committee.

The first time he was question'd to all the Introgostaries, and to that part of the seventh which concerns the Army of Ireland, he said positively in those words, I cannot charge him with that. But for the rest, he desired time to recollect himself, which was granted him.

Some days after he was examined a second time, and then deposet those words, concerning the Kings being absolved from Rules of Government, and to forth, very clearly, but being preft to that part, concerning the Irish Army, again, and he could say nothing to that.

Here we thought we had done with him, till divers weeks after my Lord of Northumberland and all others of the Junto, denying to have heard any thing concerning those words of reducing England by the Irish Army, it was thought fit to examine the Secretary once more, and then he deposet those words to have been said by the Earl of Strafford to his Majesty:
At this Speech there were much offended: who defended the death of the Earl; and they were so furious in the pursuit of it, that they took the Names of all the dissenters upon a division of the House when the Bill past, and caus'd them to be dispersed among their party in the City, who came in great tumults to Westminster to clamour for Justice, and in the Old Palace- Yard in Westminster those dissenters were post'd up, to be expos'd to the fury of the ungovern'd multitude, made at this time so fmad and violent that some of them were heard to say, If they could not have the Earl of Strafford's life, they would have confec. of the Kings; and in their Paper they call'd the moderate part of the House of Commons Strafford. The Names of thofe that signed to this Bill of Attainder.

The fame afternoon this Bill of Attainder was carried up to the Lords Houfe, where it reflted many days, and had probably never past'd had not many of the Peers been tried from coming to the House by the tumultuous multitude, in whom each fear and jealousie was infl'd by the fmallft affai's of men, Men of both Houfes, that when any debate was like to be carried againft them in either Houfe, they would fay, for great numbers of them with words and claps who would menace, reproach, and affault fuch Members as difliked them. But notwithstanding all this violence of prosecution, the Lords were much unfatis'd, and fo many fervile were flared by them, that a conference was defir'd with the Commons to reolve them, and it was agreed that Oliver St. John the Kings Solicitor should on the 29th of this Month give their Lordships an account in publick in Westminster-Hall of the reafons impelling the House of Commons to proceed by Bill, ordering alfo that the Earl of Strafford should then be prefent. Whilst these things were in agitation, many confultations were had about raising money for the paying and disbating the English and Scotch Armies in the North, and other matters relating thereto.

The Commons had voted to give three hundred thousand pounds to the Scots as a fit proportion for recompence of their laft and necessitie's occasion'd by this War, notwithstanding the great Levies made by them for their Subfidence in the Northern Counties; but thofe that invited them hither, fo their own purpofes were effected, cared not into what extremity the Kingdom was brought, brought, and therefore they gave many delays to the Scotch Treaty, and to the disbanding the Armies, and the raising money for these ends; and one of them said, They could not yet spare them, that the foes of Zerviah were too strong for them: but upon a debate of their matters in the House of Commons, when many discourses were made of the necessitudes of the Northern parts, occasion'd by the Scotch Army, and one Mr. Gove's Holtes a Burgeler for Newborne upon Trent said, That the last way of paying them was by Ad, and to expect the King's foot. They took such offence at his Speech that they speedily call'd him to the Bar, and being not satisfied with what he said there, they expel'd him from the House.

These transactions were carried on with great heat by a clamorous pretended necessity of Reformation in Church and State, and the people were persuaded to believe their Religion and Liberties had been lost if the Scotch had not interposed at this time; wherefore that the time of the Armies lay may be prolong'd till such alterations in Church and State were made as they design'd, all things were urg'd that might heighten the jealousies of the people, and at this time many apprehensions were rais'd of danger by the exercice of Popery and their access to the Court, as also of the continuance of the Army in Ireland: so that a Petition was present to the King, for three things touching three matters:

1. For removing all Papists from Court.
2. For disarming of them generally throughout the Kingdom.
3. For disbanding the Irish Army.

To all which the King the 28th, delivered answer contrarily thus: For the first, they all knew what legal trust the Crown had in that particular, therefore he shall not need to say any thing to give them assurance that he shall use it so, as there shall be no just cause of scandal.

For the second, He is content it shall be done according to Law.

For the last, He had enter'd into consultation about it, and found many difficulties therein, and he durst not with the disbanding of all Armies, as he durst conjure them speedily, and heartily to join with him in disbanding those two in England:

The day after the King had given this answer, the Earl of Strafford in parliament of what was before resolve'd, was brought into Leominster-Hall before a Committee of both Houses of Parliament, where Mr. St. John did endeavour to satisfy the Lords in the reasons well of the Bill of Attainder to induce them to pass it; for though their Proofs at the Trial were insufficient, and nothing but legal evidence could prevail in Judicature, by this way both Lords and Commons might proceed by the light of their own Conferences without any farther proof whatsoever: And so it was expressly affirm'd by Mr. St. John in the Speech he then made, wherein he said:

That although single testimony might be sufficient to satisfie private Conferences, yet, for the sake of it would have been satisfactorily in a judicial way, where forms of Law are more to be found upon, was not so clear: whereas in this way of Bill private satisfaction to each man's Conscience is sufficient, although no evidence had been given at all.

And towards the conclusion of what he said after many aggravations of the Earl's offences tending (as he said) to subvert our Laws, he told them, He that would not have had others to have Law, should not have any himself. It is true (said he) we give Law to Hares and Bees, because they be Beasts of Chase. It was never accounted either cruelty or folly play to break Foxes and Hares on the head, as they can be found, because these the Beasts of prey; the Warrior sets Traps for Pussies and other Enemies, for preservation of the life of the King's foot. They took such offence at his Speech that they speedily call'd him to the Bar, and being not satisfied with what he said there, they expel'd him from the House.

The Petition presented to the King.

The King's Answer to the Petition.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I had no intention to have spoke to you of this business to day, which is the great business of the Earl of Strafford, because I would do nothing which might hinder your occupations. But Judgments being ready to pass upon him, I think it is not necessary to declare my Conscience therein.

I am sure you know I have been present at the hearing of this great Case, and I would I tell you at my Conscience I cannot condemn him of High Treason.

I am not fit for me to argue this business, I am sure you will not expel it, a positive Doctrine both becomes the month of a Prince; yet must I tell you this truth, which I am sure no man can tell so well as myself.

1. That I had never any intention of bringing over the Irish Army into England, nor ever was advised by any body so to do.

2. That there was never any debate before me, either in publick Council, or private Committee, of the disloyalty of my English Subjects, nor ever had any suspicion of them.

3. That I was never consulted by any to alter the least of any of the Laws of England, much less to alter all the Laws. Nay, I tell you this, I think no body durst ever be so impatient as to move me to it; For if they had, I should have made them such an example, and put such a mark upon them, that all Poesy should know my intentions by it, they being ever to govern by the Laws, and no otherwise.

I desire rightly to be understood, for though I tell you in my Conscience I cannot condemn him of High Treason, yet cannot I clear him of Misde-meanors: therefore I hope you may find one way to satisfie faulties, and your own fears, and not oppose my Conscience.

My Lords, I hope you know what a tender Conscience I am, and I must declare unto you, that to satisfie my people I would do great matters; but in this of Conscience, neither fear, nor any others things.
The Reign of King Charles the First.

The Parliament at this time that they should proceed in this tender point; therefore I cannot suspect you will go about it. Nay, I must confess for Mr. Davenant, I am not in favour in them; though I will not chalk out the way, yet I will shew you that I think my Lord of Stratford is not fit hereafter to serve me, or the Commonwealth in any place of trust, so not to speak as a Confidable. Therefore I leave it to you, Lords, to find out some such way to bring me out of this strait, and keep your selves and the Commonwealth from such inconveniences.

This coming of the King, and the Speech then made relating to the two Houses, that few of them attended on the Solemnities of the next day, May 2, being Sunday, on which the King eldest Daughter married to the Prince of Orange, and the next day five or six thousand of Princes and other tumultuous Citizens came down to Westminster, most of them armed with swords, and demanded of the Lords as they went to the House, Justice and Execution against the Earl of Strafford, and many of them they likewise afflicted in their passage.

The same day intimation was given to the House of Commons of practices upon the English Army, to bring them up to London to save the Parliament; which was an artifice used by some leading men to add to those distractions already raised to fill the minds of the people with fears & jealousies, when in truth all that appeared in reference thereto amounted only to this:

Observation being made of the great tumults about Westminster, which seem’d to threaten the safety of such of the Members of both Houses as were known not to agree with the designs of some passionate men, who controu Lance’d the delivering of Petitions attended and subscribed by the hands of many thousands against the Laws and establishment of the Kingdom, (which yet seem’d to receive some countenance, and to carry some authority, as instances of the affections of so many persons;) it fell into the thoughts of some Officers of the Army of known, and publick affections to their Country, that a Petition of a modest and dutiful nature from the whole Army, For the concurrence and setting all grievances in the Church and State by Law, might be the means of it to bring the noble Houses, and coming from such Body might confirm those, who might be shaken with any fears of power or force by the tumults; but even in this the debate of it had so many intervening difficulties, that it was laid aside two months before any discovery; yet nevertheless this Alarum gave occasion to the Commons immediately to frame a Petition which the same day it was made, was imposed upon all the Members before they were permitted to go out of the House, and was taken by all of them, except the Lord Digby and Mr. Unike of his, and shortly after, it was sent to the Lords, and by them taken also, and afterwards by an order of the House of Commons, all the Subjects of England were enjoyn’d to take it, under pain of being thought unfit of bearing any office either in Church or Commonwealth, to which the Lords would not content. The Petition was in these words:

I A B. do in the presence of Almighty God, the Prince, promise, vow, and protest, to maintain and defend, in all points, as far as lawfully I may, with my life, lands, and effects, the true reformed Protestant Religion, as expressed in the Doctrine of the Church of England, and against all Popery and Popish Innovations within this Realm contrary to the same Doctrine, and according to the duty of my Allegiance to his Majesty King James, of Great Britain and Ireland, as also the Power and Privileges of Parliament, the lawful Rights and Liberties of the Subject, and every person that maketh this Petition in whatsoever he shall do in the lawful prudence of the same. And to my power, and as far as lawfully I may, I will apply, and by all good ways and means endeavour to bring to condign punishment all such as shall either by forces, practices, plots, councils and confpiracies, or otherwise do any thing, to the contrary of anything in this present Petition contained. And further, that I shall in all just and honorable ways, endeavour to preserve the nation and peace between the three Kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland; And neither for fear, nor other respect shall relinquish this Promise, Vow, and Petition.

How this Petition was observ’d by most of them that took it, will be discover’d hereafter.

On the fifth of May, ground was taken from the great apprehensions of the House of Commons, that the Parliament might be dissolve’d before Justice should be done upon Delinquents, publick Grievances redress’d, a firm Peace between England and Scotland concluded, and before Provision should be made for the re-payment of such moneys as should be taken upon Credit to answer the immediate emergencies that were at that time in the State: to debate of the necessity of a Bill for the continuance of this Parliament not to be prorog’d or adjourn’d, but by Act of Parliament, in which there was such haste made, that within two days after the first mention of it, it was pas’d in the House of Commons, and carried up to the Lords, where it stood not long, for the temporizing was too great to let a Bill of this Nature be laid aside, and in a few days it came before them, (viz.) on Saturday the 8. th of May, both that, and the Bill of Attainder were pas’d: The Bill of Attainder had a hard passage, of 45 present, there were 19 against it, there were many of the Earls friends that abett’d themselves for fear of the tumults, otherwise the suffrages for him, had more than counterpoys’d the Votes for his death: the same day they sent to the King, to desire access to him, which was granted, and about four a clock they attended in the Banqueting-house at White-Hall, where after some time these two Bills were presented to him, with a signification, that the present danger of the Kingdom, could not admit of delay, and therefore they humbly besought him, to give his Royal assent thereunto. The King told them they should expect his assent on Monday, and so they parted from each other.

On the next day which was Sunday, the King funds for the Arch-Bishop of Armagh, the Bishops of London, Durham, Lincoln, and Carlisle, whom he desired as Calvinists to advise him, whether in justice he ought to pass the Bill of Attainder against the Earl, all but the Bishop of Lincoln, were very tender in this affair, the matter of fact they say he could himself be a judge of, having been present at the Tryal; and for the matter of Law, what was Trafalgar, and what not, he was to rest in the opinion of the Judges, whose office it was to declare the Law, and who were from therein to carry themselves indifferently between him and his Subjects, that the King might shew mercy to him, and pardon his offence, without any scruple of conscience, they said no man doubted, if other reations of State did not hinder, of which the major part, defir'd neither to be Judges nor Advisers, but the Bishop of Lincoln went a little farther, he urg'd the opinion of the Judges, and the Judgement of the Parliament thereupon, representing the terrible consequences of an instigated multitude, and that no other expedient could be found out to appease the people. It is not said the King was convinc'd, by any thing said to him at this Conference, but the motive superior to all, was a Letter he received from the Earl, wherein he thus concluded.

SIR,

To get Your Majesties Conscience at liberty,

I do most humbly begf you for the preventing of such mischiefs as may happen by Your resolufio, to pass the Bill. By this means to remove prov'd be God, I cannot say this accufed, but I confess this unfortunate thing for the way, towards that bleft agreement which God (I trust) shall for ever establish between You and Your Subjects. Sir, My confent herein shall more acquit You to God, than all the World can do besides: To willing man there is no injury done. And as by God's Grace I forgave all the World, with alemyns and meafefts of infinite conuenience to my judging Soul; So Sir, I can give up the life of this World with all cheerfulnes imagin'd, in the past acknowledge't of Your excellent Favour, and only leg that in Your Goodness, You would vouchsafe to call Your grations regard upon my poor Soul, and his three Sifters, left or more, and no otherwise than their unfortunate Father shall appear more or less guilty of this death. God preferve Your Majesty.

Your Majesties Most Humble and Faithful Subject, and Servant,

STRAFFORD.

On the next day in the morning he sign'd a Commission to the Earl of Arundel, the Lord Privy Seal, the Earl of Pembroke, and others, for the paifing of the two Bills, the one for the continuation of the Parliament, the other the Bill of Attainder against the Earl of Strafford, than which Confeffion never any thing past'd from him with greater Reluctancy at the present, or which he bewail'd afterward with greater remorse of conscience, for those themselves that fram'd it, know'd of what dangerous confequence it might be hereafter to the lives and fortunes of the Subjects to let such a prejudic president remain in force, a clause was added to the Bill, that it should not be drawn into example for the time to come; which because it may seem strange to them that know it not, we shall here iffer so much of the enacting part thereof as concerns this point, (for the preamble is only a recital of the heads of the Accufation.)

Be it therefore encaled by the Kings Most Excellent MAjesty, and by the Lords and Commons in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the fame, that the said Earl of Strafford for the heinous Crimes and Offences aforefaid, fland and be adjudged and attainted of High Treafon, and flall suffer such pain of death, and incur such forfeiture of his Goods and Charters, Lands, Tenements, and Hereditaments, of any Estate of Freehold or Inheritance in the said Kingdoms of England and Ireland, which the said Earl or any other to his next, or in trust for him, have, or had the first day of the sitting of this present Parliament, or at any time since. Provided, that no Judge or Judges, Juftice or Juftices whatever, shall adjudge or interpret any Act or thing to be Treafon, nor bear or determine any Treafon, nor in any other manner than he or they should be ought to have done before the making of this Act, &c. As if this Act had never been made.

Thus have we Trafalgar and no Trafalgar in the selfsame action, that being judg'd Trefon in this one man, which never was to be judg'd Trefon in any other.

What inducements the King had to pass this Act, and with what regard he did it we have heard, but who drew him to the other may be now inquir'd, do me attribute it to the Lord Say then Master of the Wards, & one of his Majesties Privy Council, who as it is reported when the King ask'd him if a continuance for seven years might not serve the turn, made answer; that he hoped they would dispatch all businefs in so many Moneths, and that if his Majesty pass'd the Bill, it should be far from the making the Parliament Perpetual, that he was confident they would defend it for three years, but must lay the blame on the Marchesa of Hamilton, who by cutting out so much work for the King in England, doubted not mercy on his designt in Scotland without interruption, for it is credibly faid, that he did brag much of this service when he was in that Kingdom, affirming frequently that he had got a Perpetual Parliament for the English, and would procure the like for the Scots before he had done: Although the King sign'd the Commission for passing of these Acts, yet the Royal affent was not given to them till the tenth of May, and on the next day, the King wrote to the Lords by the Prince of Wales, in these words:

My Lords,

I did yesterdays signifie the Juflice of the Kingdom by passing the Bill of Attainder against the Earl of Strafford. But Mercy being an inherent & inseparable to a King as Juflice, I deifiue in some measure to shew that likefaire, by offering that unfortunate man to Juflice the natural ends of his life.
The Reign of King Charles the First.

life in some close imprisonment; sot, that if he ever make the least offer to escape, or offer directly or indirectly to meddle in any sort of public business, especially with me, either by Message or Letter, it shall confine his life without further Process. This, it may be done without the discontents of my people, will be an unutterable contentment to me.

To which end, as in the first place, by this Letter do carefully direct your approbation, and to endear it the more, have chosen him to carry it, who of all your Honours must dear unto me: So I desire that by conference you will endeavour to give the House of Commons contentment; likewise af- furing you, that the exercise of Mercy is no more pleasing to me, than to see both Houses of Parliaments content; for my sake that I found underate the severity of the Law in so important a case.

I will not say that your complying with me in this my intended Mercy, shall make me more willing, but certainly it will make me more careful in grunting your just grievances. But if no less than his life can satisfy my People, I must say, Fiat justitia. I was again recommending the consideration of my intentions to you, I rest,

Your unutterable and affectionate friend,

Charles R.

If he must die, it were Charity to reprieve him till Saturday.

This Letter was twice read in the House of Peers, who after consideration thereof, sent twelve of their number to the King, to signify to him, that neither of the two intentions express in the Letter, could with duty in them, or without danger to his Person the Queen, be possibly admitted. Which being accomplished, and more expressions offered, the King touch'd no more words to convey his thoughts, but that he intended by his Letter, was with an if, if it may be done without discontent to his people. If it cannot be, I say again the same that I wrote, Fiat justitia.

My other intention proceeding out of Charity, for a few days recipt, was upon certain information, that the estate was so distracted that it ne- cessarily required some few days for the settle- ment thereof.

Whereunto the Lords answered their purpose was to be fuitors to his Majesty for favour to be showed to his innocent Children, and if himself had made any provision for them, that the same might hold. This was well pleasing to his Majes- try, who hereupon departed from the Lords. At his Majesties departure they offered up into his hands the Letter it fell which he had writ. But he pleased to say, What I have written to you, I shall be content it be registred in your House. In it you fee my mind, I hope you will use it to mine Honour.

Upon Wednesday the 12th of May, the Earl was summon'd to his period: He was conveyed from the Tower by a Court of Guard, formed of the trained Bands. Before him went the Marshal men, next the Sheriffs Officers with Halberts, then the Warders of the Tower, then the Earl Gentleman-Usher bare-headed, and next him the Earl himself accompanied with the Primate of Armagh and others. Upon his first coming forth, being to pass near the Arch-Bishops lodging (who stood at the window waiting for his approach) he lifted up his eyes, and clipping the Arch-Bishop, bestowed a low obeisance towards him, saying, My Lord, your Prayers, and your Blessing; the Arch-Bishop lift up his hands, and bestowed both; but overcome with grief fell to the ground in amni desigus. The Earl proceeding a little farther, he bowed the second time, saying, Farewell my Lord, God protect your innocencce.

Being brought to the Scaffold, he address his Speech to the Lord Primate to this effect:

My Lord Primate of Ireland,

It is my very great content that I have your Lordship by me this day, in regard I have been known to you this many years, and I do think God and your Lordship for it that you are here. I am come hither by the good will and pleasure of Almighty to pay that last debt I owe it sin. And to sum to that Judgment which both past a gainst me. I do it with a very contented and quiet mind; I thank God I do freely forgive all the world. I thank God, I can say it and truly too.

My Confession bearing me witness, that in all my employments since I had the honour to serve his Majesty, I never had anything in the purpose of my heart, but what tended to the fame and individual prosperity of King and People, although it hath been my ill fortune to be misconstrued.

There is one thing I desire to free my self of, & I am confident I shall obtain your Christian charity in the belief of it. I was so far from being against Parliaments, that I did always think the Parliaments of England, were the most happy confusions that any Kingdom or nation lived under. The least means under God to make the King and People happy.

For my part I here acquit all the world, and declare the God of Heaven is ready to forgive them that contrived it, though in the intentions and purports of my heart, I am not made guilty of what I die for. And it is a great comfort for me, that his Majesty conceives me not writing so heavy a punishment as this.

I wish this Kingdom all prosperity and happi- nefs, and desire every one who hears me, to consider seriously whether the Reformation of a Kingdom should be written in Letters of Blood. Let me never be so unhappye as that the least drop of my blood should rise up in Judgment against any of you, but I fear you are in the wrong way.

I profess that I die a true and obedient Son of the Church of England wherin I was born, and in which I was bred. Peace and prosperity be ever to its

This said, he declared all present to affit him in his Prayers, wherein he continued near a quarter of an hour, then rising up he bad all his friends farewell, especially by name his Brother Sir George Wentworth, by whom he lent his love to his wife and blessing to his Children, willing him to charge his Son, never to meddle with the Patri- mony of the Church.

Then he adddress himself to the Block, and having stood a while, he gave the Executioner the token of his peremptoriness, where the Heads-man doing his office, severed his head from his Body at the first stroke. Thus died this un- fortunate Earl. A Gentleman he was of excellent endowments, of a happy fluence in Speech, and of a stretching and found Judgment in Coun- sel, and always faithful to his Master therefor. The Scots designing some alterations in that Kingdom, pre-
The Reign of King Charles the First.

The Bishop of London Office of Treasurer, was put into the hands of five Commissioners; the Earl of Hartford was sworn Governor of the Prince in the room of the Earl of Newcastle, and the Earl of Essex Lord Chamberlain of the Kings Housethold in the place of the Earl of Pembroke; the Office of Master of the Wardes was resign’d by the Lord Corington, and conferred on the Lord Say; and the Earl of Leicester was made Lieutenant of Ireland: having thus begun, the King was resolved to proportion remedies to all the visible known Dilities of the State, by the advice and Council of both Houses of Parliament, making hitherto no rule to his conciliating but their asking: Thus they gain’d from him the abolition of the Star-Chamber; a Court formerly created by Act of Parliament.

The High Commission Court had proceeded with too much rigour, having for its out-grown the power of Law that it would not be limited and guided by it, and therefore that Branch of the Statute by which it was erected was repealed. The Wits for Ship-moneys, and all the proceedings in that business were by the King’s consent adjudged void, and the Judgments, Entretains, and Entries thereupon vacated and cancelled, though all the Judges had subcribed unanimously to the lawfulness of it in time of danger, of which danger the King was declared to be the Judge; and moreover, being brought to a publick Trial, after it had been argued by Countet on both sides in the Courts of Justice, and by all the Judges in the Exchequer Chamber there pass’d a definitive Sentence for it: but this abolition of Ship-money by a Law was not enough, for Bramhall, Trever, Wiffen, Davenvort, and Crawley five of the Judges that gave their opinions for it were impeached of high Misdemeanors for doing, and barely another of the Judges accused of Treason, but no further prosecution was made thereon.

Under colour of executing the Forrest Laws many had been vext by premonitions, fines, and imprisonments, for remedy whereof, the King pass’d a Law, for the certainty of the Meats, Lands, woods, and Bounds of all the Forrests in England, with great provision for the ease of the Subject in that behalf, likewise he pass’d a Law against divers incroachments and oppressions in the Stanfey Courts, and in an Act for granting the Subsidy of Tonnage and Poundage to him, in the Preamble thereof he parted with his Title of imposing: a power adjudged good, and exercis’d by former Kings, and though disputed, never resolv’d against by Judgment in Parliament. And by an Act for regulating the Office for Clerk of the Market, because the undue execution thereof had been grievous to many of the people; he contented that no Clerk of the Market of his House, should hereafter execute his Office in any part of the Kingdom, but only within the Verge of the Court, and granted the execution of that Office, to the Mayors and Bailiffs of Cities Corporate, and to the Lords of Liberties and Manors; and in an Act obtained from him for prevention of vexatious proceedings touching the Order of Knighthood he absolutely partiz’d with and discharg’d a right and duty as unquestionably due prejudice to the Kings Government there both in Church and State, were oppos’d therein by him, which made him formidable to them and they therefore became his mortal enemies, fo that some said, he suffered not so much a farce to the Senses, revenge, as to their fear: his Character is express’d by the King his Master, who said, He looked upon the Earl of Strafford, as a Gentleman whose great abilities might make a Prince rather afraid, than asum’d to employ him in the greatest affairs of State.

For those were prone to create in him great confidence of undertakings, and this was like enough to betray him to great errors and many enemies; whereof he could not but contract good store, while moving on so high a Sphere, and with so vigour a Lanthorn, he must needs (as the Sun) raise many envious exhalations, which condens’d by a Popular Ondium, were capable to call a cloud upon the brightest merit and integrity. The Children were referred to their honor and Estate in the Petition of the Lords and Commons; and the Commons were seemingly most favour’d therein, to make some recom pense to them, to give proof to the Nobility (least they should be shamed by the example) that not so much the estate as the man was aimed at; but when the Kingdom had need of that head for its service, they could not restore it, for at this time our want of his great abilities makes them better understand than our fruition of them, so dark is our humane understanding in preferring that, which is useful and virtuous amongst us. Though we were enter’d into great dispensers at this time, yet the Kingdom was mindful of the restitution of his Nephew the Elector Palatine, who was to attend the Emperor at a Diet to be held at Kaisersbaun, and Sir Thomas Rec was appointed Embassador from hence, to shew him there, & to add to the repetition of the Embassage, the Parliament joyn’d with the King in a Manifesto on the Electors behalf, but no success ensued.

The Parliament now in good security and power, began to think themselves concern’d to disband both the Armies. The Scots by the first cessation, were limited but for a Month, but they having resolv’d not to part with them, till they had procured the passage of several Laws in agitation their stay was from time to time enlarged, till there was almost nothing left for the King to grant, as by several of the Acts hereafter mentioned may appear.

The Triennial Parliament before spoken of was a great concession, for thereby the power of calling Parliament, in case of neglect or refusal, was put into the hands of Sheriffs, and Constables, which every one thought, a great foundation of confidence between the Kings and his people; but became many of the peoples grievances were conceived to proceed from the great liberty of the Council-Board, or from some Orders and directions from them, the King admitted to his Privy Council, the Earls of Hartford, Essex, Bedfor, Warwick, the Lord Viscount Say, and some others, all of them eminent in estate with some of them for their reputation of Honor & Justice, that some irregularities might be there committed; and divers of the Kings most eminent Officers surrendered their Offices to the King, to enable him to the better to gratifie most of them.
due to him by the law as any service he could challenge; He parted also with his propriety in the making of Gun-powder, and contented to an Act, for declaration of his Power in pressing Southerners, enjoyed by all his Predecessors for defence of his Person and the Realm: But that which chiefly protested the disbandoing of the Armies, was a Bill tender'd to the House of Commons, for the abdication of Bishops root and branch, but that took no effect, and now the Treaty between the two Kingdoms being finish'd, and an Act pass'd for confirmation thereof, the Armies were suddenly to be disbanded, and for that purpose the Earl of Holland was made General of the English Army, and for the payment of them and other debts of the Kingdom, a Pole-Bill was pass'd, wherein the whole Kingdom was assay'd, every Duke at 100, a Marquis at 80, Earls 60, Vicomtains and Barons at 40, Knights of the Bath 30, Knights Bachelor at 30, Esquires 10, and every Gentleman dispensing 100, per annum, 15, and all others of ability, a competent proportion; the meanest through the whole Kingdom was not excused under fix pence; As for the 300000, voted to be paid to the Scots towards a Supply of their losses, it was agreed that 160000, thereof should be paid at Midsummer come twelve-month, and the other 200000, two years after, which was to be secured to them by Act of Parliament.

And on the sixth of August both Armies were disbanded, and four days after the King began his Journey to Scotland to settle the affairs of that Nation, and on the same day both Houses of Parliament adjourn'd themselves to the 20th of October, and a Committee of the House of Commons consisting of fifty Members, was appointed to sit during the recess.

The King at his coming into Scotland, was received there with great demonstrations of affection by all the people, and to oblige them to him, he confirm'd not only the Articles of the Treaty between the two Nations by Act of Parliament, but all his former concessions sic, and all such things as had been act by them in their general assemblies; And likewise the better to please them, he conferred 3 Titles of Honour and dignity, 2000, and great places of power, trust and profit on others: amongst these the Marquess of Hamilton was made Duke of Hamilton, General Leslie was created Earl of Lennyr, who was to transport with a sense of the King's favour and bounty to him, that he often protest'd, and once at Perth upon his knees in the House of the Earl of Kenmawj, that he would never bear Arms against the King.

A while after the King being at Edinburg, some information was given to the Marquesses of Hamilton and Argyle, that there was some design upon their persons, which made them for some few days withdraw themselves from the Parliament out of Edinburgh, but their persons were of such quality and estimation in Scotland, that great care was taken to discover the ground thereof, and after full examination by the Parliament, upon the whole, they themselves, and that great Conclav were satisfied, that the information first given to them, could not be made good to the proof of any design to the danger of their persons; but the King who was a little reflect'd on in the first information, could not conceal his resentment of this carriage in Hamilton, and when he delivered to him his Patent of Duke in Parliament (according to the manner of that Nation,) he told him he had not design'd to be mistrusted by him, for he knew well when he was accus'd to him of High Treason, he permitted him even then to lie in his Bed-Chamber: This reproof had no great impression on the new Duke, though he seem'd outwardly much troubled for having given the King so just a cause of displeasure, yet upon the first report of this business at London (without laying to hear the opinion of the Parliament of Scotland, who had fully examine'd it,) strange interpretations were made upon the matter as highly and nearly concerning the peace of England, and a sudden resolution was taken full by the Committee during the recess, and after by the Parliament to have a guard for the defence of London, Westminster, and both Houses of Parliament, which troubled the minds of the people with the apprehension of new danger, when they were so lately freed from the fears of two Armies.

About the end of October this year, a Rebellion broke out in Ireland, which was carried to close, that no certain notice was given of the conspiracy till the very evening before it was to be put in Execution.

The innocent Protestants were upon a sudden dizzified of their Estates, and the persons of above 200000 men, women and children, murdered, within the space of one Moneth, and many of them with exquisite and unheard of tortures, that which increas'd the wonder of most men was, the consideration that the antient hatred which the Irish, (a thing incident to conquer'd Nations) had born to the English, did now seem to be forgotten; forty years of peace had compose'd those two Nations into one body, and cemented them together by all confections of alliance, by inter-marriages, and connivance, which was in outward appearance strengthen'd by frequent entertainments, and all kinds of friendly neighbourhood.

This design was to be put in execution on the 13th of October, upon which day, not only the Castle of Dublin, the Kingdom's chief Magazine, a Store-house of 100000 arms at that time, but all other Posts and Magazines in that Kingdom, were to be surpriz'd, and all the English and Protestants that joyd not with them, to be murder'd.

The feizure of Dublin Castle was prevented by timely discovery of the Plot to the two Lords O Conolly Justices, by oneown O Conolly of Irish Extraht, by discovery of the Plot, prevent'd, but a Protestant, which discovery was but the very night before that fatal day, and the occasion of it very accidental, by one Hugh Mac Mahon, Grandoon to the great Tyrone, a Gentleman of a plentiful Fortune, in the County of Monamon, & one that had been a Lieutenant Colonel in the King of Spain's Service, who trusted this Owen with some relations concerning it at a Tavern.

Upon which discovery, Mac Mahon and the Lord Mac-Gruy were presently apprehended by the Lords Justices, and many Conspirators of Lord Macgruys appre-

lott in one day. But the horrid design was past prevention, as to the general; for the Conspirators were up at the day's end in all Counties round about; and poor English Protestants were murdered at Dublin every day, robbed and spoiled of all they had, retaining how their Houses were bestowed, how Towns and Villages in all parts were fired, and cruel outrages committed.

The Lords Justices, Sir William Parsons, and Sir John Satres taking those Arms which they found in Dublin, and aiming whom they could to defend themselves, dispatched Letters to the King in Scotland, and the Earl of Leicester, then chosen Deputy, but faying in England.

I was generally said, the late insurrection (we must not call it Rebellion) in Scotland gave the first encouramgement to this in Ireland, and the pretences were in many of them the same, namely, for liberty of conscience, not to have the English Bishops and Liturgie impo'd upon them, and, as those in Scotland, being mighty zealous in their Religion, when once they were pos'd with a possibility of complying their designs, executed whatever the impromptu dictates of Superstition, or wicked exhortation of Priests could induce them to in this exceeding the actions of the Scots, whose Religion founded on more pious Principles, infracted them not to such bloody works.

The Lords Justices sent Sir Henry Spessgood to Scotland to the King, with intelligence of all that hapned, and thereupon he sent Sir James Stuart to the Lords of the Privy-Council in Ireland, to acquaint them with his knowledge and instructions, and to carry all that money that his present forces could supply; He mov'd also the Parliament of Scotland, (as being nearest) to a speedy help, but they excit'd their aide, because Ireland was dependent upon the Crown of England, but they said, if the State of England would use any of their men for that service, they would make propositions in order to it; at the same time likewise he sent Pott to the Parliament of England, and a while after Owen O Conolly the first discoverer of the Plot, brought Letters to London to the Earl of Leicester with an account of it, whereupon the Lords Justices desired some reward might be given to him; upon the receipt of which the Parliament Voted him a gift of five hundred pounds, and an annuity of 300 l. a year, and at a conference of both Houses they resolved to consider of the relief of Ireland, and passed several Votes to that end; but little was done for their relief till the King returned to London which was about the end of November.

The Irish dishearten the English from any resistance, bragg'd that the Queen was with their Army; that the King would amongst them with Auxiliary Forces; that they did but maintain his candid against the Puritans; that they had the Kings Commission for what they did (showing indeed a Patent that themelves had drawn, but thereto was affixed an old Broad Seal that had been taken from an obsolete Patent out of Fernham Abbey by one Plunket, in the presence of many of their Lords and Priests, as was afterwards attested by the Confession of many.) That the Scots were in confidence with them, to beget a faith of which, they obtained for some time from the lives and fortunes of those of that nation among them.

On the other side to encourage the Natives of their own part, they produced religious Letters, wherein they were informed from England, that the Parliament had passed an Act, that all the Irish should be compelled to the Protestant worship, and therefore for the first offence should forfeit all their Goods, for the second their Estates, and for the third their lives. Besides they promised them with the hopes of Liberty; that the English yoke should be shaken off, that they should have a King of their own Nation; and that the Goods and Estates of the English should be divided among the Natives.

With these hopes of Spoil and Liberty in the first, the Rebellion increased. The Rebels in Ulster under the conduct of Sir Phelim O Neill, fitted by Turlock oncual his Brother, Rory MacGarts Brother to the Lord MacGates, Philip O Neill, Macierre O Neill, Sir Conna Mac Gennet, called Mac Ruain, and others had perfec't themselves of all the strong places in Ulster, (London-Derry, Colerain, & the Town and Castle of Enniskillen excepted) many places which the English defended, and they could not either surprize by Treachery, or take by plain force, they had hurried to them upon compulsion and Articles, which they afterwards most perfidiously broke, butchering and massacring the poor English with their own pity or compassion to Age or Sex, though they still spared the Scottish Plantations in Ulster, because of their numbers; and likewise for fear of the Scottish Army so easily to be transported into the North parts of Ireland, till such time as their General Sir Phelim O Neill (one of the Race of the late bloody Earl of Tyrone, of English Education, a Gentleman of Lincoln-Inn, and a Professed Protestant till some time before) having gathered together a numerous rabble of the natives, who daily flock'd in to him, fell upon their Quarters; where though he exterrif'd not that cruelly upon their persons which he did upon the English, yet he deprived them both of their goods and livings, enforcing many of them to fly away naked to the Scottish Horse; from thence he marched into the English Pale, and in the beginning of November he took Dundalk, and from after he encamped at Ards within seven miles of Drogheda.

The King finding his stay in Scotland to be somewhat longer than he expected, that the business of Ireland might not suffer thereby, refer'd the whole business of Ireland to the Parliament of England, who had undertaken the charge and management of the Wars, wherewith the Earl of Leicester acquainted the Lords Justices, letting them know further, that they had declared a speedy and vigorous assistance, and had designed for their present supply, the sum of 5000 l. which would be raised with all convenient speed.

By this time the Lords of the Council in Ireland had armed as many as they were able, and given Commissions for raising of several Regiments, which were put into the hands (for the most part) of Gallant men, as their actions afterwards testified to the world; Sir Charles Coote, an active, and valiant man (who was also
The Reign of King Charles the First.

1641. made Governor of Dublin) with great speed, made up his Regiment out of the poor, robbed, and imprisoned English, which had fled to Dublin; Sir Henry Tichborn a worthy Commander was dispatched away with a Regiment of Foot, to keep Tredagh from the approaching Rebels: the Lord Lortem, and Sir Thomas Lucy, Captain Armstrong, Captain Turner, with others raised many Companies of Soulsiders there.

This was done about the middle of November; at which time also the Earl of Ormond with his well armed Troop of Horse came to Dublin; wherein with few days after, he was by a Commission sent from the Earl of Leicetler, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (as likewise by the King's approbation from Scotland signified in a Letter,) made Lieutenant General of all the Forces there, who being a person of great ability, credit and reputation in that Kingdom, and a Protestant, did very eminent service against the Rebels. The Parliament in prosecution of their great promises, sent over twenty thousand pounds in money which arrived seasonably at this time, their treasure being much exhausted, by paying the new Companies they had raised, but with this finall relief they were much encouraged, and very successful service was performed in divers places against the Irish, but no levies of men were made in England, till the King had disclaimed his power of preserving Soulsiders, and thereby laid himself open to those Arms that were afterward raised against him; the first Soulsiders they sent was a Regiment under Sir Simon Harcourt, who arrived in Ireland on the last of December.

Whilst that Kingdom was thus distress'd, the King returned out of Scotland into England about the end of November, and was by the City of London entertained, feated and conducted to his Palace at whitehall with as pompous solemnity, and most expreffions of love and duty as ever any King of England was, and the chief of them afterward were treated by him at Hampton-Court, where several of the Aldermen had the honour of Knighthood conferred upon them; but this little prospect of happiness was quickly clouded by the Monarch's displeasure of the State of the Kingdom presented to him at Hampton-Court a few days after his arrival there, from the House of Commons, which they prepared for him against his coming to London, wherein all the mistakes and misfortunes which had happened from the Kings first coming to the Crown and before, to that very hour were with great apsery recited.

Most moderate men wondered at this carriage towards the King, since he had from the first sitting of the Parliament, denied nothing to them, they reasonably asked, and when he went to Scotland it was voiced to all, that he parted a gracious King, from a contented people; and in Scotland he gave to much satisfaction to that people (though afterward as appeared by their unfafisfied they were persuaded) that they caused an Act (then in force) to be published and revived, That it should be detectable and demandable treason in the highest degree that could be for any of the Scots Nation conjointly or singly to levy Arms, or any Military Forces upon any presence whatever, without the Kings Commissio.
The Commons having passed a Bill of disabling all persons in holy orders to exercise any Temporal Jurisdiction or Authority (wherein the Votes of the Bishops in the House of Peers were taken away) when it came to the Lords House it met with a very cold reception; but the tumultuous rabble were so inflamed that they assailed and evildoctrine the Peers even at the doors of their House, crying out against Bishops and binding most of their malice against them, whereby they were deterred from doing their duty; and afterwards they went to White-Hall, and made a stand before the Gate in a great body, laying, they would have no more Porters-Lodge, but would speak with the King when they pleased: and when the Lords at a conference with the House of Commons, desired they would join with them in a Declaration for suppressing such tumults, several speeches were made in justification of them, Mr. Pam laying God forbid that the House of Commons should proceed in any way to dishearten people to obtain their just defires in such a way.

The Lords having in vain tried this way, appointed by advice of the Judges a Writ to be directed to the Sheriffs and Justices upon divers Statutes to suppress all tumultuous resort, in obedience to which the Justices appointed the Constables and others to attend about Westminster, to hinder that unlawful confusion of people, which was no sooner done, but the Constables and Justices of the Peace were sent for by the House of Commons, and the setting forth a Watch was voted to be a breach of Privilege, and before any conference with the Lords, by whose direction that Legal Writ issued out, the Watch were discharged, and one of the Justices for doing his duty according to that Writ was sent to the Tower.

These licentious and unpunished tumults gave occasion to the Bishops (who could not repair to the House without danger of their lives') to frame their Petition and Protestation to the King and Peers, which was to this purpose:—

They protested themselves to abate all allusions or opinions tending to Popery, or any malignity against the State; but were willing and ready to perform their duties in Parliament, but whereas coming to perform that duty and service, they have been unduly attacked, oppressed, and put in fear of their lives by multitudes of people, and can find no redress or protection upon complaint made, they therefore humbly protest before his Majesty and the Noble Peers that laying to themselves all their Rights and Interests of Siting and Voting in that House at other times, they dare not sit and vote in the House of Peers, until his Majesty shall further secure them. And because their fears are not in vain, but upon true grounds and objects, they do in all duty and humility therefore protest before his Majesty and the Peers, against all Laws, Orders, Votes, Resolutions and Determinations, as in themselfs null and of none effect, which in their absence since the 27th of this Instant December 1641, have already passed, as likewise against all such as shall hereafter pass, during this their enforced absence from the said House. Which Protestation they desired the King to command the Clerk of that House to record.

The Lords were so much displeased at this Protestation, that immediately at a conference with the Commons, they declared it was of dangerous consequence, and deeply intrenching upon the fundamental Privileges & being of Parliament, at which the Commons took to great a heat, that after a little debate, they pass a resolution by vote to accuse them of High Treason, and sent Mr. Glyn to the Lords House to impeach them thereof, which caused their commitment to the Tower, where they continued about four months.

The King thinking himself at this time unsafe at Whitehall without a Guard, accepted of the offer of some Gentlemen of the Inns of Court to be a Guard to him, by which means the insolency of the Rabble was in some degree check'd, but they instructed by their heads laboured to make it more unsafe to the King, by feeling on this occasion to raise the rage and jealousy of the whole City against him. For at midnight there were cries made in the streets of London, that all people should arise to their defence; for the King with his Papists were coming to fire the City, and cut their throats in their beds; then which though nothing was more false, yet it found the effects of truth; and the people as such Alarms being terrified from sleep, the impressions of those nightly fears lay long upon their Spirits in the day, and filled them almost with madness.

The King upon this great message to the Common Council of London, complaining of tumultuous assemblies of the people from the City daily retorting to Westminster to the disturbance of that Place and his Palace at Whitehall, but the House of Commons to obviate this, Petitioned him for a Guard for security of their Persons, alleading, that there was a malignant party, but terly envomened against them, who did daily gather strength and confidence, and were now come to that height of boldness, as to give out insolent and menacing speeches against the Parliament itself. It was therefore their humble defires that they might have a Guard out of the City, commanded by the Earl of Essex, Lord Chamberlain of his Majesties Household, of whole fidelity to the King and Commonwealth no question was ever made.

This Petition was denied by the King; but with a solemn engagement of himself by the word of a King, that the security of all, and every one of them from violence was, and ever should be as much his care, as the preservation of himself and his children, and if this general assurance would not suffice, to remove those apprehensions, he would command such a Guard to wait upon them, as he would be responsible for to Almighty God.

The King at such time as he was in Scotland, and expostulated with some of the Chief among them, touching their coming into England in a Hostile manner, and found, that some who were now leading men in the Houses of Parliament, had invited them to it. And having furnisht himself with sufficient proofs thereof, he commanded his Attorney General to draw up an Impeachment of High Treason against some of them; That is to say, the Lord Kimbolton a member of the House of Peers, Desavill Holles Esq. Sir Arthur Haslingworth, Mr. Hammond, Mr. Pam, and Mr. Stradley, A a a s all

The Commons voted a breach of Privilege.

This Act of the Kings was voted by the Commons a breach of Privilege, and strange reports and scandals were raised against him in the City of London, by the friends of the accused Members, as that he had offered violence to the House of Commons, and came thither with force to murder several Members, and used threatening speeches against the Parliament, with which the City was sopartial, that unusual Watches were set, and Guards placed in several places thereof, as if some desperate attempt or assault were to be made upon it; and as if all men were now abdolved from the rules of obedience; Publick direction is given, forwarding down the Train-Bands of the City to Westminster on a day appointed, to guard and bring to triumph the Persons accused of High Treason, as such worthy Patriots, that the Common-wealth it self could not forbear, but with reference to them.

This coming to the knowledge of the King, although many gallant and faithful Servants preferred their Service, to curb any insolencies that should be attempted on him, yet he resolved to withdraw himself, with the Queen and their children to Hampton Court, to give time for their jealousies and rankois to waver and perish. And although the King was not conscious to himself of any error in his first proceeding against their Members, remembering that in a Petition from both Houses of Parliament in the beginning of his Reign, in the case of the Earl of Arundel it was asserted, that in case of Treason, Felony, &c. breach of Peace, Privilege of Parliament doth not extend; yet neither his devising from the Protection of that impeachment, nor any thing that he could either say or do, would give satisfaction.

But that nothing might be omitted in him to manifest the clemency of his intentions, he sent a message to the Parliament of the twentyeth day of January, wherein in gracious expreptions he professed that since particular Grievances and Distractions were too many, and would be too tedious to be presented by themselves, that they would compose and digest them into one entire Body, that so both be and themselves might be able to make the more clear Judgement of them: And that is shown then appear, by what he would do, how far he had been from intending or designing any of those things, which so great fears and jealousies of some Persons seemed to apprehend; and how ready he would be to equal or exceed the greatest examples of most indulgent Princes in their Acts of Grace and Favor to the People.

This Message was receivd by the Parliament with thanks, and most people expected very good effects of it, but the accused Members and their faction, fearing this good disposition of the King might put an end to their Empire, cast all about ways how they might obstruct the settlement of affairs, and in a Petition to the King on pretence the better to enable them to discharge, their duties in those matters, they defid him to raise up to them a faire ground of confidence by putting the Tower of London into their hands, together with the Command of the Royal Navy, as also all the Forts, Castles, and Train-Bands of the Kingdom, all which they comprehended under the name of the Militia: This Petition was ill reliev'd.

1641.

The Queen accompanies the Prince of Orange into Holland.

The King removes to York.

The Parliament send after him in his journey to York, two Petitions for the Militia, one came to him at Theobalds, and the other at Huntington, to both of which he gave a denial, but since they could not have it by his consent, they took it without. and both Houses passed it by an Ordinance, and sealed it in divers Counties in the hands of such as they reputed the most eminent.

The King look'd upon this as the beginning of a War against him, and therefore that he might not be surpris'd, he issued out several Committisons of Array to persons of the most eminent quality, to muster, train, and array the Subjects for defence of himself and the Kingdom; and because of the indisposition of the Earl of Northumberland to command the Fleet, the King appointed Sir John Pennington in his place; but the Parliament by a message of the 28th of March, dislik'd of that choice, and recommended the Earl of Warwick to the King, but this the King would not admit of; Nevertheless, they authorized him to command the Fleet without the King's consent, and within a few Moneths they used such arts, that he became poises'd of the whole Navy: At Hull the King had a Magazine of Arms, and ammunition provided for the late intended War against the Scots, which was laid up there, when the occasion of that War was taken away. Of this Town the King himself, being poises'd, and to make use of his own Arms and Ammunition for his own Preservation, but coming before the Gates of the Town, he was declared entrance by Sir John Hotham, who by the appointment of the House of Commons, had newly taken Charge of that place.

The King thereupon proclaimed him Traytor, and by letters to the Parliament complain'd to them of the indignity, and required satisfaction; but they justified him therein, and sent a Committee of the Lords and Commons to reside there, for the better securing of the Garrison to them, and they gave the Governour power to raise the Train-bands for his defence. The King was forc'd for the time to induce this indignity, but being very intent of subduing the Rebellion of Ireland, he sent a Message to the Parliament to declare his intention to go thither in Person, and acquainted them with his purpose in order thereunto, to raise two thousand Foot, and two hundred Horse in the Counties near Clefsor for a Guard to his Person, which was so Grateful news to the Lords Justices and Council of Ireland, that they very much rejoic'd thereat, but the Parliament were so jealous of any thing that tended to the King's security, that they resolved to oppose it, but in regard it was a popular action, they were forced to use art in it; They therefore many inconveniences in the undertaking such a junction, both in the hazard of the King's person, and interruption of the proceedings of Parliament; but the chief matter was an apprehension, that hereby the King might have a good occasion of rousing Souldiers for his defence against the designs and contrivances against him; wherefore in the conclusion of their answer to the King's message, They declare, that they cannot consent to any levies but such as they shall advise and direct, and if any be otherwise rais'd, they must decline against them.

The King did hereby decline the levying of Guards and his Journey to Ireland, but reflecting now upon the affront of Sir John Hotham to him, and hearing that the Parliament against his consent had raised Guards to themselves, He summoned the Gentry of York-shire to his affiance, the Parliament declared, they had not superseded the Gentry of York-shire to a meeting, and acquainted them, That his Magazine at Hull was going to be taken from him against his will, the Militia against the Law, and his consent, put in Execution, and Sir John Hotham's letters countermand'd; so that upon these considerations, he was resolv'd to have a Guard to secure his Person, in which he pressed his influence, that he might be able to protect them, the Laws, and the true Protestant Religion from violation, or injury.

The Kings desires herein were with great satisfaction comply'd with, but the Parliament, upon notice thereof, declared, That it is against the Laws and Liberties of the Kingdom, that any of the Subjects thereof, should be commanded by the King to attend him at his pleasure, and that whatsoever, upon presence of his Majesties command, shall take up Arms in a War-like manner, shall be esteemed disturbers of the Peace, and to be proceeded against accordingly; but this did not terrify the people of York-shire from doing their duty to the King.

The breach now began to grow very wide, and many Members of both Houses repaired to the King to York, insomuch that in a very short space, there were more of the Peers at York, than sitting with the Parliament at Westminster.

The Commons, that they might not seem to desert at this time, sent up an impeachment to the House of Lords against nine of those Peers that deserted, that is to say, The Earl of Northumberland, the Earl of Devonshire, the Earl of Devon, the Earl of Monmouth, the Lord Howard of Charlton, and the Lord Rich for high Crimes and Misdemeanors; the substance whereof was, "For that contrary to their duty, they had deterred their attendance on the House, abetting themselves, after a Vote pass'd in both Houses; That the King seduced by wicked Council, instated to make War against the Parliament, and that whatsoever served or affilied him in that War, was adjudged a Traytor."

1642.

1. The nine Lords cen- fured.

Upon the impeachment, the House of Peers entered into debate thereof, and the nine Lords were confined:

1. Never to sit more as Members of that House.

2. That they should be utterly incapable of any benefits or Privileges of Parliament, and that they should suffer imprisonment during their pleasure.

Not long after this, the Lord Keeper Littleton went away the Great Seal to the King, by one Mr. Ellis, who was sent to him for it, and the next day he himself followed it, and came safe to the King at York; but this departure of the Seal, put the Parliament to a great plauge, and they (in vain) to intercept it in its passage.

The King found himself in very good eftream in the Northern parts, but he was rather willing to prevent the effusion of Blood, by any reasonable accommodation, than engage the Nation in a Civil War; and during his abode at York many Messages and Replies to that purpose passed between him and the Parliament, and at last, that they might not seem altogether averse from Peace, about the beginning of June they sent a Petition to the King with Nineteen Propositions.

The Propositions were:

1. That all the Kings Privy Council, great Officers, and Ministers of State may be put out, excepting such as the Parliament shall approve, and to affign them an Oath.

2. But all affairs of State be managed by the Parliament, except such matters as are transferred to them by the Privy Council, and to be concluded by the Major part of the Nobility under their hands: the full number not to exceed five and twenty, nor under fifteen; and if any place fall void in the interval of Parliament, then the major part of the Councils to choose one to be confirmed at the next Session of Parliament.

3. That all the Great Officers of the Kingdom shall be chosen with approbation of Parliament, &c. as before said.

5. Their Marriages to be treated and concluded by Parliament, &c.

6. The Laws against Papifts, Priests, and others be executed without Toleration or Dispensation, except by Parliament.

7. No Papift Lord or Peer to have Vote in Parliament, and their Children to be educated in the Protestant Faith.

8. To reform Church Government as the Parliament shall advise.

9. To settle the Militia as the Parliament have ordered, and for the King to recall all his Declarations published against their Ordinances therein.

10. All Privy Councillors and Judges to take Oath for maintenance of the Petition of Rights, and other Statutes which shall be made this Parliament.

11. All Officers placed by Parliament to hold their places quam dixit bene gejfinit.

12. All Members of Parliament put out during this time to be restored again.

13. The Justice of Parliament to pass upon all Delinquents, and they to appear or abide their confrance.

14. The General Pardon to pass with Exceptions, as the Parliament shall advise.

15. All Forfees and Caftees of the Kingdoms to be disposed of by Parliament, ut supra.

16. The King to disfrance all his Guards and Forces now in being, and not to raise any others, but in case of actual Rebellion.

17. The King to enter into a strict alliance with all Reformed States, for their assistance to recover the Rights of his Royal Sister and her Prince, to those Dominions and Dominions which belong unto them.

18. To clear the Lord Kimbolton and the five Members by Act of Parliament.

19. No Peer hereafter to be made, shall sit in Parliament without their consent.

And these Articles being confirmed, the Parliament engage to make him a happy Prince.

The King showed great dislike at these Propositions, for indeed they seemed rather calculated to gratifie the ambition of some of those that framed them, than for any other purpose, and the answer he gave was more scorn than usually his answers were.

Amongst other things, he told them, That they had contrary to Law preffed their Ordinances on the people, wrested from him the Command of the Militia, conterminated the Treaty of Hotham, and had directed to the People Inviolates against his Government, after him with the favouring of Papists, and with another dislike of the Propositions, he protested, that if he were vindicated and a Prisoner, in worse condition than any the most unfortunate of his Predecessors had ever been reduced unto, he would never jump follow, as to grant such demands, and to make himself of a King of England, a Duke of Venice.

And now both sides prepared for War, and on the 10th of June an Order was made by both sides for Houfes of Parliament, for bringing in of Money, to make preparation and Plate to build halls for their Service, whereas it was exprest, that whereas should bring any Money or Plate, or furnish any with Horse and Arms, should have their monies repaid with Interest, according to eight in the hundred, for which both Houfes of Parliament did ingage the Publicke Faith.

The King was not wanting to his own Preferation in the mean time, and to do whatsoever might give encouragement to the business he had in hand, and first he afforded all the Peers then at York to attend him, and made to them a short Declaration, wherein he expressed himself to them in these words.

We do declare, that we will require no obedience from you, but what is warranted by the known Laws and Declarations to the People at York.

The King rejects the Propositions.

will defend the true Protestant Religion established by the Laws, the lawful Liberties of the Subjects of England, and the just Privileges of all the three Estates of Parliament; and shall require no further obedience from you, than as we accordingly shall perform the same. And we will not (as falsely pretended) engage you in any war against the Parliament, except it be for our necessary defence against such as do infolently invade, or attempt against us and our Adherents.

Upon this Declaration of the King those Lords and others of his Counsel made a Promise to him, and subscribed it with their hands as followeth.

We do engage our selves not to obey any Orders or Commands whatsoever, not warranted by the known Laws of the Land. We engage our selves to defend your Majesties Person, Crown, and Dignity, with your just and legal Prerogatives, and all Persons and Powers whatsoever. We will defend the true Protestant Religion established by the Law of the Land, the lawful Liberties of the Subjects of England, and the just Privileges of your Majesties, and both Houses of Parliament.

Lastly, we engage our selves not to obey any Rule, Order, or Ordinance whatsoever, concerning the Militia that hath not the Royal assent.

The King immediately wrote a Letter to the Lord Mayor of London, and the Alderman and Sheriffs, forbidding by express Command any Contribution of Money or Plate towards the raising of any Arms whatsoever for the Parliament; and invited all his loving Subjects (to prevent their own danger and the danger of the Kingdom from a Malignant party,) to contribute money or Plate to him, and they shall be repaid with confiscation of 8 in the Hundred, and immediately upon it, he made a Proclamation before those forementioned Lords and Counsellors about him, avowing any prevarications, or intentions to leave War against the Parliament; upon which the Lords and others then present at York made this further Declaration and Proclamation, subscribed under their hands.

We whose names are underwritten, in obedience to his Majesties desire, and out of the duty which we owe to his Majesties Honour, and to truth, believing herein upon the place, and witnessing of his Majesties frequent and earnest Declarations and proclamations of his adhering to all designs of making War upon the Parliament; and not using any colour of Preparations or Councils that might reasonably beg the belief of any such design, do profess before God, and testify to all the world, that we are fully persuaded that his Majesties hath no such intention; but that all his endeavours tend to the firm and constant settlement of the true Protestant Religion, and the just privileges of Parliament, the Liberty of the Subjects, and the Laws, peace, and prosperity of this Kingdom.

The King was strengthened with some Arms and Ammunition from Holland, from the endeavours of the Queen, but more strengthened by this Petition in his behalf, concerning his intention of not making War against the Parliament, proceeded in his business with great circumspection and indefatigable industry, and from York he went to Newcastle, where he made a Speech to the Gentry of Northumberland in a loving and winning way, commending their affections towards him; another Speech he made at Lincoln to the Gentry of that County full of Protestations concerning his good intentions not only to them but to the whole Kingdom and the Laws and Liberties of it, so that within three weeks both in his own Person, and by his Ministers with Speeches, Proclamations, and Declarations, he advanced his business in a wonderful manner. From Lincoln he removed to York, and from thence to Beverley, from whence he sent a Message to both Houses, and a Proclamation concerning his going to Hull, to take it in, requiring before his journey that it might be delivered to him; which they answered with a Petition, praying him to disband all his Forces about Hull, to recall his Commission of Array, dismiss his Guards, and come to his Parliament, at which the King was much displeased, and the Parliament voted, that an Army should be raised, whereby the Vote of both Houses the Earl of Essex was chosen General, with whom they prevailed to live and die in that cause; the King had about 3000 Foot, most of them Train-bands-men, and 1000 Horse before Hull.

Hull upon the Kings advance, having the advantage of a Spring-tide, drew up the Sillers and downed all the Country about the Town.

The Parliament took all care imaginable to supply the Town, which they reinforced with 500 Soldiers, under the Command of Sir John Meldrum. The King finding to great a strength to oppose him, and considering the preciosity of that time which he continued there without hope of success, resolved to march away; some about him, laid the fault of his not prevailing, upon the unskillfulness of the Country Captains, and the unexperienced wantonness of the Southwark. It was said, the King might have done better, if the Earl of Warwick had brought part of the Navy to his assistance, to have frightened them by Sea, but that was feigned by the Earl of the Navy.

The Earl of Essex was very busy in raising his Army, the Earl of Bedford was made General of the
The Reign of King Charles the First.

1642. the Houfe, Sir John Merrick Major General of the Army; the Lord Roberts, the Lord St. John, the Lord Rockford, the Lord Grey of Groby, Mr. Dennis Hollis, Mr. Hibden, Sir Philip Stanhope, Sir William Waller, Sir Samuel Lake; Sir Henry Chalmers, and Mr. Graunt, all Members of Parliament, had Commissions for Regiments.

The King in the mean time was not idle, he went to Leicester, where he summoned the Generals and Freeholders, and by his great address won many of them to an opinion of his Caufe, and from thence by the frift of August he returns to York, where he summoned the County, and acquainted them with the Parliaments preparations for War, and defired their advice and affiurance, for the Parliament had now published a Declaration for the raising of all power and force by Train-bands or otherwise to lead against all Trarors and their Adherents that opposed the Parliament, and them to kill and flay, as enemies to the peace of the Kingdom, and in it they named most of the Kings Lord Lieutenants and Commissioners of Array in the feveral Counties. The King then recommended to them the complaining of a Regiment for the Prince, and that he might not be behind hand with the Parliament, he publishes a Proclamation, wherein the Earl of Essex was proclaimed a Rebel and Traitor to the King and Crown, and all Colonels and Officers authorized by the Parliament that should not instantly lay down their Arms were declared guilty of High Treafion.

To obviate this, the Parliament had declared, That whofoever fhall return from the King to the Parliaments Army within ten days after publication, fhould have reception and pardon, excepting Perfons impeach'd of Delinquency or Treafon, or fuch as have been eminent Actors againft them, and except the Duke of Richmond, the Earls of Brifton, Cumberland, Newcastle, Rivers, and Carnarvon, the Viccounts Newcastle and Parkland, Secretary NichoPs, Endymion Porter, and Mr. Edward Hyde.

The King hearing the Parliament intended to send an Army Westward, gave Commission under the Great Seal of Englaud, to the Marquess of Hertford, to be his Lieutenant General within the Counties of Devon, Cornwall, Shropshire, Dorset, Wilts, Southampton, Berks, Oxford, Hereford, Monmouth, Kader, Brecknock, Glamorgan, Carnarvon, Pembroke and Cardigan; and sent to encourage Colonel Goring, who kept Portsmoufh at that time for him.

The preparations were very great on both fides, and on the 20th of August the King fet up his Standard at Nottingham, from whence he fent up a Message to both Houfe by the Earl of Southampton and Dorset, and Sir John Culpepper for a Treaty of Peace.

When they came to Welfminfter they were not permitted to fit in Parliament, whereof they were Members, nor could the Earl of Southampton (againft whom there was leaft exception) be permitted to deliver it, but it was fent into the Houfe of Peers by the Usher of the Black Rod.

In the Message the King signified, That defiring that many mistakes had arisen by the Messages, Petitions, and Answers, between him and the two Houfes of Parliament, which might be prevented by some other way of Treaty, whereby the matters in difference might be more clearly understood, and more freely tranfacted, he propofed that a certain number of persons might be fents, and enabled by the Parliament to a Treaty in some indifference places, with the like number authorized by him.

The Parliament answered to this effect, That they would take down his Standard, and recall the Proclamations, & Declarations whereby he declared the offifions of both Houfes to be reafonable, & their persons Traitors, and wherefo he had put them and the whole Kingdom out of his protection, they could not admit of any such Treaty.

The King replied to this, That he never did declare both Houfes of Parliament Traitors, or fet up his Standard againft them, much lefs to put them and the Kingdom out of his protection, and to remove all fcruples which might hinder a Treaty, he promised to this day to be appointed by them for revoking their Declarations against all persons as Traitors, or otherwise (for affailing him, he will upon the fame day recall his Proclamations and Declarations, and take down his Standard.

To this the Parliament answered by Petition, infifting upon their former request, To recall his Proclamations, concluding, That they can never allow themselves to be baffled with thofe persons about the King, who fent persons of defperate difpofitions and Convicts.

Thus did they contend for fome time by Declarations and Proclamations, which proved all frultles; for the Parliament having in their power all the Kings Revenue and his Navy, together with the Strength and Riches of the City of London, and great contributions from them and others of money and plate, thought the Kings forces to be incomparably in refpeét of thofe, that they defir'd all the overtures he made for peace, or put fuch exprefions into the anfwers they made to them, that he could not with honour and glory approve of them.

About the beginning of September Prince Rupert and Prince Maurice, the fccond and third Sons of the late King of Bohemia, came to offer their Service to the King their Uncle, whom prefently he put into Command; Prince Rupert within a fortnight after his arrival commanded a small party of thofe Forces which the King had at that time gathered together, with which he marched into divers parts of Warwickshire, Nortinghamshire, Leicestershire, Northumberland, and Cheftshire, his forces still encreafing as he march'd.

And whilft the Prince was thus active with his party, the King moved on fowly with thofe forces which he had, through Dor/inf/ire, Stafford, and Worceft/ire, on to Shrewsbury, where he intended to quarter for a time, as a fit Rendezvoze for thofe Troops & Companies he expected from Wales & other adjacent parts; for thofe of Denbigh & Flintshire and gene-generally all \textit{Wales} were very cordial to him and his Cause.

To \\textit{Shrewsbury} the King caused a Mint to be brought, and there coined all the Plate which he then had, or was then and soon after presented to him; for the University of \textit{Cambridge}, and many Noblemen, Gentlemen, and others, about that time had sent their plate to him, and many others had furnished him both with men, Horse, and Arms; and within few days after his coming thither his strength by his diligence and address was wonderfully increased, even beyond his own hope, for he had furnished the Gentry and Freetholders, and made to them a Speech so full of affective expressions, as rendered him to their thoughts, an injured Prince, and moved compassionate affections towards him; the Speech it self was in these words:

\textit{It is some benefit to me, from the insolvencies and misfortunes which have driven me about, that they have brought me so good a part of my \textit{Kingdom;} and so faithful a part of my people; I hope neither you nor I shall open my coming bither; I will do my part that you may not; and of you I was confident before I came. The residence of an Army is no slightly pleasant to any place; and mine may carry more fear with it, since it may be thought (being rol'd and jostled of all mine own, and rich terror used to fright and keep all men from supplying me) I must only live upon the aid and relief of my people. But be not afraid; I would to God my poor Subjects suffered no more by the insolvency and violence of that Army raised against me, (though they have made themselves wanton even with plenty,) than you shall do by mine; and yet I fear I cannot prevent all disorders; I will do my best; and this I promise you, no man shall be a loyer by me, if I can help it.}

I have went bither for a Mint; I will not use it in my own Plate, and expel all my Lawd to sole or mortgage, that it be insolvent, I may not bring the least pressure upon you: In the mean time, I have furnished you bither to do that for me and your selves, for the maintenance of your Religion, and the law of the Land (by which you enjoy all that you have,) which other men do against us. Do not suffer so good a cause to be lost, for want of supplying me with that, which will be taken from you by those who pursue me with this violence. And whilst these ill men sacrifice their Money, Plate, and many industry to defray the Common-walsh, be you no less liberal to preserve it. Afford your selves, if it please God to bless me with success, I shall remember the assistance that every particular man here gives me, to his advantage. Moreover, it will hereafter (how curiously and the minds of men are now pleased,) be honor and comfort to you, that with some charge and trouble to your selves, you did your part to support your Kings and preserve the Kingdom.

God had so blest the just endeavours of the King, that before the middle of October, which was about three weeks after his first coming to Shrewsbury, with a small body of an Army, he was grown to a strength consisting of six thousand foot, three thousand brave horse, and two thousand dragoons in one body, besides what he had in other parts, of which he gave the chief command, under himself, to the Earl of \textit{Linlithgow}, and the next to General \textit{Ruben} a Scotch Gentleman of great experience, and Prince \textit{Rupert} was made General of the Horse, and the next in command to him was \textit{Commissary Wilmot.}

Whilst the King and the Parliament were gathering their Forces together, several parties were employed in divers parts of the Kingdome; \textit{Collo-}

\textit{Nellings} was besieged in \textit{Portsmouth} by Sir John \textit{Minister} Regiment of Foot, and the County Train'd-Bands, with one Troop of Horse, to which place a Squadron of the Fleet was also sent to frighten it the more, and the Garrison Souliers were to practised on, the Governor had no confidence in them, so that though the \\textit{Marquees of Hertford} hastened to his relief with some Forces he had newly raised, yet he was necessitated to surrender the Town before he could help him, and had conditions to be transported in one of the King's Ships to the Island of \textit{Portland,} either he was conveyed accordingly. But the \textit{Marquees of Hertford}, though he could not secure Portsmouth, yet he seized on \textit{Shrewsbury} Cattle in \textit{Dorsetshire}, and pisset by the Earl of \textit{Bedford,} (who commanded in those parts a party of the Parlaments Troops) and marched over \textit{Severn} into \textit{Wales} to raise more Forces for the King, giving the Earl a little Buffet in his passage.

The Parliament Army raised under the Earl of \textit{Exe}, was now grown to a considerable Body, consisting of about 16000 Horfe and Foot united in one Army, besides parties abroad, their general \textit{Randezvous} was at \textit{Northampton}, where the Lord \textit{Brook}, Lord \textit{Roberts}, \textit{Collo-}

\textit{Nellings} and many others of the chief Commanders (said with them, expecting the presence of the \textit{Gener}-

\textit{al}, and on the ninth of \textit{September}, he set out from London with great solemnity; The Parliament sent a Petition to him at \textit{Northampton}, to be by him presented to the King, the effect of which was, To entreat his Majesty to withdraw his presence from those wicked perfons about him, (for so all the Kings party were called by them,) and The Parlaments petition to be not to mix his danger with theirs, but that he would return to his Parliament without his Forces, and by their advice compose the present disaffec-

The Earl of \textit{Exe} after he had been at \textit{Northampton} a while, had increased his Army to the number of 20000, from whence he march'd to \textit{Coventry}, and from thence to \textit{Warwick}, and having left some Companies in both those Towns for their security, he march'd away towards \textit{Worcester}, upon intelligence that the King himself intended to come thither with his Forces.

Sir \textit{John Byrom} had first entered \textit{Worcester} for the King, whom Captain \textit{Fiennes} had endeavoured to take, though he was sent to dislodge some Troops of the Parliament at \textit{Coventry} and County \textit{Verdon}, which he had got together, with whom he attaqu'd the Town on the South side of Secavers, supposing some of \textit{Exe} his Troops were marching towards the Town on the other side, (as he was informed by a Spie,) but thole proved to be a party of the Kings Horse under Prince \textit{Rupert}, who march'd into the Town with 500 Horfe, and made \textit{Fiennes} draw off to a distance. The Prince had notice that \textit{Collo-} together with Captain Holte, Captain Winges, Captain France, and Captain Ashby were drawn together to attack him, and thereupon he marched out of the City into a green Meadow near admirable and drew up his men into Battle, the Prince took the advantage, and charged them first there, where the Rear could not come up to affit the Van, nor the Van retreat without great disorder, so that the Prince prevailed: Douglas, Colonel Sands; his Major was slain, and the Colonels own Cornet, the Colonel himself was desperately wounded, and many of his Soldiers killed, and some Slaughter was also made of the Princes men.

The Prince after the fight drew into Worcester, but hearing Essex was marching with the whole Army, he went away to Ludlow, twenty miles from hence; nor was his Intelligence ill, for immediately after the fight Essex came to Worcester with his Army, where he lay a month, and from hence he sent the Earl of Stamford with a Palsy to Hereford to impede the King's levies at Southwold, and sent other Forces to pillage Gloucester and Bristol. The Parliament did not apprehend the King's forces, for many began to appear for him in several parts of the Kingdom; in Yorkshire and the Northern parts, the Marquess of Newcastle, the Earl of Cumberland, Sir Marmaduke Langdale, Sir Francis Worsley; and many others had raised many Soldiers, and were powerful; so that the Lord Fairfax, Sir Thomas Fairfax his Son, Sir John Hotham, and his Son Capt. Hotham, who had gathered some men together for the Parliament were not able to appear against them; in Cornwall a body was framing under Sir Bevil Grenville, and Sir Nicholas Slaning; and Sir Ralph Hascard a portion of good condition and courage was hating to them in their levies, and many others in several parts of the Kingdom were aiming on both sides.

Whilst the affairs of England were in this Military posture, Ireland was neglected, for few Regiments were left over from Scotland, and the Earl of Leisters Regiment under Colonel Monk from England, but in no proportion to the necessities of that Kingdom, nevertheless they made many impediments upon their enemies into Leinster and Ulster, but Munster was but meanly supplied.

The King had conferred to an Act of Parliament before he left London, For the speedy and effectual reducing of the Rebels in his Majesty's Kingdom of Ireland and their due obedience, where in several persons were invited as Adventurers to advance money for that Service, who were to be repaid in Land for the same when the Rebels should be subdued, according to the proportion following, for each adventure of 300 l., one thousand Acres in Ulster: for three hundred pounds, one thousand Acres in Connaught; for 450 l., one thousand Acres in Munster: for six hundred pounds, one thousand Acres in Leinster; all according to the English measure, with meadow, Arable and profitable pasture, the Boggy, Woods, and barren Mountains being to be cult in, over and above, and to be held in free and common footage of the King, as of his Castle Dublin, and to a greater or lesser sums: and it is particularly enacted the part of that money which should be paid in according to the Act, shall be employed to any other purpose, than the reducing of those Rebels, until they shall be declared to be subdued. The Parliament neverthelesse to enable them the better to let out their Army had diverted 10,000 l. of this money, whereat the King was very much offered and rentented it very sharply in one of his Meditations to them; but they answered, that they did intend speedily to repay it, and to recapitulate, did charge the King with intercepting 900 Suits of Cloathes, with 39 Chirungs chest, and some draught Horses going into Ireland for the Train of Artillery there; but the Parliament made yet bolder, and made use of the greatest part of a Bagrade raised under my Lord Wharton and one Colonel Harton, deigned for Munster, against the King in a Battle which was this year fought, of which hereafter; but by this proceeding on both sides, it was evident they both thought the security of England more considerable to them than that of Ireland, which could not well submit without this.

It was now about the middle of October when the King came from Stratford, he marched a long by Coventry and summoned the Town, but by the example of Hull, he was denied entrance into Coventry.

The King declared an order for the advantages of the Parliament.

Marching on, he came and lay at Southam being but a small distance from Essex his Army, from whence he thrice a terror into the City of London it fell, for he was then nearer to London then Essex was, incomath that both Houlbes began to apprehend his approach, and Ordered that the Train Bands should be speedily raised for a Guard and some works for planting of Ordinance in special places about the City of London and Suburbs, and the Parliament lent twelve Companies to pollish and guard Windsor Castle.

The Earl thought it his chief work to march as near to the King as he could; and on the 23. of October he lodged at Keinton within six miles of that City, when they lay at one Sir William Cheves's House betwixt there and there, and his forces lodged at Cropredy and Edgerton.

The King the next morning drew his Army to Edgbeth; and Essex intended to retire all Sunday in Keinton, to expect two Regiments of Foot, eleven Troops of Horse, and seven Piece of Cannon who were a days march behind him, but when he heard the King's Army was in the field, he drew his Army into Battle, containing of 12,000 Foot in twelve Regiments, and 40 Troops of Horse, and Dagoners: the King's Army was esteemed about ten thousand Foot, and about 4000 Horse and Dagoners, but most of the Foot were very ill armed; at the bottom of Edgbeth, there was a large Plain, called the Vale of the Red Horse, where Essex drew his Army into Battle, about a half mile distant from the foot of Edgbeth: the main Battel of the King's Army was led on by the Earl of Limeray on foot, with a Pike in his hand, Prince Rupert commanded the King's right wing, wherein was the greatest strength of Horse, and General Bower, and Commandery Williams in the left, the right wing of time the Earl of Eves had also marched with his Army nearer to London, and on the seventeenth of November came himself to Westminster, where he was wellcomenced by both Houses of Parliament, and had a present of 3000 l., given to him.

Whilist the King was at Colbrook, the Parliament lent a Petition to him by two Peers, and three Commissioners, wherein in very humble terms they defied his Majesty to stay at some conveniency place not far from London, till such time as Committees of Parliament might attend him, with some Propositions for the removal of the present Distempers, the King liked well of this Petition, and sent back the Messengers with a very complying answer, signifying, that he would reside at his Castle at Windsor, or any other place if that should not be liked, till such time as Committees might be sent to him: but the same night that he had dispatched these Messengers, news was brought that Eves had advanced with his Army, and the Artillery towards him, and that having possess’d himself of Windsor, Kingston, and Alton, if Brentford were likewise possess’d, the Kings Army would be so frightned, that it could neither well move nor stand, whereupon a Council of War being called, it was resolved that part of the army should advance, & dispossess the enemy from Brentford, which was accordingly done, & thereof was for some time a very sharp fight betwixt the Kings forces and those of the Parliament that were there lodged, but the Kings party prevailed, killed the Commander in chief then present, and several others, and took 500 prisoners, and as many arms, with 15 pieces of Ordnance, 11 Colours and store of Ammunition; and the King wastold the next day to have marched to London, had not advice come that both the remainder of that Army under Eves, & the Auxiliaries of London under the Earl of Warwick, were drawn upon Turnham-Green to oppose his marching further, whereupon he called his Troops over Kingham-Bridge to Oatlands, and from thence to Redditch, where he left a good Garrison, and marched with his forces to Oxford.

The City of London were very much intriguated by some incendians upon this action of the Kings, and were wroght upon to petition the Parliament to proceed no further in the business of accommodation for which they had the thanks of both Houses, though the Parliament in a Message to the King, did confed that they gave direction to the Earl of Eves to draw the Army out of London, and that part of it was quartered at Brentford, whilist the Committee was with the King, but they endeavoured to excite it, by saying, that they sent a Messenger with a Letter to know whether his Majesty intended forbearance of hostilities, who found the parties in fight, and could not pass.

The Kings forces in the North, became very considerable, the Earl of Newcastle, and the Earl of Cumberland being joined, made up 8000 Horse and foot, and their power daily increased, so that the Lord Fairfax and his Son Sir Thomas, Captain Hobham, Sir Hugh Cholmer, Sir Edward Lofus, Sir Matthew Brownet, Sir Henry Anderson and others who commanded for the Parliament in these parts were unable to withbade them, and the Kings side received a good addition of strength in those parts by the landing of Colonne Goring at Newfoundland with two hundred Commanders from Holland, and other provisions of War, which made the Lord Fairfax and those with him impotent to move against the Parliament, and they thereof formed an association of the Counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, Cambridgeshire, the Isle of Ely, and the City of Norwich, whereof the Lord Grey of Warke was by commission of the Earl of Essex made Commander in chief, with authority to raise Forces.

In February General King a Scotch Commander of great experience in military affairs, came out of Holland, landed at Newfie/le, joined himself with the Earl of Newfie/le, and passed to York with 6000 Arms. In the same Moneth also, the Queen landed from Holland at Barlington-Bays, with great Provision of Arms and Ammunition, and many Commanders of note in her Retinue, and was conveyed by the Earl of Newfie/le to the City of York, to which place, the Earl of Monsr/lo, and the Lord Gody to came to her out of Scotland with 150 Horse; and Sir Hugh Colomye, who had the Government of Scarborough for the Parliament, declar'd for the King, and prefented himself at York with 300 men to the Queen for his Service; Sir John Hotham alfo and his Son, were at the same time inclin'd to defect the Parliament's cause, but their intentions were discover'd, and they were both feized upon at Hull, and sent up to London, where they long remained Prisoners in the Tower, before the time of their Tryal and execution.

The Parliament having fortified Gloucester with a good Garrison, thought of inlarging their quarters towards Oxford, and had in order thereunto, drawn a great strength into Cirencefler, the King was not well pleas'd with this neighbour-hood, but ordered Prince Rupert with 4000 Horse and foot, to take the Town, who marching by as if he intended to attempt Sudley Fields, (which had been lately taken before by Mr. Massey,) when they expected him not, turn'd his whole force upon them, and after about an hours resistance made himself Master of the place, where he took eleven hundred prisoners, and three thousand Arms.

The King was not so asxacted by these insuccesse to be well pleas'd with a War, that brought to much calamity to his people, and therefore he propos'd a Treaty to the Parliament, to which after many delays they consented, and about the beginning of March, the Earl of Northumberland, Mr. Pierpoint, Sir William Ermin, Sir John Holland, and Mr. Bulstrode Whitlock attended him at Oxford with propositions of Peace; but they were such as rather did but fee a conquering than a losing side, yet the King being resolv'd to treat upon them; howsoever, he found the Commissioners too scrupulous in time, and to dy to such particular insuffacions as the Housers had given them, that nothing could be yielded to which might conduque to the composing of the present diftemper, so that after many meetings betwixt London and Oxford, the Parliament sent to their Commissioners to return to London upon the 17th of April, upon which the Earl of Essex immediately advanced with his Army to besiege Redding then a Garrison for the King.

The King upon the first notice sent a supply of 700 Musketeers to the Town, and some more of Ammunition, but all could not avail to the holding out of the Town againt so great an Army, continually supply'd from London with fresh men, provisions and ammunition.

The King therefore after a while sent a good body of Horse and Foot to relieve the Town, who asaffles a quarter of the Parliament's Army at Caufam Bridge within a mile of it, where many of the King's Forces were slain, and forced to retreat, but those in the Garrison were thought to have failed in performance of their duty, in not drawing out a sufficient party to have made a diversion at the same time, but the failure herein, was imputed to Colonne Fielding then Lieutenant Governor for Sir Arthur Aston the Governor, who was disabiled from service by a brace or wound he had received in the siege, so that within 16 days of Essex his first stirring down before the Town, it was render'd to him upon Terms, but honourable enough viz. All the Forces to march out in War-like manner with 50 Carts for carriage, free passage to Oxford, the Town to be paid from plunder, and that whosoever would, might have liberty to leave it within six weeks after.

The Town of Redding was infested with a pestifential Fever when Essex enter'd it, which cause a great sicknede and mortality amongst his Soldiers, besides which, they were much discontented for want of pay, so that when he removed to Caufam Hooke to avoid the infection, many of his Soldiers unanimously disbanded and went away; but though he gain'd nothing by this Town, the murmur at Oxford was great for the loosing of it, and Colonne Fielding was accused of treachery therein, and being found guilty by a Court martial, was sentenced to be first to death, but by the Kings clemency he was pardoned.

About this time force every County of England was free from the War, and in most places the Kings parties were victorious; In Yorkshire, Northamptonshire, and Staffordshire, many encounters past betwixt the Kings Forces under Prince Rupert and the Earl of Northampton routing the Parliament's Forces by himself at Lichfield, which was afterward taken by his Soldiers, and again retaken by Prince Rupert.

In the west more Northern parts, the Lord Fairfax and his Son did take some Towns, and do more than could be expected from so little force, but after a while, the whole Coun- try was subdued by the Kings Arms, and they were forced into Hull.

The greatest part of Water was for the King, but to prevent the increase of his good fortune the Earl of Stamford was sent with an Army into the West, where Sir Ralph Hopton, with some Forces of the Kings, lay before Plimouth then a Garrison for the Parliament, but upon the Earls Stamford's advance, he drew from thence, and fought and defeated a great part of the Earls Forces; after Sir Ralph this a truce was made betwixt the Earl and Sir Hopton. Ralph Ralph Hopton for twenty days, and in the mean time Sir George Cudleigh who had been very active and successful for the Parliament in Devonshire, began to reflect upon his past actions, and by considering the pretences of both parties, resolved with himself not to hazard his life and reputation, but upon what he thought a mift just cause, and hereupon he quitte his sde, and joyned with the Kings Forces, but to satisfy his friends with the reason of his doing he publish'd a short declaration to this effect.

That Petitions of Right are commendable, and Remonstrances may be lawful, but Arms, though defensive, are very doubtful. My Lot (faith he) fell to be cast on the Parliament side, by a strong opinion of the goodness of their Cause, which to my judgement then appeared to be so; Religion and the Subjects Liberty seemed to me to be in danger, but the deforation of Kingdoms cannot be the way to save it, nor can the joys of Christian Subjects, nor the Subjects joys of their Estates by Plunder or Affrayment concur with Piety, nor yet with property: as for Religion, which is the chief Majesty (and God's preserve) hath given us unanswerable Security. I have lost my right, my merit, my glories, I have given you a pardon. I will content no more in word or deed: And this my Resolution with the unspeakable ground thereof, I thought good to declare to my friends and Country-men, that they may understand my change so proceed from no compulsion.

This addition of strength was very advantageus to the King; for shortly after a Buttall fought at Stratton in Cornwall, the Earl of Stameford was overthrown, and it seemed to betake himself to the City of Exeter, whither Sir Ralph and Sir George Cudleigh, with the Devon-shire and Cornish Forces followed him, and with part of their Troops so thwirteened it, that they had opportunity to employ the main body of their Army in other Service, which with the conjunction of the Matquefs of Harryford who had raised many Regiments, the greatest part of the West was reduced to the Kings obedience. Bristol was design'd to be the seat on for the King before the beginning of May, by one Mr. Robert Tzemsam, late Sheriff of the City, and William Tzemsam his Brother, with Mr. George Burches, and Mr. Edward Dovers, and some others of their friends who had Composition from the King to like Forces, & posseffe themselves of the Town; and for the better enabling them thereunto, Prince Rupert hov'd thereabouts with a party of 5000 men, but the raising and raising of Souland made the matter so communicative, that it was discovered to the Governor, who caus'd the four above-menion'd to be seiz'd on, and try'd by a Court Martial, who condemn'd them all, and Robert Tzemsam and Burches were on the 30th of May executed, and the like fate happen'd to some worthy Gentlemen and other eminent Citizens of London, who intended to have conceived a mean to have put an end to the present War, by toppling the Amours of it in the Fountain, by securing the City of London, and seiz'ing several members of Parliament. It was detected by one for a Savant to Mr. Tomkins, on the 16th day of May; the chief Aeters were, Mr. Edmund Waller a Member of the House of Commons, Mr. Tomkins, Mr. Chaloner, Mr. Hafell, Mr. White, and Mr. Bingham, who were to be strengthen'd in their endeavours by the Kings Commandment of Ar- ray brought to London privately by the Lady Au- bigny: but upon this detection, all was blasph'd, and the parties before named, were all tried by a Court Martial at Guild-Hall, and condemned, whereof Mr. Tomkins and Mr. Chaloner were on the 5th of July executed; Mr. Waller after a year imprisonment in the Tower, paid a fine of ten thousand pounds, and was for ten years banished into France.

Sir William Waller about the time of Edge-Hill Fight, had received a Commission to be Colone of a Regiment of Horse, and had gained a very great reputation with the Parliament and the City of London, for some service he did that Winter with Coloneff Short, Coloneff Browne, and some others in the taking of Chicksgill, and handing levies for the King in Suffry, to that he was furnish'd with an Army this Spring, with which he did many acceptable Services to his party in Wiltfsire, Gloucefifer, Monmouth, and Hereford-fhire, wherein he took many Towns and fortified by the King's Souldiers, and was very successful, but whilst he was active in those parts, the Parliament prefed the Earl of Effex to march towards Oxford to streighten that Garrison, and take some order by the conjunction of the forces of the associates, to hinder Prince Rupert joynig with the Queen; In protection whereof, he march'd with his Army to those parts of Buckingham-fhire which were neerer to Oxford, and sett'd his head quarters at Thame; upon his com- ing thither, the weather was very unfeatable, and great rains fell, so that his Souldiers became very weak and sickly, and much mortality ensued; but to put a good face upon his condition, he frequently sent out parties upon several occasions, though little or no service was at any time perform'd by them, but about the sixteenth of June, intelligence came to Oxford that a great party of Parliamenters were then quartered at Pritwood and Chisew in Oxford-fhire towards Thame, and Prince Rupert was out on a good party to attack them in their quarters, which he did, and took many Prisoners, but upon the Alarm, Col- lonel Handels, with Sheffield and others of Ef- fex his Army, drew into Chalgrove-Fielde, with design to fight the Prince, where he drew tow- ers them, and after a brisk charge or two, he routed them, and took many Prisoners, and hor- ses and armorial armour, many, Major Gunter was shot dead upon the place, and Colonneff Sheffield and Mr. Handels were both very much wound- ed, of which the last died three or four days after, it being observed, That he received his wounds in that field where he first executed the Parliaments Commission for the Milities, against the Kings authority; upon this affront Effex draws his Army off to Briftol, with a purpose to recruit his Regiments with some forces from the neighbouring Counties, but they were too much biusy to spare any assistance. About this time (a little before) the Parliament resolued upon a very extraordinary action which was the making of a new great Seal, it had some opposition in the debate, but by a majority of voices in both houses,
The Reign of King Charles the First.

With the Earl of Carversford and Prince Maurice, with the Earl of Carversford and Prince Maurice, and a good strength of Horie were sent from Oxford to join with him, Sir William Waller was come to Bath with his Army, with whom Sir Edward Hangerford, Sir John Hornor, and Mr. Strade were joined, and they marched towards Sir Ralph Hopton, and came so near him, that on the third and fourth of July some skirmishes had past betwixt some parties of each side, and prisoners were taken of both parties, but on Wednesday the 5th of July the two Armies engaged at a place called London Down, about eight miles from Bristol, and the fight was maintained betwixt them from two in the afternoon till one on the next morning, at which time the Parliamentarians left the field, and the Kings party had gained a great Victory, if by accident their Ammunition had not blown up, whereby two Captains were slain, and above twenty wounded, whereof Sir Ralph Hopton himself was one, &c.

In the barlet Sir Brtit Greenville a person of great renown & integrity to the KingsCause was slain, together with Mr. Leck a hopeful young Gentleman Son to the Earl of Scarsdale, who was found dead in the field with the Colours of the enemy about his arm, as also one Lieutenant Colonel, one Major, and two Captains; what Officers fell on the Parliaments side was not known, because the publishers of such actions were unwilling to be very particular in their relations that they might not too much discourage their party.

Waller being advertised of what had happened having got some freth men from Bristol marched after Hopton, hoping to ingage him before he could get Ammunition to defend himself, so that he was forced to retire to the Devonster Town in Wilts, & there he was by Hopton block'd up, and after a while he became so distressed that he began to treat about the surrender of it, (for Prince Maurice was with the Horie retired towards Oxford) but immediately the fortune of War changed, for the King having notice of Hoptons condition, sent Commissary Wilmot with the Earl of Carversford and Crawford's Regiments of Horie and others to the number of fifteen hundred to relieve him; upon whose approach near to Sir William Waller, he drew off to a place called Roundway Down, where the Horie began the fight, but after a while both Horie and Foot encountered each other, and Wallers Army was to der it was beaten in Lincs. & unlike; and four brass Guns, and all the Ammunition and Baggage were taken, with nine Cornets of Horie, and eight and twenty Colours of Foot; Sir Arthur Haystreg was wounded, and many other Officers, and a great number of Soldiers killed; and this Victory was obtained on the 3rd of July, on the same day whereat the King met the Queen at Edgefield, where the fifth Battel betwixt him and the Earl of Evesham, had been fought as was before mentioned; their meeting after so long abstinence and on so far an occasion was very joyful to each other, they went that night to Sir Thomas Popes house at Wroxton; where they lay all night, and the next morning they came with the Prince, the Duke of York, and their Army with the Carriages and Ammunition to Woodstock and from thence to Oxford, where her coming was rather to a fol low

The Parliamentarians beaten at Dunington in Lincs.

The Articles of High Treason against the Queen.

1. That she had panned the Crown Jewels in Holland.
2. That she had favored the Rebellion in Ireland.
3. That she had endeavored to raise a party in Scotland against the Parliament; and that she had gone in the head of a Popish Army in England, for so they termed the Forces with her (though few or none of that Religion were among them) divers other Articles were framed against her; upon which Mr. Pym carried up an Impeachment to the Lords: they were (or seemed to be) at first surprised at so extraordinary a matter, but after some time they agreed to the Charge.

The successses of Sir William Waller gave so great a reputation to his Army that the King sent for his Western Forces towards Oxford to hinder the progress of his fortune; for it was feared at Oxford if he had not some check he might make himself master of Ludlow and Worcesters and so bring great tracts of Land and many considerable Garrisons into the power of the Parliament: Sir Ralph Hopton in pursuance of his Orders was marched into Shropshire and Prince Maurice, 1643.
The Reign of King Charles the First.

1643.

The King being willing to profit himself of this good access to his forces, ordered Prince Rupert to join himself with his Brother and the whole body of his strength in those parts and to march immediately to Bristol. Before which place he came on the four and twentieth of July, and summoned it to be surrendered to him. Colonel Nathaniel FitzRoy, then Governor of the City, who made a show of great resistance, but yet after three days it was surrendered upon the ensuing Articles.

1. That none of the citizens should be mistreated in their person or goods.
2. That every officer should march forth with his Arms.
3. That every trooper should ride out with his Horse and his sword.
4. That every soldier should march away with his Sword, Bag, and Baggage.
5. That no safe conveyance should be allowed for twenty miles.

A few days after the taking of this City, the King marched thither to see it and settle the affairs of those parts, whereupon presently after his arrival he received news of the surrender of Dr. checkbox, the Earl of Carnarvon, and a day or two after Portland, Yarmouth and Melcombe submitted to his forces, so that about this time the King was possessed of all the Western Counties, from the farthest part of Cornwall except some few Garrisons that were blocked up; and now or a little time after the Lord Fairfax and all his forces were defeated at Adersen Moor, and he and his army driven into Hull by the Earl of Newcastle: and from thence Northward even to the borders of Scotland there was no Army in the field to hinder the King and his forces from marching whither they pleased. London was then altogether unsatisfied, & many in it favoured the King, and most of the chief Gentlemen of the affiliated Counties were ready upon any appearance for the King to have secured those Counties to him, whereon it was expected that in this juncture of affairs the King would have marched with his Army to London, and the Earl of Newcastle with his into the affiliated Counties of Norfolk and Suffolk, whereby a sudden end would undoubtedly have been put to this Civil War, which was not only the opinion of those in the Kings quarters, but many at London and in the Parliament were of the same mind, and some of them desired the Parliament and submitted to the King, and others were on the point of quitting the Kingdom. But in the midst of these hopes the King against his own judgment was at a Council of War overruled to go to besiege Gloucester and a few days after the Earl of Newcastle left down before Hull. To this fatal City of Gloucester the King in person with his Army marched in the beginning of August, and about the 10th, he fell down before it, and by two Heralds summoned the City to be surrendered to him; to which summons within two hours an answer was drawn and conferred upon both by the Citizens and Soldiers, which was presented to the King by Major Podbery and one Toby Jordan a Citizen of the place, in these words:

"We the inhabitants, Magistrates, Officers, and Soldiers within this Garrison of Gloucester, unto his Majesty's graces, Mea- dox return this humble answer; I have we do keep this City according to our Oaths and Allegiances to and for the use of his Majesty and his Royal person. And do according-ly conceive our forces wholly bound to obey the Commands of his Majesty signified by such Heads of Parliament, and are ready by Gods help to keep this City accordingly.

The King received this answer without any expression of choler or indignation, seeming only to wonder at their confidence, for in all appearance they could have had no hope of relief, the whole number of Soldiers, Horse, foot, and Dragoons, together with the Train-Bands, and those Horse and Dragoons, which they on a sudden got from Barky Castle, amounted to less than fifteen hundred, forty barrels of powder was all their store, with a very mean and slender Artillery for such a service, and the works were of a great compass and little more than half perfected: so that it was generally believed, the King would rather preferly have attempted the Town by a storm, whilst they were yet in some confusion, than waited his time and sollicitled by a Siege; but by all the intelligence he could get, the Parliament was in no condition to send any forces to disturb him, and his Council of War thought it better to save his Infantry by a little expence of time, than by exposing the hazard of so many of their lives in an assault. So that a close Siege was made on all sides, though the first had been the wiser Counsel.

The Parliament were very much troubled at the news of this Siege, and used all the endeavours possibly to recruit Essex his broken Army for the relief of it; the first thing they did was to cause 2000 men to be pressed to strengthen some weak Companies, and upon a conference with the Committee of the Militia of the City of London, by consent of the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, they procured from thence two Regiments of the Train-Bands, three Regiments of Auxiliaries, and a Regiment of Horse, nor were they left mindful of the North, for the Army from Scotland which they had invited to their assistance could not be ready soon enough to secure these parts, wherefore they passed an Ordinance for the speedy press of 2000 men to be raised out of the six Affected Counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, Cambridge, Hants, and Huntingdon, to be put under the Command of the Earl of Manchester. In preparation whereunto Colonel Oliver Cromwell was very active, he had the year before the Command of a Troop of Horse, with which he secured the Town of Cambridge, and obstructed many Levies for the King in Cambridgeshire, Essex, Suffolk, and Norfolk; but sometime before this he had a Commission to be a Colonel, and by authority thereof he raised a Regiment of Horse consisting of a thousand, with which he was employed in several of the Northern parts of England, where he joined as occu-
The Reign of King Charles the First.

The three and the fourth of this new Army to attempt to change the whole Discipline of the Parliaments Militia, for having observed that the King's Horse, who were his greatest strength consisted of Gentlemen, or the servants of such, and that these led by a sense of Honour, did in most encounters want their enemies, he believed if the Parliament Horse could be framed of the most zealous of their party, such as were persuaded by the preaching of the Ministers that the Cause was God's Cause, and that all their religious Liberties were at stake in it, and those that died therein died in the favour of God, and in assurance of Salvation, they might let this sense of Confidence against the other sense of Honour, and be in better hopes of success than before; and this method he put in practice as far as he could in the new raised forces before mentioned, whereas most of the Officers were great zealots, and the Southerns by degrees became of the same leven, and those were they that effected afterwards what he hoped for from them.

On the 24th of August the Earl of Essex drew all his Army together to Hounslow, where almost all the Members of both Houses of Parliament were present, the remainder of the old Army was well recruited, and he had got some additional Regiments of Horse besides the Horse and Foot he had from the City, which made a gallant appearance. That night he marched to Colnbrook, where he flaid a day for some more men that were to come to him, and then he marched to Becknysted, and so forward to Beterston, where he cloathed his Army, and marched on.

The King thought it scarce credible that an Army could have been so soon got together, but since it was so, he sent out parties to obstruct their march, but they marched so close, and in so good order, that his little detachment could be easily got up to his progress; so that by the fifth of September he came to Preshy Hills, where he drew up his whole Army in view of the City, and discharged four pieces of great Ordnance to give them notice of his approach, which was at a time when the King's forces were prepared ready for a storm, the besieged in want, and their Ammunition confined to three Barrels of powder; but upon consultation had the King by the General Officers, it was resolved the Army should draw off, which was done, and all their Huts were set on fire. Essex marched thence to Cheltenham, and stayed there two days, and from thence on the 8th of September he went with his whole Army to Gloucester, where he flaid two nights till he had furnished the City with Ammunition, money, and other necessaries; and from thence marched to Tewksbury, passing between the Kings forces and that Garrison four days, to give them more time the better to furnish themselves with Victuals, whilst he flayed there he had advice that a body of the Kings Army were then in Cirencester Castle, and there had laid in great stores of Provision; upon which advertisement, want of Victuals and necessaries increasing upon his whole Army, he made a long march with the Van-guard of his Troops to fall upon them, which he did about one of the Clock in the morning, finding in a part of Horse to seize upon the Centinels and Guards, whilst himself with the rest of the Horse besieged the Town, and a Forborn-hope of Foot with his own Foot Regiment entered into it, and surprised two Regiments of Horse (belonging to Sir Nicholas Crispe and Colonel Spencer) here he found thirty load of provision, which proved a great relief to his Army, than in extreme distress for want thereof. Having proved successful in this encounter, he by short marches pushed from thence to Cirencet, so to Sandford, intending to pass thence to Hungerford, but passing over Oaken Chace, Prince Rupert with the greatest part of the Kings Horse charged the whole Army by two commanded parties, one under the Lord Sermon, and the other under Colonel Folly, who performed their duties so well, that many great Bodies of Essex' Horse and Foot were dispersed; little loss to the Kings Soldiers or Officers, favoring the House of de la Vicomtesse, a young French Nobleman, who was a very brave and Generous Cavalier, and unfortunately slain.

Essex from thence marched to Hungerford, and the Prince sent an express to the King then at Wanshage, desiring him to advance with all haste to Newbury, the better to hinder Essex's march to London, which was the thing he chiefly endeavored. The King was glad of the advice, and in pursuance of it he marched away to Newbury, where he got before Essex; the next day the Parliament Army marched from Hungerford toward Newbury, but hearing the Kings forces had possest the Town, they lay that night in the field, but the next morning by break of day Essex gave orders to march to a hill, called Bigg hill near Newbury, which with some struggle he gained, but the Forlorn of the Kings Army by endeavouring to hinder him so advantageous a place, did hinder the fight, which was very vigorously prosecuted on both sides till night came on, that both parties drew off. The next day Essex found his way open towards Reading, so that although the loss was equal to both Armies (saving that as the quality of the Commanders were greater on the Kings side, more eminent Persons of that party were slain) yet the Victory was allowed to the Parliament Army, because they gained thereby their way to London, from which the King strove to hinder them. The number of the slain in this Battle is not recorded, Captain Marney, Captain Hans, and divers other Officers of Essex' Army were killed, but no of higher rank than Captains; three of the Nobility fell on the Kings side, the Earl of Carnarvon, the Earl of Sunderland, and the Lord Fauconry. After this Fight the King marched to Oxford, and the Earl of Essex drew his Army to Reading, and from thence to the Towns and Villages near London, but the King on the 3d. of October finding Reading free placed a good Garrison in it.

The Gentlemen of Norfolk hearing the great success of the Marque's of Newcastle in Farke-shire, did expect his march into that and the rest of the associated Counties, and in confidence thereof, they feiz'd on Ley, and put a Garrison.
into it for the King, but whilst the Marquis of Newcastle thought to take in Hul', before he left York-shire, the Earl of Manchester with Colliell Cowemul, and what Forces they could hitherto get together, marched into Norfolk, and befieged Lyn', which in defcription of relief after a few days was yielded to them, and to save the Town from plunder, the Earl 'imposed a fine upon the Inhabitants of 100. a man to every pri-ivate Souldier, and a Moneth pay to every Officer, which amounted to 30,000l. and a while after, namely on the eleventh of October, Sir John Meldrum march'd out of Hul', with two bodies of foot under the command of Colliell Lambert and Captain Rainforth, and fell upon the Mar-qulse of Newcastle's quarters before the Town, driving them from their Out-works & Trenches, where they kill'd fourscore of their Souldiers, and took 110 prisoners, and nine great pieces of Ordinance, and forced him elfe to retreat to Beverley, from whence afterward, all his Army march'd away, and left the Town free: yet Sir Thomas Fairfax and thole in the Town, were not in a condition to take the field, but Mechman was dispacht to London to solicit forces for to be sent to Hul' to make up an Army but in the meantime, the Earl of Newcastle having received great quantities of money, and forced to buy and bring to Scarcborough, need diligence to augment his Army to be able notably to oppose the Scots, which were very near ready to march into England, but to strengthen Ncwark, and the Kings other Garrisons in the Northern parts, whereof Lincolne and some others had been taken by the Earl of Manchester, whilst the Earl of New-castle's Army lay before Hall, and others had been much diftrustt; but whilst these things were acted in the North, many considerable occurrences happened in other parts, which deferee to be mentioned.

The King being moved with compassion of the sad condition of his Proclaim Subjectes in Ireland, for want of relief and supply of money, Manition, Arms, Provisions, Clothes, and all other necessaries: for the Parliament, who had undertaken the management of that War, and rais'd great fums of money for that end, employed the great-part of it in the War in England against the King, so that many of the English Souldiers, unable to endure the intempurable necessity that lay upon them, did many times feize on Ships, and force the Mariners to transport them to England, which being represented to the King, He in July this year, sent a Commission to the Marquise of Ormond then Lieutenant General of the English Army, to treat with the Irish for a celfation of Arms for one year, which after some time, upon the 15. of September was agreed to by both parties, and whilst this celfation was making in Ireland, the Kings Armies in the Western parts of England were very prosperous: insomuch that about the same time, or a little before, Biddiford, Appletford, Barnstable and Exeter, were surrendered to the King by the victorious arms of Prince Maurice, who from Exeter march'd to Dork-smouth, which place was on the fifth of October surrendered likewise to him, so that though the King was unfortunately prov'd with to lose the opportunity of ending the War, by befieging Gloucester and Hall, yet was his condition at this time much better than the year before; for whereas as a twelve moneth past, he had in all the West but the County of Cornwall, and in York-shire no more than that City and Pomfret Castle, and except at redding, Warwicke, and Astoning, not a Souldier quartered out of Oxford, nor a Ship nor Port except Newcastle and Fawmouth, and as the Parliament themselves publish'd, not ten thousand men in Arms, he had now five Armies in being, and was possessed of all the Western and Garrisons therein, except Plymouth, Lyn and Poole, and of all York-shire, Hall only excepted, and in Cheshire none but Nantwich stood out against him, and Wales was wholly His;
and though the Parliament got from him, Staff-ford, Worthington, Lyn, Lincolne, and some other inconsiderable Garrisons, the King in lieu of those gained from them, Saltnote, Cirencefter, Barming-ham, Lichfield, Stafford, Halifax, Wakefield, Dainton, Bristol, Bath, Dorchefters, Weymouth, Biddiford, Barnstable, Appletford, Tenby, Haverford-West, Pembroke and Exeter, and as to Gloucester, great care was taken to hinder excursions from that Garrison; Sir William Yarbo-fer was sent with a strong party of Horse to engage Sir William Modyf, who commanded the raile Forces, and to command in Chief in that County and Gloucefter-shire; Sudeley Castle was grated to the Lord Clifforde for the King, which Lord's flould Gloucester encounter with Warwick,
the only way of Commerce with London; Berkeley Castle was for the King maintained by a Scotch Captain. Sir John Winter was strongly fet in the Forrest of Dene, a Garrison was likewife put into Beverfon Castle, and indeed Garrisons there were in every corner of the County, besides several parties of the Kings Army which lay abroad in the Fields about it; so that Gloucester was al-much as much diftrustt as if it had been befieged, they being inforced to fight or skirniff for whatsoever they got. In the mean time, an additional supply of one thousand Foot, and one hundred Horse, under the command of Sir William St. Leger and Colliell Min, landed out of Ireland to the Kings aid, and were with eight pieces of Ordnance ordered to advance to Torbourn, the more to diftrust the City of Gloucefter.

The French King and the Queen Regent of France, seem'd very sensible of the Kings condition, and sent the Count de Harcourt (a Prince of the Houfe of Lorraine, and a great Souldier,) as Ambassador to the Houfe of England, to offer the mediation of France to compose the differences between the King and the Parliament; He came first to London, and addreft himself to both Houses for a safe conduct to Oxford to the King,which they granted, and on the 18. of October he made his entry into that City, and three days after, he had publick audience in the great Hall at Chrisfl's Church, where the King and Queen rec'd him with great State and Magnificence; and whilst he remained at Oxford, he and his retinue were lodg'd in St. John's Collidge, but finding himself unable to effecl any thing of his Embaffy after a few moneths stay, he returned. Sir William Walter who had lain long in London to forme an Army, had at laft got together fix thousand Horse and Foot, with which he was about this

The Reign of King Charles the First.

1643.

The time lain down before Basing-House, where he met with no better success than the King had at Gowerheer, but whilst he was there, the City put the Earl of Essex to besieging Riddel, but he found himself not in a condition for such a service, but marched to Windsor, and so to St. Albans, where he kept his head quarters, and sent our parties to several places to oppose the King's Forces, which were very active in many places, though not always fortunate; for about this time the Lord Widdrington with Collonei Henderson, and a good party of Horse and Foot, were met near Horse Castle in Lincolnshire, by the Parliament forces under the command of the Earl of Manchester, betwixt whom there was a sharp Fight, wherein Sir Ingram Hopson an Officer of the Kings, had once unhors'd Collonei Cromwell, but he was again quickly mounted, and the King's party put to the worst, and Sir Ingram Hopson and some few others were slain. The King shortly after this misfortune, was recompenced with the good news of 4000 English Foot landed in North-Wales, out of Ireland, under Sir Michael Ernley, who immediately after their landing, took in Hawarden Castle near Chester, and might afterwards have proved more serviceable as they were to the King, had they not been divided as they were into several parts of his Armies, but been kept together under their old and known Commanders.

The Scots promised to the Parliament (from whom Commissioners were sent to Edinburgh about that business,) that they would bring into England to their assistance, an Army consisting of one and twenty thousand Horse and Foot, towards the charge of raising whereof, the Parliament sent 10,000 l. into Scotland, and great Levies of men were made for this Army, which was now near drawn together, but some at Oxford had so good an opinion of the Scots, that they would hardly be brought to believe that they would invade England, till they saw them in the bowels of the Nation; for General Lefty with great imprudence upon himself, as has been before exprest in this History, preferred never to draw his sword against the King, but the ruling party in Scotland to facilitate the raising of this Army, had raised a report that the King was defeated by most of his Nobility.

The King resoping great trust in the Duke of Hamilton, had written to him to use all his power and interest to keep his Country-men at home, which had not been difficult for one of his credit in that Nation; but he by some secret Arts did more inflame them, and to cover his deceit, pretended to fly from Scotland to Oxford, where he came about the last of December, pretending to seek a shelter there for his loyalty, but the King had so good information of his practices in Scotland, that as soon as he came thither, he and the Earl of Lanierick his Brother, were both forbidden the Court, whereupon Lanierick got privately out of Oxford, and went to London, where he was well received, which increas'd the Kings ill opinion of his Brother, and he was sent prisoner to Pendennis Castle.

The King had on the 22d of December summons'd the Members of both Houses, who had defected those at Westminster to assemble at Oxford on the 22d of January following, where accordingly they met in the great Hall at Christ's Church, & after the King had made a short Speech to them, he delivered them to their Seates. The Lords sat in the upper School; and the Commons in the Convocation-House, and for their better welcome, he advanced Prince Rupert to the Title of Duke of Cumberland, and Earl of Holderness, and created James his second Son, Duke of York, by which name he had been appointed to be called at the time of his birth, that they might fit and vote amongst them. After they had sat for a while, by a letter they mov'd the Earl of Essex to endeavour peace, and did also declare against the Invasion of the Scots by another letter sent to them, in which they acquainted them with the fullness of their reports concerning the King, and shew'd how inconsiderable a number of Lords were with those that invited them in; the King himself writ also to them to put them in mind of their several ingagements to be quiet, but before those letters could come to Scotland, and indeed some days before the Parliament had assembled at Oxford, the Scots Army was marched into England, but when the letters came to the ruling party at Edinburgh, with a flange unheard of inofinence, they commanded them to be burnt by the hands of the Hangman, but the dishonour of that Nation was so great measure respected by the gallantry and faithfulness of the Marquess of Montrose, who about the time of this their Invasion, was made General Governor of Scotland, and with an incredible Industry by small numbers of men won many Battails, and overthrew well form'd Armies, whereof some relation shall be made hereafter, and had he not been betrayed by those he trusted, he had forc'd that people to Justice and quietness. Upon the entry of the Scotch Army into England a letter was writ from Barnick in the name of the Committee of both Kingdoms, subscribed by the Marquess of Argyle and Sir William Armine to Sir Thomas Glennam, who then lay at Anwick with 16 Troops of Horse, two Regiments of Foot, eight Drakes, and twenty pieces of Ordnance, which was to be communicated to the Gentlemen of Northumberland, wherein it was signified, That they came into England to protest the ends of the Covenant, namely, the Preservation and Reformation of Religion, the true honour and happiness of the King, and the publick peace and liberty of his Dominions, hoping that things of so great and so considerable consequence would find with him and them such entertainment as might answer the weight and importance of them: Adding, That if misinformation, or any Other unhappy Grounds should so far prevail with him and the rest, as to reckon them in the number of their enemies; and if instead of that concurrence with them which they wished and hoped to deferve, they found opposition and all of Hostility, the Law of Nature and their own reason, might tell them what they were to expect, Sir Thomas return'd an Answer to this Letter, to this purpose:

That there being none with him but Officers, he Sir Thomas could not return an answer so suddenly by their Officers, to the Commons or to the Tranquillers, but he said he would send to the Gentlemen of the County to give him a meeting, and thereupon they should receive an answer by a Tranquiller.

A Letter to Sir Thomas Glennam, delivering the request of their Armies march into England.
The Reign of King Charles the First.

About two of the Clock, the Moon then well up,

The Drum beat, and all marched. Hitherfo to hie marches been so speedy, as time it fell was prevented. Meldrum his Letter sent to the Lord Fairfax, for forwarding, which he is informed the night before; they had no more but an unaccredited Rumors of Prince Rupert's coming. On days March the Prince had notice by his e-spials how the enemies were busied all that mornin' in finding away their Cannons; which proved no other, than their drawing them off their

Batteries into their Chief work at the Spittle, or

Everet-House, a little more than Musket-shot from the Town; for into that one Quarter had this morning drawn all their Regiments and Ammanion. The Prince having intelligence of their smaliing themselves thus into one body,

which he suppos'd a preparation to match effi-dently; advanced his Van of Horse upon the part to overtake them: the rest of his Horse had o-der to keep along with the Foot, Cannon and Ammanion. Coming near the Beacon-hill a mile short of Newmark, he perceived some Horses of the enemies; who upon his approach,

drew down the other side to their Groin.

The Prince thus easily gaining the hill, was earn-

st to pierce his good fortune, upon his apprehension of having some advantages upon a retreating enemy; whereupon he gave order to charge

them with all the Horse then with him to ingage them till the Reard Foot the. If be matched up to him. Trooping his to the edge of the Hill, he perceived the molt of the enemy in Baltair, (Horfe and Foot) next the Spittle: all except four great Bodies of Horse, who expected him at the very decent of the Hill. The Prince thus ordered his own few forces; first himself with his own Troop of Life-Guards undertook to at-taque that Body on the left hand, appointing my Lord Longborow's Troop to second him, and

Colonel Charles Gerard's Troop to be as a Reserve a little on my Lords right hand. The Princes Regiment was cut out into five Divisions, two Troops to each Division: in the first and very right hand of all, were Captain Gardiner, and Captain Richardson; then Captain Cob, and

Captain Martin; then the Lord Grandison and

Sir Thomas Dafily, next them the Troops of Sir

Louis Dices, and the Lord Dillon; Major Legg

and Lieutenant Colonel. O Neals Troop being next unto the Life-Guards; this Regiment was seconced by Major General Porter's Regiment:

the Field-Word, was King and Queen; their Religion. The fight began about nine a Clock and after a while it grew fierce, especially on the Princes his right wing, the other doubling their

Files from three to six deep, and charged two

unfort Troops upon the Flanks to hard, that Capt.

Martin came timely in to help to beat them off;

the Prince himself having pierced deep into the enemies, and being observed and known, was dangorously at once assaulted by three furious Persons, whereof one fell by his own sword; a record being pitifol'd by Master Mersigne one of his own Gentlemen; the third now ready take hand on the Princes collar, had it almost chopp'd of by Sir William Neal; he thus dis-engaged with a shot only in his Gunel, with Sir Richard

Cram and his own Troop charged, quite through the Body, piercing them in a Rout home to their

Cc 2 Works
Works at the Spittle, pretty after this, his Regiment with their Seconds likewise routed the three other bodies, four of the Troops charging even into the Work, and bringing away a Captain prisoner; Longborough also deporting himself honorably, some of his men making a second Charge, but he himself rode back to rally and bring them up again: Colonel Gerard was shot in the arm in this encounter, and being by the fall of his horse much bruised, was taken prisoner.

After a little pause both sides began to make ready for a second Charge; the Prince to make impression, and they to receive it: and though for a while it was disputed roughly, yet by fine force were they and all the rest driven quite out of the field beyond their own work, Foot and Cannon at the Spittle; divers of them having by a Bridge of Boats over that branch of the Trent into the Iland; four other Troops, with as many foot Companies halted up to Meukambridge upon the other side of the Iland, and main stream of the River, about three quarters of a mile both from Newark and the Spittle: here they stayed till evening; when breaking the Bridge behind them, and throwing one piece of Cannon into the Trent, they halted to Nottingham.

In both these fight boats, the Prince took five Cornets, and ninety Prisoners, whereas three Captains, some Gentleman, three Cornets, besides other Officers, and two Cañonniers. And now as if an universal Truce had been agreed upon, there was some half an hours silence, excepting that the enemies Cannon disturbed it. As for the Prince he now slewed for his Foot and the Reer of his Horse, both left full two miles behinde, when his Van began to double their march to overtake the enemy; anon came up his Foot, all that day commanded by Colonel Tillier; these resting themselves a while upon the hill, the first division being part of those that came from Strensham, were led on by the Colonel; these marched down in the face of the enemy, hoisting at their Cannon, and flanked with some Horse, they were wheeled to the right into a Meadow; at their coming, the enemy drew all their Horse and Foot within their Spiritework, and coming up against this place, both sides faluted one another at too far a distance with a short volley; but Colonel Tillier was not to play here, as being by his Orders to march up to the very Rivers side, to recover the Boat-bridge from the enemy, but this being too well guarded, he was glad to go off, making a stand without reach of Cannon. In this time were divers more bodies brought down into the field, who charged up to the enemies work, and killed many; Longborough men being left upon the hill for a reserve. Thus was the valley bespurred with the Princes Battalions: and in this posture (ood the Army, Sir Richard Byron Governor of Newark likewise before this, had sent part of his Garrison both (Horse and Foot) into another ground on the South-east side of the Town. And by this time had the Prince notice given him by a Prisoner, and by one of theirs that came over to him, how they were to be distrest for want of Victuals, that they were not able to live there two days. Whereupon he began to resolve upon other Counts, efteming it cheaper to block up their trenches than to form them. And block up they were already in a very narrow room, no more being free than the backside of the Spittle towards the River. Besides which they were upon all sides surrounded by his forces. On the South side being by Town Cowley, on East by the Prince; and on the North by Colonel Tilieu. Into the Iland on the West, had the Prince sent five hundred Horne, besides 200 of the Newark Troopers. Thus the late blockers found themselves now besieged, and without much hope of sudden relief, or safe means for safety; for so well had the Prince ordered them, that had they sallied forwards, he had then fallen upon their first sifting out, both in front, and flanks with his Army, and the Town had charged them upon their Reer. Had they offered to escape over their Boat bridge, those in the Ile had disturbed their passing, and others entertained their coming over.

By this time had the Prince commanded Sir Richard Byron with his own, and Sir Gervase Eyres Horse Regiment with 800 of Sir John Diglote foot, to advance so high into the Iland, as to put in between the enemies two Bridges. By which interposition was all intercourse cut off, but between their greater Body at the Spittle, and those at Meukam-Bridge: upon that those eight Colours at the Bridge retreated, as aforefaid. Under favor of those Town forces too, was the Prince resolved to call up a Redoubt that night between the Bridges, but going to view the Ground, the enemy sent out a Trumpet to desire a Parley. To make way for this, and the more to sweeten and oblige the Prince, had Sir John Meldrum some hours before sent home Colonel Gerard, yet upon the Parole of a Souldier and a Gentleman, to return himself a Prisoner when ever he should be called. They having sent out to Parley quit their bridge, which the Prince presently possessed by 100 Musquetiers. For the Parley on the Prince his part was appointed Sir Richard Crane, Captain of his Life Guards, with Sir William Neute, Scout-Miller-General, the other sinding Sir Miles Hobard, and Sir John Palgrave two Colonels of Norfolk, on their part. The Prince his Horse were so overmatched, and the Foot beaten off their Leggs by long marches, that he found his men not very able to engage a new, and the enemy were more than was believed; to that he was willing to give them good conditions, and the rather, for the (as by intercepted Letters appeared) the Lord Fairfax and his Son Sir Thomas, being commanded by the Council of State to march, other places might ere long have need of his presence, to do that (at length) he condescended to these Articles.

1. That all March, Bullet, Powder, Cannon, and all other fire Arms belonging to the Artillery be delivered.

2. That all Souldiers march away with their Swords by their sides, and Colours and Drums.

3. That all Officers march without molestation, with their Arms and Horses for themselves and Servants, and all Bag and Baggage, Money, and whatsoever due truly belong to themselves.

4. That all Troopers and Dragoons march with their Swords, Horses, and Colours.

5. That
5. That His Highness send a Convoy to provide it with any injury two miles from the mouth of Sir John Meldrum's quarters.

Dated March 22. 1643.

Upon this Victory of the Prince, the Garrisons of Gainsborough, Lincoln, and Stamford, were assailed by the Parliamentarians, and Sir John Meldrum, Governor of Newport, and Sir John Waller,Governor of the Town, sent for the Prince to march to York, but on the 11th of April, when they came near Selby, (where Colonel Belasyse lay with a good body of Men, as a refuge for the Marquess of Newcastle) they drew before the Town, and about eleven of the Clock they assaulted it in three places, & after two hours fight, made themselves masters thereof, wherein they took Colonel Belasyse the Commander in Chief, Governor of York, with most of the rest of the Officers, and sixteen hundred common Soldiers, a Drake, and a Saker, seven barrels of Powder, sixteen bundles of Match, great fores of Bullets, and two thousand Ammunition; immediately upon this success, the Marquess of Newcastle retreated to York, to infirce that Garrison, in case any attempt should be made upon it; and Fairfax marched to meet the Scots, and joined his Army with theirs at Wetherby, from whence they disposed themselves to quarters till a resolution should be taken for further action: In the meantime, the Queen being great with child at Oxford, and somewhat apprehensive of a siege there by the Earl of Essex and Sir William Walker, which was the common intelligence of that time, to prevent the inconveniences thereof, set out from Oxford on the 17th of April towards Exeter, where she arrived some time after; and two days after her departure from Oxford, the Parliamentarian convention at Oxford were by the King prorogued to the eighth of October, and that prorogation was afterward enlarged to the ninth of November by proclamation. Prince Rupert was very active in Shropshire, Cheshire, Staffordshire and Lancashire, to make an Army sufficient to relieve the Marquess of Newcastle, who was somewhat strengthened in Yorkshire by the Parliament Forces, where he had done very good service in taking many Garrisons from the Enemy, as Longford House, and Tonge Castle in Shropshire, Staffordshire, and Bolton in Lancashire, besides the relief of Latham House, (which had been 18 weeks defended by the Countesse of Derby against a close siege) and the relief of many Garrisons that encountered him or his Forces at several times, but we shall leave him for a while to speak of the King's condition at this time.

The Parliament having formed two Armies, whereof the Foot were the most part made up of London Trained-Bands and Auxiliaries, one under the Earl of Essex, and the other under Sir William Walker, who were rendezvoused on the 24th of May at Bellboy in Berkshire, and kept their head-quarters that night at Abingdon within five miles of Oxford, where they continued five or six days, and Essex marched from thence to Ipswich, with purpose to disperse Oxford on the North part, and left Sir William Walker at Abingdon on the South part.

The King perceiving the Parliaments intentions to besiege Oxford, was resolved to endeavour to prevent it, by giving their Armies some distant diversion, or at least to remove their peril from the inconveniencies of a siege: The place resolved to go to, was Plymouth, which he kept for his private, that scarce any know of it but himself, and...
The Reign of King Charles the First.

The king marches to Buckingham, where he receives the news of the birth of Prince Henry at Leicester.

To amuse the enemy, on the third of June, he sent a body of five of six hundred Horse, under the command of the Earl of Clavering, to alarm Atchison, who bravely entered the Turretpulse, and if he had more forces, might have carried the Town, but having done his business, he retreated with his Party to Oxford, while Waller drew his troops about Atchison, expecting the Kings march that way, but he that evening appeared Ransden on Northby, about eight miles from Oxford, where he drew up his Army, consisting of about 7000 Horse and Foot, 12 Drakes, and 60 Carriages, and having refreshed himself at one Mr. Parres House there, from whence he marched to Burton-on-the-Water's Village between Burton and Stow on the Wolds, and there lodged at Dr. Temple's the Parson there.

From Burton the King went to PurIShore, and from thence to Worcester.

Effex and Waller having notice of the Kings march 18 hours after he was gone, pursued him two several miles; Effex was in some trouble to know what to do, considering that fighting would not so much waste his men, as tedious marches after the Kings light Army. With this he was concerned with a heavy train of Artillery, so that he thought it more prudent to put Waller upon this service, and to stay for him at Burton to consult about the prosecution of it. At Burton it was resolved that Effex should march Westward, to bring those Counties into the obedience of the Parliament, while Waller should get what Forces he could together, to join with him in pursuit of the King, who was yet at Worcester, from whence on the 1st. of June he sent a party out to relieve Dudley Castle that was besieged, and having intelligence that the Parliament Armies were now sever'd, and hearing that Waller came nearer by tedious and hungry marches, the King advanced to Budeley, where he layed four days, and Waller imagining his intention to be to march towards Prince Rupert, inferred into Staffordshire to get before him, but the King turns back with resolution to be famish'd with more men and ammunition from Oxford, and in order thereto on the 13th. of June he came to Witney, where he laid toll some forces came to increase his Army, and being as well provided as he could in so short a time; He march'd towards the Parliament associated Counties, and on the 27th. of June he came to Buckingham, where he received the joyful news of the Queen safe delivery of the Kings Rease, puts over 2000 Horse, with a great body of Foot, and 14 pieces of Cannon, sufficient as he thought to disorder it. The Kings Rease consisted of the Earl of Clavering, and the Earl of Northampton's Brigades of Horse, and Sir Bernard Ashley's regiment of Foot; These fact'd about, and routed all of the Enemy that had pass'd the Bridge, and the Earl of Northampton seeing Waller some of Waller's horse advancing to ford the River, charg'd and repuls'd them; In this fight or 300 of Waller's Soldiers were slain, and several of their General of the Ordinance was taken prisoners, with two Lieutenant Colonels, three Captains, two Lieutenants, four Corners, with other Ensigns and Officers, 18 common Soldiers, five Gunners, and fourteen great Guns. There was slain on the Kings part, Sir William Butler, and Sir William Clarke, the Lord Williams General of the Horse, was twice Prisoner, but rescued once by Sir Frederick Cornwellis, and the second time by Mr. Robert Howard, who was knighted for the service of that day, Colonel Newell was also hurt, and some other Officers and others were taken Prisoners; but there were not above twenty slain.

The King marched to Exeter after this fight, from whence he sent a message to the Parliament to invite them to a Treaty of Peace, and from thence he went to Bath. Sir William Waller was not in a condition to follow him, but after some time, he went to London to solicit recruits whilst the King marched after Effex into the west. In the beginning of this Moneth, Prince Rupert marched out of Lancashire with a considerable Army for the relief of York, wherein the Marquess of Newcastle had been besieged two months by three Armies under the command of the Earl of Manchester, the Lord Fairfax and General Leffey; they all upon the request of the Prince, drew of their Army, and therupon the Prince and the Marquess of Newcastle marched after them to a plain called Marlborough, where on the third of July, a terrible Battle began, in which the Prince at first had much the better, taking their Ordinance, and many of them Prisoners, information that General Leffey and the Lord Fairfax thinking all had been lost, fled many miles while the Battall was fought, and never came to the remainder of their Army, till two days after the Fight; but in conclusion, (whether by fate that attends the event of War, or by neglet, I know not) the fortune of the day turned, and the Parliament Forces recovered their lost Ordnance, and took some of the Princes Baggage, and with it Charles Lucas, Collo nell Porter, and Collo nell Tildard Prisoners. In this Battall were slain on his Majesties part, the Lord Cary, Sir Thomas Metham, Collo nell Ewe, Collo nell Towneley, with some others of note, and about 3000 common Soldiers. On the Parliament part were slain Sir Charles Fairfax, with many other of their Commanders, and at least 3000 Soldiers.

After this Battall the Parliament Army fell down again before York, and Prince Rupert marched away with about 6000 Horse and Dragoons into Lancashire, and from thence to Chester, but the Marquess of Newcastle, and the two Sons, General King, the Lord Falmouth, the Lord
The Parliament Army had now lain twelve days before York, since their last approach to it, and preparation was made for a storm; but Sir Thomas Glemham the Governor sent a Trumpeter out late at night for a Parley, for his Proposals and Ammunition was much wanted, and he had not above 1000 Soldiers beside those that were sick and wounded to defend the Town: So that upon the 16th of July the City was thundred upon very honourable terms, amongst which the two or three first were, That all Officers and Soldiers should march out with their Horses and Arms, flying Colours, Drums beating, Marches lighted, Bulletts in mouth, with Bag and Baggages, and a Carroty to Slipknot, and that of Soldiers fhot at London; But the Soldiers that were to guard them, in violation of these conditions, plundered many of the Wagons, at which the Earl of Manchester and Cromwell were so much displeased, that many of them were cenured at a Court Martial, but little restitution was made, and most of them that were accused, agreed in one excuse, viz. That they never heard it was any part of the agreement, that they should march away, and be protected with their Bagg and Baggages, and that many of Sir Thomas Glemham's Soldiers fent them on to plunder, discovering to them which were the Wagons of Papists, in rifeling whereof they affifted and got their share.

Having endeavoured hitherto in the actions of this year, to apply them to the times whereas they were used, we must now return to describe the motions of the Earl of Essex and the King in the Western parts, which for some weeks together, had not been mentioned for Stover and Newbury.

Whilst the King was at Bath, he received advice that Essex was about the 16th of July marcht from Devonshire towards Plymouth to raise the Siege, which Sir Richard Grenville had at that time before Plymouth and disperse his forces, which was the result of a Council of War then had, when two other Questions were proposed, either to march back to meet the King's forces, or to besiege Exeter, but neither of those were approved, and they were not very earnest to attempt Exeter now they knew they had frightened the Queen from thence, who about the 15th of was had of the matter of it, and the manner of the address, and some expressions uttered by the L. Wilmot therein, of making the Prince of Wales Mediator in the business, which by some disfaste to that Lord was improved to his prejudice, as if he intended to make a division in the Army; and thereupon the King was persuaded to secure him, and lend him away with a Guard to Oxford; which caused a great contention in the Army, for he was very well beloved of the Souleiders, and a great care had not been used to temper the minds of many of them; great inconveniences might have ensued; but nevertheless the King left hereby the comfit and conduct of his own belt officers, who by all the actions of his life before and after gave such evident marks of his Loyalty that even his enemies were ashamed and sorry for their apprehensions of him: General Goring was at the instant of his remove put into his Command, and the King began to use all possible means to disaffete the Enemy by allm?.t encompassing them with his forces, he himself and Prince Maurice, quartered at Boscumberk, Greenwel fatned himself at Lanseberock three miles West of the King, and posted himself of Leprin-Bridge a mile above Liflibelth, to which place the Tide flowed up from Foy, so that it was not fordable but at one place between that and the Sea, the Kings Army incamped between Boscumberk and a Heath that parted their quarters and the enemy, and placed Guards on all places on the River leading from his Quarters at Liflibelth to Foy, posting a Honde of the Lord Mohans over against the Town, and a Fort that commanded the mouth of the Haven; so that Effex had no place for relief by water but at a small Creek against the Town, and St. Blaise's his Bay, but neither safe for Ships, but they retained a large space of ground Westward, whereupon Goring was sent with most of the Horse, and Sir Thomas Basset with 1500 Foot to those parts to stop all provisions coming in at St. Blaise, by which means Effex and his Army were reduced to such straits, that Sir William Beffour with five and twenty hundred of his Horse broke away before day in the morning on the 31. of August between the Quarters of his Majesty and Prince Maurice, as they lay encamped, and got to Sailh, and the same night Effex himself and the Lord Roberts deserted the Army, and got away in a Boat to Plymouth.

The next day Skippin with the foot endeavoured to march to Foy, but the King having notice of their motion marched soon after them, and that day took five of their Ordinance, falling into their Rear within two miles of Liflibelth, the next morning they made a stand, and with the remaining Horse regained some fields from whence they had been forced before, whereupon the King sent Captain Edward Bress the Queens Troop, who in his view forced them to retire, regained the lost ground, and got more, and returned in good order with the loss only of four of his men, and himself flot in the arm for which good service the King immediately Knighted him. In the evening their men were so harrassed, they could scarce be made to stand to their Arms, and in that their condition Lieutenant Colonel Butler came to defire a par-

1644. beginning, and the little assistance he had from England; but we shall leave a while the narrative of his fortune, to return to the transactions in England, which were the remaining part of this year prosecuted in several places with various succés; in the West after the great Victory over Essex his Army, fitford, Comb, Barl-nable, and Salisbury submitted to the Kings Arms, and Basing-horse that had been eighteen weeks besieged, was relieved by a party from Oxford under Sir Henry Gage, and a little after, he with the Earl of Northampton raised the Siege of Ban-bury-Castle, which had been a month beleaguer'd by Colonel John Finis, and flew and took many of his men, and one piece of Ordnance: but the good fortune of the Parliament in several parts baffled this success with advantage, Monmouth was in September taken by Colonel Massy, and the Town and Castle of Newcastle which had long endured the utmost force of the English and Scotch Armies was taken by Storm with great loss to the Affiliants on the 27th of October, and while a Level Pool in Lanarkshire was sur-rended to Sir John Meldrum, but the great busifinesse that concluded this year were the Battle of Newbury, and the Treaty at Nixbridge, which will come next to be related, interwoven with some other of the most remarkable occurrences that then hapned.

The Earls of Essex and Manchester, and Sir William Waller had drawn a great Army together, with a resolution to hinder the Kings march to Oxford, but he not believing that Essex could have so soon appeared at the head of an Army, sought by was willing not to decline engagement, Essex and Manchester on the 23d of October rendez-ouz'd their Army in Aldermaston Park, and the next night came privily over the water at a Ford next Padsworth, and next morning to Buckle-bury-heath next Newbury, where the King then was, and about 12 of the Clock drew down their whole Army between Thameham and Shen, and skirmished with the Kings Horse; on Saturday both Armies placed one another with their great Ordnance, but without much hurt done, then some of Manchester's Troops and London Trained bands crossed the River Kennet between the hill and Newbury, and did some execution upon those that kept the pads against them: But Sir Bernard Abyby coming to their rescue, forced the other over the River. Again, in the afternoon 4000 of Essex and Wallers Horse and Dragoons with 500 Pikes charged the Royal Army on the West-side of Newbury, where were the Cornish foot, & the Duke of York's Regiment, with three or four pieces, and the freeman Maurice's Brigade of Cornish Horse, all which having not unnaturally baffled the strong charge of the Parliamentarians, were yet forced to retreat back in some disorder, and here some of the Kings field pieces were taken. The Essexians following their succés, advanced with 500 Horse, and a sufficient strength of Mus-ketiers betwix Newbury and Spine upon the Kings Life-Guards, and Sir Humphrey Bennet's Brigade, whom they overpowered, and had much more embattled, if the Lord Bernard Stewart had not come up to their alijance, and fenced their Retreat on the Earl-side of Spine; the Parliamentarians having setted three bodies of Foot in certain inclosures, advanced over a ditch with a great body of Horse to break through the Kings Guards, but first they were obliged to fight with General Goring and the Earl of Cleavelands Brigade (which charged stoutly & beat back the enemy, but purfuing disorderly were repulsed with loss.

Upon the North-east of Newbury flood he Lord Abyby, with Colonel George Ely, against whom the Earl of Manchesters Horse and Foot, with the Trained Bands of London came down the hill, and wrought Colonel Lyfers Guards, But Sir John Brown Lieut. Colonel of the Prince of Wales Horse regiment & Colonel of the Horse charged the Foot, and shot them, and then received a charge of 1000 Horse, and was forced to retreat.

Manchester in the next place forces his way to charge the Reserve commanded by Colonel Theels, and after a smart dispute beat them out of the field and gains their Colours, and two pieces of Cannon: In this Battel on the Kings part were were flain, Sir Anthony St. Leger, Lieutenant Col. Look, Lieutenant Colonel Topping and Cap, Catin; the Earl of Cleaveland, and some few were taken; the Earl of Bradanford & Forth, Sir John Greenwist, Sir Richard Campfield, Major Affer, and Captain Walgrave and others were wounded, many private Tollers flain and taken prisoners. The fight endured till eight o'clock of the Clock at night, and was ended to the advantage of the Parliamentarians; for the King receiving that most of his Brigades were shattered, and fearing a total overthrow if the Battel should be renewed, marched away secretly to Dennington-Castle, and there left behind him his great pies-es of Ordnance, and so hasted to Wallingford.

General Essex lodged himself in Newbury, and having in vain summoned and assaulted Dennington, he marched away on the 29th of October, complying the care of that Siege to a party which he left behind him.

The King after this fight made what haft he could to recruiit and refresh his Army that he might relieve Dennington-Castle, which was not sufficiently provided, and bring from thence the Ordnance, Ammunition & Baggage which he left there, and that he might also succor Basing house, which was again besieged & therefore on the 6th of November he had his Rendezvous at Bulington-Green betwixt Wallingford and Oxford, and from thence he marched two days after to Dennington, but upon his approach to the Castle, the enemy drew off their forces, and he put into the Garriton a supply of such things as they wanted, and then drew off the Train of Artillery, and other Carriages which he had left there. Sir William Waller was with an Army about Hungerford, he marched thither to ingage him, but they would not venter an encounter, and from thence Sir Henry Gage was sent with a Party to relieve Basing-house, but before he came, the be-siers drew off, and left the work very easy to him. After these performances the King returned to Oxford, and disposed his Army to Winter Quarters, and there he was attended by the Earl of Denbigh, and some of the House of Commons as Commissioners from the Parliament, with Propositions for a Peace, which produced an overture for a Message to be sent from him to the Parliament by the Duke of Rich mond, and the

The Reign of King Charles the First.

Earl of Southampton, which was agreed to, and from thence a Treaty was had at Holmbridge, which began about the first of February last, of which we shall make farther mention in its place.

About the end of this Month, Sir Alexander Carew, who was Governor of St. Nicholas Island at Plymouth, was tried by a Court Martial for endeavouring to deliver up the Island to the King, and sentenced to be beheaded, which sentence was a few days after executed upon him on Tower-Hill, and by the same Court Martial Sir John Hoban and his Son, who were in like manner arraigned, found guilty, and executed for设计ing to quit their party, and by some service to ingratiate a return to their allegiance to the King, concerning whose mistresses, The King among other reflections thereon in his excellent * Book, expressed him thus;

"Sir John Hoban unapproached, unhearted, not curried by any language or secret impression of mine, only blasted with the conscience of his own wickedness, and falling from one inconsistency to another, not long after pays his own and his eldest Son's heads, as forfeitures of their disloyalty, to those men, from whom surely he might have expected another reward than this, to divide their heads from their bodies, whose hearts with them were divided from their King."

"Nor is it strange that they who employed them at first in so high a service, and so successful a service, should not find mercy enough to forgive him, who had so much/premised of them: For Apostasy unto Loyalty, some men account the most unpardonable sin."

"Nor did a seditious vengeance serve the turn; the cutting off one head in a Family, is not enough to expiate the aforesaid done to the head of the Common-wealth. The eldest Son must be involved in the punishment, as he was infected with the sin of the Father, against the Father of his Country; Root and branch God cuts off in one day."

"These observations are obvious to every fancy: God knows I was far from rejoicing in Hoban's ruine, though it were such as were able to give the greatest thrift for revenge a full draught, (being executed by them who first employed him against Me) that I forsook pity as I thought he at first acted more against the light of his Conscience, than I hope other men do in the same cause."

By these and other executions at this time, the Parliament made themselves very terrible to their Officers, against whom any particular crimes could be objected, but where the offences were general and the persons of great interest in their Army, they were more cautious in their methods, and it happened at this time, that they were more perplexed at the ill conduct of their Armies, in suffering the King to make that progress he lately did in the relief of Dennington and Basing-House; for by his appearance there, the quarters of the Parliament Army on that side, were at Reading, Henley, Abingdon and Farnham, and the King's Troops were quarter'd at Basing, Odiham, Newbury, Blandford, and Marlborough.

Essex began to be suspected as cautious or discontented, and Collonel Norton wrote a letter to his Lordship that he had received a warrant from a chief Commander of the Army to withdraw from Basing: And the Earl of Manchester made a long Relation in writing concerning the carriage at Dennington, wherein he made his own defence, but acquitted Collonel Cromwell. Upon this the House of Commons fell into consideration of the follow proceedings of their Army, alleging that many of their Officers were deficient in not prosecuting advantages, which tended to the Prolongation of the War, and that the differences amongst their Commanders were commonly so much where the command is greatest; which produced this Resolution, (viz.) That no member of either House of Parliament, shall during this War, injure or execute any Office or Command, Military or Civil, which hath been granted or conferred on any Member of either House, or by any authority derived from either House, and that an Ordinance be brought in to that purpose.

This Vote and the Ordinance thereupon was very much opposed by the Peers, but petitions from the City and several Counties were framed and presented to move their compliance, which in the end prevailed upon them; In the mean time, though it was now Winter, and not ordinarily a time of action, the War went on in several places, and several new Garrisons were made by both parties, to the miserable spoyl and destruction of the Country. Sir Jacob Astley posseted himself of Cirencester with three Brigades of Foot, and four Regiments of Horse, and became so formidable, that he commanded Contribution to the very gates of Gloucester, nor were the Garrisons in Warwick, Hereford, and Bristol, less active, and Mensab and that had been before taken from the King, was regained by the Lord Herbert of Ragland, but in the midst of this good Fortune on the Kings side, a Garrison was form'd at Abingdon, a Town within five miles of Oxford, by order from the Two Houses of Parliament, under the command of Collonel Brown, the King and Council looking on, and suffered the Intrenchments to be made, the Works to be raised, and the Ordinance to be planted on the same. * It cannot be denied, but that Sir Henry Gage and many of the chief Commanders which were then in and about Oxford, offered their service to the King, and earnestly desired leave to prevent that mischief which by the Intrenchments of this Town must needs fall upon them, But the Lord George Digby, not long before made Principal Secretary of State, had persuaded the King unto the contrary, upon assurance that he held intelligence with Brown, and that as far as the Town was fortified and furnished with Victual, Arms and Ammunition by the charges of the Houses of Parliament, it would immediately be delivered into his Majesty's hand, in which design he was defeated, and exposed to some loss of Reputation: For Brown having brought his project to the highest round of the ladder (as himself expected it) thought it high time to turn it off, and to declare himself for the two Houses against the King; printing not long after the letters which passed between him and the Lord Digby upon this occasion.
The Reign of King Charles the First.

But now when it was too late, Sir Heneage Wase (as with a commanded party out of Oxford and Wallingford to seize a Port at Colhams Bridg within a mile of Abington, but the design being discovered, he was prevented, and in the attempt unfortunately received a shot, whereof within two hours he died, and with him Lieutenant Colonel Lord the Deputy Governor of Wallingford, and Major Green of that Garrison, with several others of great courage and reputation.

On the same day, or the day before, William Laud, Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, was beheaded on Tower-Hill, after he had been kept four years a Prisoner in the Tower, his Rent sequestered, and his Books, Papers, and all his Goods feiz'd; his Charge was, a constructive Treason under several heads reducible into two particulars:

1. For endeavouring the subversion of the Laws of the Land.
2. And a like endeavour to overthrow the Protestant Religion.

His Tryal was at the Lords Bar, and Mr. William Pryn of Lincoln-Inne, his profest enemy, was made his Proctor, wherein nothing was omitted to aggravate his offences, though when all that could be was said, nothing that did amount to Treason could be proved against him, but the Scots who were at that time very prevalent, would not be satisfied, unless he were put to death, to manifest thereby their zeal against the Episcopal Hierarchy, to other in the Presbyterian Government at the approaching Treaty, so that by an Ordinance of Lords and Commons, he was adjudged guilty of High Treason, though at the paling thereof in the Houle of Peers, there were but seven present, (viz. the Earls of Kent, Pembroke, Salisbury and Buckingham, and the Lords, North, Gray and Bruce.)

He ended his life with such a modest confidence, and so much piety, that his greatest enemies then present, who came to behold the Execution with hearts full of joy, returned back with eyes at full of tears.

In pursuance of several messages from the King for a Treaty, it was assented to by the Parliament, and at Exeterbridge Commissioners met on the 30th of January for the King, on one part, and for the Parliament of England and the Parliament of Scotland on the other.

The Commissioners for the King were, Parliament were,

Duke of Richmond and Earl of Northumberland.
Marquess of Hertford.
Earl of Southamp ton.
Earl of King's. Earl of Chichester.
Lord Capel.

Lord London.
Sir Chas. Erken.
Mr. Douglas.
Mr. Backley.
Mr. Henderson.

The first things to be treated on, were:

1. Religion.
2. The Militia.
3. Ireland.

The first paper at the opening of the Treaty was, concerning Religion which was delivered from the Kings Commissioners to the others in these words;

1. That freedom be left to all Persons of what opinion, sover in matters of Cerimony, and that all the penalties of the Laws and Customs which enjoy these penalties, be suspended.
2. That the Bishops shall execute no Act of Jurisdiction, or Ordination, without the consent and consent of the Presbyters, who shall be chosen by the Clergie of each Diocese, out of the Learnedst and greatest Ministers of that Diocese.
3. That the Bishop keep his conftant Residence in his Diocese, except when he shall be required by his Majesties to attend him on any occasion; and that he be not bound by the informity of old age, or sickness: be preach every Sunday in some Church within his Diocese.
4. That the Ordination of Ministers shall be done in the public, and solemn manner, and every form and rite observed concerning the sufficiency and other qualifications of those men who shall be received into Holy Orders: And the Bishop shall not receive any into holy Orders without the approbation and consent of the Presbyters, or the major part of them.
5. That competent Maintenance be established by Parliament, to such Vicarages as belong to Bishops, Deans and Chapters, one of the Impropriations according to the value of the several Parishes.
6. That no man shall be capable of two Parsonages or Vicaridges with cure of Souls.
7. That toward the settling of the publick Peace, a commission shall be raised by Parliament, out of the Estates of Bishops, Deans and Chapters, in such manner as the King and Parliament shall think fit, without the Alteration of any of the said Lands.
8. That the Jurisdiction in causes Temporal, and Matrimonial be settled in such a manner as shall seem most convenient by the King and Parliament: And that every Act to be passed for regulating of Visions, and against immoderate Fees in Ecclesiastical Courts, and abuses by frivolous Excommunications, and all other abuses in Ecclesiastical Jurisdictions shall be agreed upon by King and Parliament.

And if the Parliament Commissioners shall insist upon any other things which they shall think necessary for Religion, the Kings Commissioners shall very willingly apply themselves to the consideration thereof.

The Parliament Commissioners after they had perused this paper, delivered one of theirs to the Kings Commissioners, which was as followeth.

That a Bill be passed for dissolving all Arch-Bishops, Bishops, &c. according to the third Proposition.

That the Ordinances concerning the calling and sitting of the Assembly of Divines, be confirmed by All if Parliament.

That the directory for Publick worship already passed both Houses, and the Propositions concerning Church Government annexed and passed both Houses, be Enacted as part of Reformation of Religion and Uniformity, according to the first Proposition.

That his Majesty take the Silenm League and Covenant, and that the Covenants be enjoyed to be taken according to the second Proposition.

That the ordinary way of dividing Christians into distinct Congregations, and most expedient for cadiscussion, is by the respective bounds of their dwelling.

That the Ministers and the Church Officers in each Congregation, shall join in the Government of the Church, as shall be established by the Parliament.

That many particular Congregations shall be under one Presbyterial Government.

That the Church be governed by Congregational, Classical, and Synodical Assemblies, so be established by Parliament.

That Synodical Assemblies shall consist both of Provincial and National Assemblies.

The Propos'd were debated on three days without any determination on any one controverted point, and on the 29th of February, the Parliament Commissioners delivered in the following proposals concerning the Militia.

We define that the Subjects of England may be Armed, Trained and Disciplined as the Par-lament shall think fit; and that the like be for Scotland, as the Parliament there shall think fit.
And that his Majesty give his Royal assent to the Acts following.

1. An Act for settling the Admiralty and Forces at Sea, and moneys thereto for maintenance, to be as the Parliament shall think fit, and the like for Scotland.

2. An Act for settling the Admiralty, and all Forces at Sea, and moneys thereto for maintenance to be as the Parliament shall think fit. The like for Scotland.

3. An Act for settling all Forces by Sea and Land in Commissioners to be named by Parliament, so to such as both Kingdoms shall consider in, with power to suppress all powers and forces contrary thereto, and to act as they shall be directed by Par-lament.

And so for the Kingdom of Scotland.

That the Militia of the City of London, and the Parishes without London, and the Liberties within the weekly Bills of Mortality, be in the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council.

That the Town of London may be in the Government of the City, and the chief Officers thereof nominated, and removable by the Common Councils.

That the Citizens or Forces of London may not be drawn out of the City without their own con-ents, and the example of drawing them out in these distressed times, may be no President for the future.

There papers were likewise debated three days, and then the Parliament Commissioners pretended a paper concerning Ireland, to this effect:

That his Majesty give his Royal assent to an Act to make void the cession of Ireland, and all Treaties of the Rebels without consent of Parliament, and to settle the Possession of the Prop of Ireland in the Parliament, to be managed by the joynt advice of both Kingdoms, and his Majesty's affid, and to do no all to dissatisfaction or wrong them therein.

The Kings Commissioners in the debate of this Proposition, did lay open the eminent and inevitable necessity which carried the King to make the Irish Cession, which he was in honour obligated to make good; nevertheless they offered to concede to any thing for the security of the Kings Protestant Subjects, but the Parliament Commissioners were to bound up by their instructions, that they could admit of no alteration of what they offered.

The matter of Religion was then resumed, and that was to be concluded before they proceeded to any other proposition. But to many difficulties occurred in the debate thereon, that no accord could be made; for the Parliament to endeavour the Scotch to them, had caused every Member of each House to take the Scotch Covenant, whereby they bound themselves to the preservation of the Religion of Scotland, in Doctrines, Worship, Dis-pline and Government: and, To endeavour the extirpation of Episcopacy and the Reformation of Religion in England and Ireland, according to the example of the left Reformed Churches. Whereby they could mean nothing less than to bring them to the discipline of Scotland, because they had sworn to the preservation of the Religion there.
Moreover, they had sworn in this Covenant against defeatable indifferency and neutrality (to keep their own words) whereby it seem'd apparent, that though at first the contrivers of this Oath pretended only for liberty of Confin-ence, they now would allow none to any; wherefore the Kings Commissioners were at a stand; for the King took himself bound by the Oath of his Coronation, not to alter the government of the Church, and they were bound by their instru-tions to insist thereon, so that the Treaty became delepipated; hence it did not seem just to accept of the Scotch part it was offered. That if the Articles proposed by them, did not give satisfaction, that then to great an alteration as the total abolishi-ment of a Government established by Law, might (for the imparlance of it, and any reformation in doctrine for the scandal of it) be suspended, till after the disbanding of all Armies, when the King should be present with the Parliament, and calling a National Synod, might receive such advice both from the one and the other, as should be necessary, and as any Reformation that calmly made, would needs prove for the singular benefit;
so, whether the contrary, that is an alteration ev-ven to things though in themselves good, could

by the principles of Christian Religion, be enforced upon the King or Kingdom.

This would not be admitted, and the time allowed for the Treaty being but twenty days, nothing was effected therein; for the Parliament were resolved to have no peace but on their own terms, believing all the Kings proposals for peace, to proceed either from an inability to hold out the War, or from the weakness and irresolutions of his Council.

After this followed the taking of Shrewsbury, a place of very great importance to the King, as the Gate which opened into Wales, situate on a rising ground, and almost encompassed about by the River Severn; that part which is not invi orated by water, being wholly taken up and made good by a very strong Castle. By the loss of which Town, the Kings former intercourse with his Joyal Subjects of North-Wales was not only hindered, but a present drop was given to an association which was then upon the point of concluding between the Counteys of Salop, Flint, Chelfter, Worcetfèr, \\etc. to the great prejudice of the Kings affairs in those parts of the Kingdom.

dered to him upon the first summons, but the Col

Avenel was soon after condemned by a Court of War at Oxford, and shot to death for putting to easily with the place. A few days after Cromwell set out to march to Farringdon, and assaulted that Garri on, but was repulsed with the loss of next two hundred men, besides many that were wounded and taken prisoners. The King perceiving that Fairfax intended to besiege Oxford sent for Prince Rupert and General Goring to march to him thither, and those about the beginning of May came to Oxford, and fetched the King, who quickly increased his Army, and advanced it towards the reputation of Chelfter, but Goring re turned to the Siege of Taunton, from whence he had been called to this service.

Fairfax in commination of the different condition of Taunton marched with his Army to the relief of it as far as Blanford, but upon second thoughts he sends Colonel Welden with near two thousand Horse and Dragons, and 5000 Foot to Taunton, and returns to Newbury, where he re ceives an express to march to Oxford and lay siege close to it: in the mean time Welden makes halt at Taunton, and the Kings forces before the Town being informed it was the whole Army, re olved to give one furious assault, and if that took not effect to quit the place, which was performed, and they entered the Town, and fired two Streets, but the Governor retired to the Castle, and they could not force that, wherefore they drew off, and suffered Col. Welden to enter the Town, but Goring, Greenow, and Barkley, uniting The King and his Allies Chelfter, and from hence they forces together did so press upon Welden, that they besieged him and the Town again. By this time the King had relieved Chelfter, and several of the forces for Oxford, and made up the town.

The King himself commanded the Main Body, Prince Rupert and Prince Maurice the Right Wing, Sir Marmaduke Langdale the Left, the Earl of Lindsey, and the Lord Albay the right-hand Reserve, the Lord Bard and Sir George Leslie the Left. Of the Parliaments Army, Fairfax and Skippom commanded the Main Body, Cromwell the right Wing, with whom was_Roffier, who came with his forces but a little before the fight, and Ireton had the Left. The Referves were brought up by Rainborn, Hammond, and Pride; Prince Rupert charged the Parliaments left wing, Commanded by Ireton, who made notable resistance, but at last was forced to give ground, Ireton himself being run through the thigh with a Pike, and into the Face with a Halber, his Horie shot under him, and himself taken Prisoner. For about 3 hours Rupert followed the Chief almost to Nafetby Town, and in his return summoned the Train, but which with their Firelocks and in the mean time Cromwell charged fatically on the Kings left Wing, and got the better, forcing them from the Body, and procuring the advantage, quite broke them and their Reserve; during which the Main Bodies had charged one another with incredible force, often Retreating & Rallying, falling in together with the But-ends of their Muskets, and coming to hand-by-blowes with their Swords. But Fairfax's Foot coming up feantionably to the Horie, and Cromwell coming in with his Victorious right Wing, they all charged together upon the Kings main Army, who unable to endure any longer, retired out of the field towards Leicefter, and Prince Rupert, who now too late returned from his too eager pursuit, seeing the day lost, accompanied them in their flight, leaving (as Heaven would have it) a compleat Victory to the Parliamentarians, who purposed them within two miles of Leicefter, and the King finding the pursuit too hot, leaves that Town, and halts to Leicefter. This Battle was exceeding bloody, both Armies being very courageus and numerous, not being five hundred odd, fought in a large fow field, on the North-wet side of Nafetby, about a mile broad, which space of ground was wholly taken up. On the Parliament's fide were wounded and slain, above a thousand Officers and private Soldiers: Major General Skippom (who was an old experienced Soldiery, and was ordered to draw up the form of the Battel) fought flatly that day; and altho' he was mortally wounded in the beginning of the fight, and the General defir'd him to go off the field, he answered, he would not fight so long as a man would stand; and accordingly layed till the Battel was ended. Ireton (as is laid before) was dangerouly hurt and taken prisoner for a while, after he had done his part; but in the confusion of the fight got loose again, and saw the Victory attained. The General and Lieutenant General performed their work with Efficient resolution (had their Cause been as good) and by their own examples inferred valour into their followers; likewise did the other Officers of whom divers were wounded.

On the other side, the King threw himself that day a courageous General, keeping close with his Horie, and himself in person rallying them to hot encounters, the Earl of Lindsey, Lord Albay, Colonel Raffell and other were wounded, 20 Colonels, Knights, and Officers of note, and 600 private Soldiers slain: but much more was the damage that the King sustained, by what was taken, viz. six Colonels, 8 Lieutenant Colonels, 18 Majors, 70 Captains, 8 Lieutenant Captains, 200 Ensigns, and other inferior Officers, 450 Common Soldiers, and many women, 15 of the Kings household Servants, four of his Footmen, 12 Pieces of Ordnance, 8000 Arms, 40 Barrels of Powder, 200 Carriages, all their Bag and Baggage, with store of rich Plate; 3000 Horse, the Kings Standard, one of the Kings Coaches, and his Cabinet of Letters and Papers, which were after published by the Parliament (with less decency and civility than became such an assembly) Sir Marmaduke Langdale handed away the same night to Newcast. The next day General Fairfax sent up Col. John Peters to London with the Prisoners and Colours taken in the fight.

The King having saved himself by flight, gathered together some part of his scattered forces, but never was able to make head against the Conquerors, losing this year one Garnon after another, till his whole strength was almost reduced to Oxford. I shall take notice only of some of the principal, namely Leicefter, Carlisle, Pomfret, Hume, the Castle, Bridgnower, Scarbroth, Brifbou, Hereford, and Preston, and Leicestershire, on which to great a part of his affairs did most especially depend.

On the 16th of June, Fairfax set down before Leicefter, and summoned the Governor the Lord Hastings to deliver up the Town, which he refusing, Warrants were shewn for the Country to bring in Ladders and other necessaries for a storm; and Hastings continuing yet obstinate, he assailed it in several places, and at the Newport-fide, he made to ride a Breach, that the Governor defined a Parole, which was granted, and thereupon a forrestding ensued upon was tain in the Town. There were in the Town 14 pieces of Ordnance, thirty Colours, 2000 Arms, 500 Horie, 50 Barrels of Powder, and Ammunition proportionable, and about a week after Sir Thomas Glemmon Governor of Carlisle, having been long besieged by the Parliament forces, and despairing of succours yielded up the Town. The Low condition of Carlisle, & the Town of Tannton, caused the Committee of both Kingdoms to order General Fairfax to march thither, which he readily obeyed, but upon his approach to the Town, General Goring on the tenth of July, drew off from Tannton, and retreated to Langport. The next day Fairfax being at Long Sutton within two miles of Langport, he drew out his forces early in the morning in Sutton-field, Goring likewise drew forth at that time, and took a pass leading to Bridgnower, and lined the way to it, with Musketeers. Fairfax sent Major Bilbel

Sir John Digby. who was Major General of the Horse to Goring was shot in the elbow, and carried into Bridgwater, where three days after he died of his wounds, and was very much lamented by his party, he was about forty five years of age at the time of his death, and in all his life was scarce ever heard to swear or seem angry; he had very great courage and conduct in Martial affairs, and was competently learned also in many Sciences. Goring after he had relented for some time in Bridgwater, marched away to the North of Devonshire; Sir Thomas Fairfax presently thereupon sets down before Bridgwater, and starves the Town, but being resolutely defended by Sir Edmund Window the Governor, he formed the lower part thereof which is divided from the rest by a bridge and gained it, and the next day he had hot fleet plows into the Town, by which means, and by some intelligence he had with the Town, most of the houses that were thatcht were fired, whereby the Townsmen were so distressed, that they left the Works, and hung down their Arms to endeavour to save their houses. In the midst of this contention, Fairfax sent a Trumpeter in to the Governor, wherein he acquitted him, that he purposed to assault the Town, but in compassion to the women and children therein, he offered to permit as many of them as desired it, to go out of the Town; upon this there was to great a distraction in the Garrison, that the Governor was forced to yield to a Treaty; and thereupon on the 23rd of July the Town was surrendered, upon condition only of Sir Quarter, but except Townsmen that were in Arms to be prisoners at War, of which there were a thousand Officers and Soldiers, and in their houses they found 44 Barrels of Powder, and 400 weight of Match; and in the Town 44 pieces of Ordnance, and 150 Arms; and two days before Pomfret-Castle after three months Siege was delivered up to Major General Points, upon condition for the Officers and Soldiers to march away with their Arms, Drums beating, and Colours flying, and bullet in mouth, with fixt on foot of Powder, and bullet proportionable: and on the 25th of July the Castle of Scarborough had the like fate, it being then surrendered by Sir Hugh Cholmeley the Governor, to Sir Mathew Boynton, who commanded the forces before it, upon very honorable conditions, amongst which it was provided, that the Governor and all his Officers and Soldiers should have a safe Convey to Newark, and from thence after six days notice, as many as desired should have a pass to go into Holland, or any other place abroad, and none were to be plundered, or forced to take up Arms against their wills, but to have Passes to go home if they desired them. They had kept this Castle for twenty days, at the delivery thereof, many of the Officers and Soldiers were so sick and weak, that they were brought out in fives: there were about 35 pieces of Ordnance in the Castle, besides many Arms, but very little Victual or Ammunition.

they came within 20 miles of Oxford, they were to lay them down.

Bristol being thus reduced, Fairfax marched into the West, towards the Prince of Wales, (who was now in the middle parts of Devonshire) intending to take in Exeter, but there were too many blocks in his way, that it was a long time after before he gained that City, as will be hereafter related.

The quick surrundering of Bristol did much trouble the King, for he thought that City (to well maintained and furnished with Victual, Arms, and Ammunition) would rather have given a turn to his affairs, by the name of the Parliament Army against it otherways, there had before some Letters paffed between the King and the Prince, touching the Kings coming to a speedy agreement with his two Houses of Parliament, in which the King was so far preffed, that he seem'd to be displeased at it, and dispatched a Messenger to the Lords at Oxford to displace Colonel William Legg (then Governor thereof, and a great confidet of the Prince's) and to put Sir Thomas Cramond into his place.

Hereford next followed the fame fortune of Bristol, which having been besieged by the Scots from the 13th of July to the first of September, (at which time they were forced to draw off,) on news that their help was required in their own Kingdom, where Montrose was very prevalent, having defeated an Army employed against him in a Battle fought in Kilburn field near Glasgow;) the Town was suddenly surprized by Colonel Birch and Colonel Morgan (the left then Governor of Glasgow,) on the eighteenth of December; the King a little before this time had got a small Army together in Wales, and seeing Bristol left, was very deifirous to free Chefter (a City of very great importance in those parts of the Kingdom) from the Siege then before it by Sir William Brevetson, Colonne Jones, and others, to effect which, he march'd with his Army confiding of about five thousand men, and more Horfe to relieve the Town; but in his march towards it, he was caught by General Poyntz, at Bontaa-More, within two miles of Chefter, where being outposted with numbers, his Army was worsted, and amongst others, the Lord Bernard Stewart (Brother to the Duke of Richmond) then newly made Earl of Lichfield) was slain; he was a young Nobleman of great hopes, and therefore was his loss very much lamented by the King; upon this disappointment, the King drew his broken Army towards the North-east, and commanded the Lord Digby and Sir Marmaduke Langdale to march for Scotland; and to joyn with the Marquess of Montrose, who was very successful there, and only wanted Horfe to enable him to reduce that whole Kingdom to the Kings obedience. These in obedience to their order march'd Northward, and at a Village called Shorborne, they surpriz'd seven hundred of the Parliament Poot, with their arms and baggage, but flattering there for carriages, some of General Powys, his Forces commanded by Colonel Cope, Colonel Ellias, and Colonel Adlard, fell upon them, and routed them, killing and taking about an hundred Officers, three hundred common Souldiers, six hundred Horfe, with their furnitures, and the Lord Digby's Coach and Horfe, and therein his Cabinet of Letters, but he, with the remains of his flatter'd Brigade, making towards Scotland, was a lecond time met upon Carrifhe Sands, and utterly defeated, he himself escaping to the Isle of Man, from whence he got a passage into Ireland; The King was got to Newrak when this misfortune hapned to the Lord Digby, but so great was the discontent he found there, that he was put to much trouble thereby; Sir Richard Willis upon some intigation of Digby, was a little before removed from the Government of the Town, and the Lord Willis rejoin'd, and Prince Maurice were displeased, because he was a person by them much favour'd and esteemed, and their displeasure was in a while too openly manifefted; for at a dinner with the Governor upon the 17th of October, upon some discourse of the present transactions, and the managey of the Lord Digby, General Gerard said, he was a Trayer, to which Bell's made such a reply as occasioned many passionate disputes, wherein the two Princes justified Gerard, the King in the interim came in, and quieted the business by his presence for a time, but in the doing thereof, some of the carriage and expenses were made towards him by the intigation of Willis, which are not fit to be remembered, and in the conclusion, the two Princes, Gerard, the Lord Hanley, and Sir Richard Willis, with some others of their friends, retired to Newton House fourteen miles from Newrak, from whence they went to the Parliament for a pass to transport them out of the Kingdom, and obtained it.

Thefe traveller's were accompanied with un-welcome intelligence from most places; for about this time, the King received the ill news of the taking from him of Basing-Houfe by form, (the defendants not having a sufficient number to man their works,) and therein the Marquess of Winchester (who had long and gallantly defended his Houfe) taken prisoner, with about two hundred others, and abtow a hundred were shut in the defence of the place, and as one misfortune is commonly followed by another, he had notice about the fame time of the Jofe of Shorborne, taken by form, wherein the Governor Colonel Stanhope, a Son of the Earl of Chesterfield, and near two hundred more, were kill'd after the Houfe was entered.

Newrak at this time became so in-fecure, that the King thought it inconvenient to continue longer therein, and therefore with a guard of three hundred Horfe, he got safe to Oxford on the third of November, and thither the Prince of Wales, Poyntz and Maurice came to him from Winchester after a serious reflection upon themselves for their miscarriages towards him, and were perfectly re-conciled to his favour.

The King's Forces in most parts became very much labour'd, and though by the endeavours of the Queene, and some of his Ministers abroad, forein aid was promised him against the next Summer, yet the King in affection to his people, was rather inclined to try all other ways than accept of those favours, and to that purpose from the 5th of December to the three and twentieth of March following, he sent nine or ten messages to the Parliament with offers of Peace, and for the better accomplishment thereof, he proposed to have a personal treaty with them, but they would not content to any other terms of accommodation, than to have all their demands drawn up into Bills to be presented to him for his assent, yet in the mean time the King omitted not to use all ways in his power to relieve his Garrisons, and the Prince of Wales in the Weald was very adéved, but the spirits of men, because it was much depress’d by the latter part of the preceding summer at the Parliament’s Troops, that nothing succeeded.

The siege of Plymouth was raised by Fairfax, and two days after Dartmouth was surrendered to him by Sir Hugh Pollard the Governor thereof, and from thence he marched to Exeter, and hum’d it, and there he left Sir Hardres Walier to block up the City, whisth himself with the rest of his Forces went to find out the Prince his Army then commanded by the Lord Hopson, he himself being gone into Cornwall to raise the Trainbands, and what other Souliers he could to strengthen his Troops; whilst these things were acting in the Weald, the King at Oxford was again intent upon the relief of Chester, and for that service several Forces were by Sir William Vaughan drawn out of the Garrisons of Hereford, Ludlow, Worcester, and Bridgwater, who with seven hundred Horse, and seven hundred Foot, advanced to its relief; but the enemy drawing out a party of a thousand four hundred Horse, and a thousand Foot, encountered, and utterly routed him, so that after this attempt, all hopes of relief failing, on the same day the City was delivered up to Sir William Burrenston upon those conditions, viz. That the Lord Byron and all Noblemen, Commanders, and Officers, and Souliers, should depart the Town in all their apparel whatsoever; The Lord Byron with Horse and Arms, and ten men alike accomplished to attend him; his Lady, and Servants, with Coaches, in each four Horses, with such other Ladies & Gentlewomen as he thought fit, and with his Books, Evidences and Writings in his profession; but all of them with not above forty pounds in money, and twenty pound in plate; the rest of the Noblemen with their Ladies intwurable to their honour, with not above thirty pounds in money, and to every one in their degrees to the common Souliers, who were to march away with 2,000. nor: Now were the Conditions for the Citizens left reasonable, which were the esfer condescended to by Sir William Burrenston, though he knew their difficulties, because of the desire he had not to ruining the City, the chief of his County, and of which he hoped he would be Government.

And on the same day Belvoir Castle was by Sir Gervase Lucas surrendered to General Poyntz, upon Conditions, and the Governor and his Lady, with the Officers and Soulliers, were with a Convey conducted to Lichfield. At Torrington in Devonshire, Fairfax found the Lord Hopson with his Army, which he resolved to engage; Hopson having the lesser number, drew up his men into several closes, and Fairfax pressed upon him very hard, but a great part of the time was spent in skirmishes by several parties, till both retired; at length the Fierlone-hopes of both Armies engaged, that of the Parliament, with its Reference, was at first beaten back to the main body of their Army, but that advancing, the Fight began about eight a clock at night, nigh the Town, to which the Royalists retreated, and there they maintained the charge to redoultion, that had not Fairfax’s Soulliers been hearted with fresh supplies, they had given it utterly over; but the other overpowered by their fresh numbers, gave back, whereby the Enemy gained the Town; which being entered into the Magazine in the great Church was fired by a train, and destroyed Fairfax more men than he had left in the Battail; for this there was no less than eighty Barrels of Powder: upon the firing of the Magazine, Sir John Digby took advantage of the Enemies amazement and gave them a resolute Charge, in which he did some execution, and so fell off, and matched with the rest of the Forces into Cornwall: whither Fairfax followed with so much speed, that he compelled the Royalists in disorder to quit Lunnecriston, whereupon the Prince of Wales marched away towards Pendenris Castle, accompanied with the Lord Captis, the Lord Luyner, and Sir Edward Hide, and took shipping there on the first of March, and arrived safely at Scilly; the Lord Hopson soon after finding it vain to make resistance with his broken Army, being hammoned by Fairfax to disband, contented to it upon very honorable Conditions; but having experienced how all Articles had been observed, and being likewise sensible of the ill effects of the Kings gracious proposals for peace, He chose rather to go to Oxford (whither by Articles he might have been conveyed by fifty of his own, and fifty of the Parliament Horse) to transport himself to France.

After the disbanding of these Forces, all the Kings Garrisons and Forts in Cornwall yielded, except Pendennis Castle, and St. Michaels Mount, and General Fairfax return’d to the siege of Exeter.

All these mischances thus hapning on the neck of one another, all the Kings hopes and expectations relied upon the coming of Sir Jacob Ailfe, (created Lord Aireys of Redding two years since,) who having kept together some Remainders of the Kings Forces since the fight near Chester, and increasing them with the accelion of some fresh Supplies, marched towards the King, and was to have been met upon the way by Sir John Campsfield with the Oxford Horse, but either though the want of Intelligence or the necessity of haste, or some occasional delays, it was so long before Campsfield was upon his march, that the News came of the Lord Airey being vanquish’d by Colonel Morgan at a place called Dennington near Ston on the fields, on the 21st of March: In which fight himself was taken prisoner, and with him all the Kings hopes were lost of preferring Oxford, till he could better his condition.

The King having often sent to the Parliament (as hath been laid) to invite them to a Treaty of Peace, offering to come to Westminster in Persons, had on the 30th of March a message from the Parliament, wherein they told him, That it would be unsafe for him or them to return to Westminster, until he had assented to the Propositions which they were framing. &c. And to preven... vent his coming to London without their knowledge and consent, they voted, That if the King should come, or attempt to come within the Lines of Communication; that then the Committee of the Militia of London should have Power, and were thereby enjoined to apprehend and secure such as should come with him, to prevent return unto him, and to secure his Person.

Exeter was at this time so much distrusted, and without possibility of relief, that the City was on the 13. lb. of April surrendered to Fairfax upon very good conditions; Sir John Berkeley the Governor was to march out with his Soldiers, both Cornith and others in the height of Honour, with Drums beating, Colours flying, Ballet in motion, Matchets lighted, &c. The first into their Country, and the others to Oxford; The Princess Henrietta younger Daughter to the King, (who ever since her Birth had continued in this City under the care of the Lady Dalkeith) was sent up to London, there to be disposed of by the Parliament, till soon after the was by her Governor conveyed privately to her Mother in France. To the Fortune of Exeter, Barnsley Town and Fort, St. Michaels Mounts, Dunston Castle, Woodstock, and many other Garrisons soon after submitted; so that Fairfax his victorious Army having cleared the West, was now reduced to march up to a close beleaguering of Oxford, (which had sometime before been extremely fortified by the continual Alarms of Fleetwood and Rainfordb) which made the King begin to think of some way for his safety; and at last on the 27th of April the King disguised, departed out of Oxford, accompanied only with Mr. Hinde, a Minister, and Mr. John Althburnham, and few or none else were acquainted with his design, so that though many knew that he was gone, yet various were the opinions whether, some said to other Scots, others to Monro in Scotland, but the most general opinion was, that he was come up and lay in London concealed; to discover which, the Parliament puffed an Order, That whatsoever person should harrow or conceal, or know of the harbouring or concealing of the King's Person, and should not immediately reveal it to the Speakers of both Houses, shall be proceeded against as a Traitor to the Common-wealth, forfeit his whole Estate, and dye without mercy. But contrary to all mens expectations, he is at length heard of at the Scots Camp before Newark; many wondered how he durst truut his Person with them, but the Parliament having notice of it, immediately ordered that the Commissioners, and the General of the Scottish Army, should be dehreted, that his Majehties Person might be discovered, and that all杨幂emen and Gentlemen, and he himself thence dispossed of, and sent to Westminster Castle, and the John Althburnham and the rest that came with him into the Scots Quarters, should be sent for as Delinquents by the Serjeants as Armis, and that the Commissioners of the Parliament residing before Newark, should make a Narrative of the Kings coming thither, and present it to the House; But these votes were fearcely passed when came a Letter from the General and Commissioners of the Scottish Army to the Committee of both Kingdoms, to be communicated to the Parliament, acquainting them, That the earnest before they had to keep a right under...

Standing between the two Kingdoms, moved them 1646. to acquire them with that strange providence wherein they were surprized, together with their carriage and defences thereof; That the King came yesterday into their Army in so private a way, that after they had made some search for him upon the furnitures of some Persons who pretended to know his face, yet they could not find him in further House; That they believed their Lordsips would think it was matter of much affonitement to them, seeing they did not expect him to come into any place under their Power; They considered it not fit to inquire into the Cause, but to endeavour that his being here might be improved for procuring the work of Uniformity, for uniting Religion, and obtaining of Peace according to the League and Covenant, and Treaty, by the advice of the Parliament of both Kingdoms, and their Commissions authorized for that effect; but troubling to their integrity, they were persuaded that none would so far misconstruct them, as that they intended to make use of this seeming advantage, for promoting any other ends than were exprest in the Covenant, and had hitherto been joined by them with no less Confidence than care; That for further satisfaction they did ingenuously declare, That there had been no Treaty nor Capitulation between his Majesty and them, nor any in their names; but that they left the nates and means of Peace to the Parliaments of both Kingdoms, and so far as concerned them as they had a Mines in Heaven, they were confident to make it appear, but there was nothing more in their desires than in all their resolutions and proceedings to adhere to the Covenant and Treaty; That their greatest thoughts should be taken up in studying, and their usefulness abilities employed in attaining these things which most advanced the publick good and common happiness of both Kingdoms, wherein by the help of God they should labour in use so much tenderly, and care, that they hope it shall soon appear, their affixions were the result of honest and single intentions; That they could not in a matter so deep in consequence and common interest, but seek their Lordsips advice; for which effect they had also written to the Committee of Affairs in Scotland, with intentions to move new contemts and refinements, that after a seed time of Afflictions, we might reap the first fruits of Truth and Peace. This was this account given by Le greve the General, and the Commissioners in the Army to the Committee of both Kingdoms at the meeting. In the mean time the Garrison of Newark (which had been for a long time valiantly defended by the Lord Berkeley both against the Scots and English Forces, and had made many fortunate Sallies upon the besiegers) was upon the 4th of May, the day before the King came into the Scotch Camp, entered upon a Treaty, and on the 9th. was agreed to be surrendered upon Condition, That the Garrison, with all the Ordinance, Arms, and Ammunition, should be delivered up to the Commissioners for the Parliament of England; That the Lord Berkeley, Governor, with all Officers, Gentlemen and Clergy, to march away withtheir Hornes and Swords unto any Garrison of the Kings not beleaguered, on to their own Houses; the Soldiers to have shoes in their hands, and their own Goods, and all of them

vice published a direction to Sir Thomas Grel-bam, Sir Thomas Jefsey, Colonell Wolflington, and Colonel Blakes, Governors of Oxford, Wearfor, Liegefield, and Walthamfor, and to all the Commanders of any Towns, Castles or Forts within the Kingdom of England and Dominion of Wales, giving them an account of his Resolutions to comply with the desigms of his Parliament in every thing that might be for the good of his Subjects, and leave no means unattemmed for the removing of differences betwixt them; and the more to evidence the reality of his intentions therein, he required them upon Honourable Conditions to quit the Towns and Forts in-truded to them, and to disband all the Forces under their several Commands: But before notice hereof came to Oxford, the Governor and Lords there had come to a Treaty, to begin at Hedington the 17th of May, between Sir John Hambly, Colonel Gofvel, Colonel Tilier, Dos-co Louch, Thomas Chrysf, John Dunton, Gofff Palmom, and Robert Mead, Eleent, that he be-fried, and Lieutenant General Hammond, Com-imy General Ixton, Colonel Lamberts, Colo-nal Rich, Scout-Mafter General Wafon, Major Desforsegh, Major Harrison, Mr. Herberts, and Mr. Walker, for the Parliament. And after a re-terior Treaty continued to the 25th of June, without any Ceflation of Arms it was delivered upon Conditions sufficiently honoured, had they been as honourably performed. The whole number of the Garrison was supposed to amount of 7000 Souldiers and Scholars in pay, who all marched out; but many of the Nobility and Souldiery had leave to tarry for Paffes; the Chief of whom were the Duke of York, the Princes Rafters and Maurices, the Earls of Dorfet, Herfet, and Sandampton, the Lords Cuffington, Down-more, Secretary Nicholom, and others. The Duke of York was conveyed to London, and at St. Jame's committed with the rest of the Royal Children to the tuition and care of the Earl of Northumberland and his Lady. The two Princes Rupert and Maurice had Paffes granted them to go beyond Sea, but before their departure by the Parliaments leave they had a writ made to them by their Brother the Prince Elector, (who all this time fided with the Parliament, which they coldly receiv'd.) Two days after the furrendry, all the Seals of Eflate were lent from the General to the two Haufer at Welfningfor, to wit, the Great Seal of ENGLAND, carried by the Lord Keeper Jefiion for the King in the year 1642. The Pri-

The Reign of King Charles the First.

1646. Whilst the King was at SoutbweIl he had written to the Parliament for a Treaty, which after many debates, was so far complied with, as to send Propositions to him by the Earls of Pembroke and Suffolk, Mr. Godwin, Sir Walter Eart, Sir John Hippeley, and Mr. Relihan, but they were so high both in relation to the Rights and Prerogatives of the Crown, and tending to the change of Religion established, that he could not consent to them, but to give them some satisfaction therein, On the fifth of August the following Meillage was sent to them.

C. R.

The Propositions tendered to His Majesty by the Commissioners, &c. (to which the Houses of Parliament have taken twice so many moneths for deliberation, as they have assigned dates for His Majesties answer,) do import so great alterations of Government both in Church and State, as it is very difficult to return a particular and positive Answer, before a full debate, wherein those Propositions, and the necessary explanations, true sense and reasons thereof be rightly weighed and understood, & that His Majesty upon the full view of the whole Propositions, may know what is left, as well as what is taken away or changed. In all which he finds (upon reflection with the said Commissioners,) that they are so bound up from any Capacity, either to give reasons for the demands they bring, or to give cars to such desires as His Majesty is to propound, as it is impossible for him to give such a prefent Judgment on, and Answer to those Propositions whereby he can Answer to God, that a safe and well-grounded peace will ensue, (which is evident to all the World can never be, unleas the just Power of the Crown, as well as the freedom and propriety of the Subject, with the just liberty and privileges of the Parliament, be likewise (setled,) to which and His Majesty desiers and propose to come to London, or any of his Houses thereabouts upon the publick Faith, and Security of the two Houses of Parliament, and the Scots Commissioners, that he shall be there with freedom, honour and safety, where his personal presence he may not only raise a mutual confidence between him and his people, but also have those doubts cleared, and those difficulties explained to him, which he now conceives to be derogative to his just legal Power, if he should give a full content to those Propositions as they now stand. As likewise that he may make known to them such reasonable demands, as he is most affured will be very much conducive to that peace which all good men desire and pray for, by the settling of Religion, the just privileges of Parliament, with the freedom and propriety of the Subject, And His Majesty affurses them, that he can never confedent unto what is absolutely derogative unto that just power, which by the Laws of God and the Land he is born unto, so he will cheerfully grant and give his assent unto all such Bills on the desire of his two Houses, or reasonable Demands from Scotland, which shall be really for the good and peace of his people, not having regard to his own particulars, (much less any bodies else,) in respect of the happiness of those Kingdoms: Wherefore His Majesty conjures them as Christians, as Subjects, and as Men who desire to leave a good Name behind them, that they will so receive and make use of this Answer, that all issues of blood may be stopped, and those unhappy dissolutions peaceably settled, and upon assurance of an Agreement, His Majesty will immediately send for the Prince his Son absolutely expelling his perfect obedience to return to this Kingdom.

This Meillage did not prevail, and many debates were agitated betwixt the Parliament and the Scots about the dispatch of the King; it was freely granted by the Parliament to the Scots, that they might carry him if they pleased to Edinburgh, but that they refused, affuring that by his presence in an unested Kingdom, new combinations might arise, they rather desired that he might be carried into the Southern parts of England, and live in some of his houses near London, which they thought most convenient for treating of a peace, so that in all that whole debate, they seemed rather to contend not who should have the King, but who should not have him.

But before the Scots entered upon this Treaty about the Person of the King, they had agreed with the Parliament upon terms for their marching out of England, by which agreement they were to have two hundred thousand pounds paid in present upon their delivery of Barnack, Carlisle, and Newcastle to the Parliament of England, and two hundred thousand more secured to them upon the publick Faith of the King.

The fifth payment of this money was made at Newcastle according to the compact, & thereupon they delivered the King to the Earls of Pembroke and Denbigh, the Lord Montague, Sir James Murray, Sir John Holland, Sir Walter Earl, Sir John Cook, Mr. Crew, and Major General Brown, who were Commissioners appointed by the Parliament to receive him, and with these on the 3rd of February the King set forward towards his House at Holdenby in Northamptonshire, where he arrived on the 16th of the same month, the Scots two days before the Kings departure marched from Newcastle, which was peifect by a Garrison of English, and a few days after, they also put Barnack and Carlisle into the Parliaments hands, and marched quietly home to Scotland. The King at Holdenby was kept so close, that none of his domestick Servants that had attended him since he left London, nor any of his Chaplains were suffered to have access unto him. And the Parliament having having now the King in their possession, and all his Armies and Garrisons (hubdied by their forces, they began to be much divided amongst themelves, under the names of Presbyterians and Independents.

The first whereof who were the major part in both Houses were, those who in compliance with the Scots thought themselves obliged by the Co-ventor to set forth the Presbyterian Discipline of Government as was executed in Scotland under the Government of Congregational, Cjunctional, Provincial and National Assemblies (to whom the City of London very much adhered) but the others disliked that act of Government as too rigorous, imperious and conclusive, holding that Churches should not be subordinate as Parochial Provincial, and Provincial to National, but coordinate, without superiority; and from hence they were called Independents: whereof the first eminent appearance was in the Assembly of Divines, which met in the year 1643 at Nutfom-ter to consult about matters of Religion; for the major part of these being Presbyterians, were in consideration of a Directory and Model of that Government to be proposed to the Parliament, when five of their Members, viz., Thomas Goodwin, Philip Nye, Siddrah Simpson, Jeremiah Bourroughs, and William Bridge made some opposition, and defined Toleration to be indulged to them, that the rigour of it might not be concluded by the Votes of the Assembly, but the rest of the Members opposed their Toleration, and some of them ejected out of the Assembly, except in convienent time they would comply therewith, whereupon the dissenters appealed from the Assembly, and presented an Apologistical Narrative to the Parliament, wherein they petitioned for some favour to them, whose Consciences could not join with the Assembly in all particulars, concluding, That they professed no other interest or defence but a subsistence in their own land, as not knowing where else to live with safety, health, and livelihood to fet their feet on earth.

Upon this Petition they found such favour,
that they were secured from further trouble; and from this beginning they grew to great increas-est, that they had the best pretences left in the Church, and opened and that the door of preferrment to others.

Lieutenant General Cromwell and Commissary General Ireton, and the greatest part of the Army, confining now of men of several Sects of Religion, did much favour these Independents, who were ingrate themselves with them (though in their Confession of Faith and Do-cline they wholly agreed with the Presbyterian) held our Liberty of Confidence to all other Sects in the profession of their Faith and exercise of their Religion.

This inclination of the Army to the Independents made the Presbyterian, who were the ma-

or part of the Parliament, very watchful over their actions, and observing that the Army at their Courts of War laid hold on all pretences of scandals & crimes to disband & cast off Presbyterians, that Independents might be part in their places, resolved to disband all of them except five thousand Horse, a thousand Dragon, and fire Companies of fire-locks, for people they wanted not a good pretence, that the people might be ex-led thereby of a great part of the Taxes imposed upon them for their maintenance, and that some of them might be sent into Ireland, where there was a want of English Souldiers. And for this purpose they borrowed two hundred thousand pounds of the City of London. The head-Quarters of the Army was at St. Edmund-Bury in Suffolk, when these matters were debated in Parliament. Part by the Intelligence they kept at prej-munder nothing thereof was concealed from them, and by the Independent party in the House (as it was commonly said) they were so practi-ioned on, that they were resolved not to disband, yet when something of this was suggested in the House of Commons; Cromwell with his hand up on his breast said, In the presence of God before whom we stand, that he knew the Army would disband, and lay down their Arms at their will, whenever they should command them. Upon this affection, Orders of both Houses for disbanding were sent to the Army with instructions for determining the Accompts of the Souldiers, but in stead of obedience to these Orders a Council of Officers met at St. Edmunds-Bury to consider thereof, begin to debate of the matter with much difficultations, and two Souldiers out of each of the fourteen Regiments of Horse and Foot, as Agitators or Agents of their respective Regiments were allowed to meet also in a kind of Council with the same force, and both of these Assemblies agreed upon the same things in substance, namely, against disbanding; and in a Petition to the General, they defined the Army might be speedily drawn to a Re-ideoyouze, and that he would sue his utmost to endeavour that it be not disbanded till pablique Grievances should be redressed,
and all such persons called to account who had been intenders, contrivers, or promoters of their distrutions (for so they termed those of the Parliament that voted them to be disbanded.) These requests of the Officers and Souldiers produced a General Rendezvous of the Army at Newmarke on the fourth of June, and the Agitators the day before privately sent Comet Joyce with a party of Souldiers to slight on the King (as will be mentioned hereafter) and at this Rendezvous they associated themselves together as a kind of di-fined body from the rest of the Kingdom, and subscribed a solemn Inagreement of their resolution, wherein they promised not to that purpose expressed themselves, (viz.)

Do the Officers and Souldiers of the Army subscribe herunto, the hereby declare, agree, and promise to, and with each other, that we shall not willingly disband, nor divide, nor suffer our Selves to be disband or divided, until we have security, that we are private men, as other the free born people of England shall not remain subject to the like oppressions and injuries as have been attempted, and shall have such satisfaction and security as shall be agreed upon by a Council to consist of sixty General Officers of the Army, who have concurred with the Army in this resolution (for many moderate men upon these discontents left them) with two Commission Officers and two Souldiers for each Regiment, of such like wise as subscribed to this Agreement. But whilst these contrivances were acted at the head-Quarters, there was a large Petition framed in the County of Essex against the

Eee 3 Army
The Agencies as they have been of the Army Party have compounded for their Disabilities and paid their Compositions, an Act of Obligation may be expelled.

And immediately after this Representation, there was brought to the Parliament from the General and his Council of Officers, an Impeachment against eleven Members of the House of Commons, (viz.) Denzel Hollis, Esq; Sir William Lewis, Sir William Weller, Sir Philip Stapleton, Sir John Clatworthy; Esq; Colonel Edward Harley, and Colonel Walter Long, for things done for the most part in the House, whereof one of the chief was, That by their power in the House, they caused the Ordinance for disbanding the Army to pass. The impeached Members declared themselves ready to answer any crime that could be objected against them, but the Officers of the Army required that they might be forthwith suspended from any longer sitting and acting as Members; but this was denied as a thing judged at this time too high, and too much against the privilege of Parliament, but when the Army reiterated their desire, those accused Members by leave of the House made a voluntary secession for six months. Concerning that Order of Parliament, That the King should go to Richmond, the General desired to be excused, intreating them not to command that till things were more quiet, and that they would appoint no residence for the King nearer to London, than they would allow the Quarters of the Army to be; after which the King was conveyed to Rayton, thence to Harfield, not long after to Caunham while the Army quartered there. Reading from whence the General with his Army marched to Bedford, the King went to the Earl of Balford's house near Osbourn, and during all this time he was received with all possible demonstrations of love and duty, and some of his Chaplains were licensed to repair to him, and read the Book of Common Prayer, as in former times, and the way was open to all those of his own party who desired to see him.

The City of London Militia as it was fet by Ordinance of the 4th of May was in the managing of Presbyterians, who were very active and indefatigable in completing their Companies both of the Trained Bands and Auxiliaries, which was rumoured by the Independents as a very dangerous Conspiracie against the Army, and the General in a Letter to the Parliament of the 10th of June requested, That the Militia of the City might be put into the hands of persons better affected to the Army: Upon which Letter the Commons up the 22nd of July Voted the repealing the said Ordinance of the 4th of May, and a new Ordinance for revising the old Militia was presently passed.

The unexpected news of this changing their Militia caused the City to meet in Common-Council, where because the repealing the former Ordinance was upon no other ground than the Army desires, they resolved to Petition the General-House of Commons against it, which they did on the 26th of July by the Sheriffs and some of the Common-Council; but it was happen'd, that about a thousand Apprentices came down two or three days.

hours after with another Petition, therein complaining, that to order the Cities Militia was the Cities Birth-right, belonging to them by charters confirmed by Parliament, for defence whereof they had advanced their lives as far as the Army, and desired the Militia might be put again into the same hands in which it was, with the Parliament and Cities confirmed by Ordinance of the 4th. of May. Upon reading of which Petition, the Lords revived the Ordinance of the 23d. of July, and renewed that of the 4th. of May, by a new Ordinance of the 26th. of July, which they presently sent down to the Commons for their contents, where some of the Apprentices in a childh heat were over-ealous to have the Ordinance pulled, referring to let some Members pass out of the House, so that as left it passed, in the affirmative about three in the afternoon, and most of the Apprentices departed, but after this some disorder in the Commons, when the House was rising, took the Speaker and thrust again into his Chair, detaining both him and the rest of the Members, until they enforced them from it, a Vote, That the King should come to London.

After this disorder the two Houses adjourned for four days, and many private Cabals were held what to do, and those that favoured the Army went thither, so that on the fourth day both the Speakers being absent, new Speakers were chosen, the Lord Hunsdon for the Peers, and Mr. Henry Pelham a Barrister for the Commons, by whom it was that day voted,

1. That the King should come to London.
2. That the Militia of London should be authorized to raise forces for defence of the City.
3. That power should be given to the same Militia to choose a General for those Forces.

It was likewise ordered, That the above said eleven Members impeached by the Army should return to their seats in Parliament. The Citizens armed with these O. ders, presently proceeded to the raising of Forces, which were to be under the Command of Sir Wiliam Waller, Major General Maffey, and Colonel Poyntz, who were each of them butts in London of Souldiers, but Waller, who was a man of good experience and foresight, seeing great numbers of Reformed Officers and Souldiers lately disbanded haggling to them, advised that they should immediately seize on all the serviceable Horses in and about London, to the number of six thousand, and bring them to the fields, where Saddles, Bridles, and Arms might be provided ready, and they would then have quickly Souldiers to mount them, and in four and twenty hours they might have a Body of Horse to join with the City Regiments, strong enough to oppose the Army if they should attempt to march out of the City and the City; and of this the Army were in great fear, but some of their friends in the Common Council did disturb their consultations, that it appeared impossible for them suddenly to raise any forces to withstand the Army, who by this time upon intelligence hereof made their approaches towards London, whereupon the Aldermen and Common Council were so terrified that they sent to the General for a pacification, which by the consent of the Members of Parliament then with him, was granted on them upon these conditions:

1. That they should deliver the Parliament unto the Army according to the 3d. of sitting, and the eleven impeached Members.
2. That they should recall their Declaration lately divulged.
3. That they should relinquish their present Militia.
4. That they should deliver up to the General all their Forces, and the Tower of London.
5. That they should disbanded all the forces they had raised: And do all things else which were necessary for the public tranquility; all which things none of them daring to deny, were presently ratified.

In the mean time the Lords and Commons who had left London, confining with the General and chief Commanders of the Army in their Order, that all Acts and Decrees that had passed on the 26th. of July and since should be accounted null and void, and that they did adhere to the Declaration of the General and Council of the Army. It was likewise decreed, that the General with his Army should march to London: and on the 6th. day of August he with his Army came to Westminister, and with him the Speakers of both Houses, together with the rest of the Lords and Commons, whom he restored all to their former Seats. Both the Speakers in the name of the whole Parliament, gave solemn thanks to the General, and made him Commander of all the Forces in England and Wales, and Constable of the Tower of London: and a month's pay was likewise given as a gratuity to the Army. The next day General Fairfax, Lieutenant General Cromwell, Major General Skippon and the rest of the Commanders with the whole Army marched through London, from the Western part thereof to the Tower, and at the Tower the General made Colonel Tichburn an Alderman of the Independent faction to be Lieutenant of the Tower, and to humble the City, the Militia's there, were by Order of Parliament divided, and authority given to Westminister, Southwark, and the Hamlets about the Tower to execute and command their own Militia's.

The Members of Parliament in this manner restored, and the Militia of London settled to the Army's good liking, the General marched out of London, and quartered his Army in the Towns and Villages adjacent, only leaving some Regiments about Whitehall and the Mews to guard the Parliament, his head-Quarters being at Putney, and the King about the middle of August was brought to the most lately all his Palaces, Hampton-Court.

But now the Members that were brought in by the Army, thought it necessary for the strengthening of their factions to proceed against all such of both Houses, of Parliament and others that were in any measure active in the late troubles, and therefore Sergeant Glyn was sent out of his Office of Recorder of London, and one Stede a Barrister of Gray-Inn admitted in his place, and Halls, Waller, Closworth, Long, Maffey, and Nicholas were commissioned to attend the House on the 16th. of October; and the Earls of Lincoln, Suffolk

Suffolk, and Middlesex, with the Lords Willoughby of Parham, Berkeley, Newcastle, and Maynard, were impeached of Treason, and committed to the Black-rod, and Sir John Mainwaring of the House of Commons, and Sir John Gayr Lord Mayor of London, with four Aldermen, Adams, Langbom, Calamy, and Bank, were also impeached and committed to the Tower, where we shall leave them for some time, and look to the affairs of Ireland during their occurrences.

The Irish when the cessation of arms was concluded with them at Singlyn in the year 1643, seemed very desirous of a peace, but by then all observation of the articles of cessation, their retainers was much impaired, for they were forced from want and acts of hostilities during that short term of a year as they had agreed to, that they often pillaged and plundered the English, imprisoning or murdering their persons, and particularly at the Castle of Wicklow, which they surprized, and put all the men, women and children therein to the sword; yet after this Treaty, they had the confidence to send Commissioners to the King to supplicate, that before the expiration of the cessation, a peace might be concluded with them, but he referred them back to his Lieutenant Ormond, and he considering the necessity of the King's affairs, and his present inability to prosecute that War, would willingly have reduced things to a pacification; but the Irish having correspondence with the Spanish and French upon the interest of the Roman Church, spun out all terms of generous desires, in hopes of supplier of men and money to be sent to them, so that in two years nothing was advanced there in, and moreover, whilst they treated with Ormond, they under-hand were upon terms of agreement with the Earl of Galmorgan, eldest Son to the Marquess of Worcester, who by a pretended Authority from the King to authorize him thereunto, granted them such conditions for the advancement of the Peepi Religion, as would have extirpated the English Clergy in that Kingdom; but Ormond upon note hereof, feized on Galmorgan, and clapt him into the Castle of Dublin, and (the King utterly disowning the authority he pretended to have) he was sequestered by the Lord Deputy (then in Ireland) of Treston; yet whilst these things were transacting, the condition of the English was not better'd, but much impared, and all the strengths in the Province of Ulster except Drogheda and Dublin, were pillaged by the Irish, so that about the time the News of the News from Newcastle, Ormond concluded a Peace with them, and upon conditions very advantageous to the Natives, but nevertheless, all of them would not submit to it; For the Popes Nuncio had drawn a great party of the most zealous of their Religion to protest against it, as a peace wherein there was not sufficient security for the free exercise of the Roman Catholic Religion; Ormond thought to profit himself of that division, and made himself ready to joy in with those that adhered to the peace to suppress the others, not doubting upon his success herein, to be master of such a force as might make the Kings terms in England easier to him; But in the midst of all these hopes, when he was ready with a party to march to Kidderminster to join with his new friends, he was informed of a design against his person, which was related to him with such circumstances, that he was confident of the truth thereof, and if he had not retreated to Dublin, he and his party had been lost; in this extremity he thought it better to put Dublin and the Forts yet in English hands, in the Parliament of England's power, than suffer them to be possessed by the Irish, and brought under a foreign jurisdiction in order whereunto, he sent to two Captains of the Parliament Ships then riding near Dublin, and imparted to them his design of complying with the Parliament, if the King would give his assent thereto, and obtain'd of them ammunition and powder for his present supply; and in further prosecution of that overtaking, having the Kings commands for so doing, he capitulated with the Parliament Commissioners, and yielded up Dublin, and what remained under his Government to their authority; who immediately sent thither Colonel Jones with 1450 House & Foot, who on the 17th of June took possession of Dublin, and from that time such supplies were sent to re-inforce the English, that every week produced news of Victory over the Irish.

Whilst the King remained at Hampton-Court, he seemed not at all a restrained man, but as a Prince living in the splendor of a Court, so freely to his pleasure were all forts of people admitted to kiss his hands, and do all obsequies whatsoever; nor did the people from London only and the adjacent Towns resort to the King, but his Chaplains and such of his Servants who by order of Parliament had been forbidden, as Mr. Abbott, and Sir John Berkley, now by permission of the Army had late resided to him, the Marquess of Ormond likewise attended him there, with an account of the Irish affairs, and was with much kindness received by him, and about the beginning of October, the Duke of Richmond, the Marquess of Hartfard, the Earl of Southampton and Dorset, and the Lord Seymour repaired to him; but the Parliament were displeased at this liberty, whereupon those Lords being told of it, after two days Abay at Hamptun Court returned to their Houses: On the seventh of September propositions agreed upon by both Houses of Parliament (the Commissioners of the Kingdom of Scotland concurring also) were sent to the King at Hampton-Court, to which they required his Answer in five days; The Commissioners appointed for this business by the Parliament of England were, the Earl of Pembroke, the Lord Montague, Sir James Harrington, Sir John Cock, Sir John Holland, and Major General Bram, and for the Kingdom of Scotland, the Earl of Lauderdale, and Sir Charles Erkina. Two days after their arrival, the King gave the Commissioners a message in writing to the two Houses of Parliament in answer to the Propositions, which was this effect, (viz.)

"That having perused the propositions now the Kings brought to him, he found them the same in effect which were offered to him at Newcastle, and followed, some of which as he could not consent without violation of his conscience and honour, to receive, and that he can agree to other now; concerning them in many respects more disagreable to the present 1647. "condition of affairs, than when they were for-mery preferred to him, and having seen the proposals of the Army to the Commissioners from the two Houses, referring with them, to which, as he conceives, they are no strangers, to be he believes they will think with him, that they much more conduct to the satisfaction of all interests, and may be a fitter foundation for keeping peace than the propositions at this time tended to him, and therefore he propounds that Commissioners may be sent from the Par-lament and the Army for a personal treaty uponthem, and such others as he shall make,

that a firm peace may be held.

This Answer was not very pleasing to the Par-lament, and it was by many thought, though the Armies proposals had the content of the General and his Council of Officers, yet the agitators who influence the body of the Soldiery, were not alluding to them; nevertheless, the Scotch took great offence at them, and affairs were vastly much perplexed more than before;
but for the better understanding of these affairs, we shall relate such of the Armies proposals as were of most consequence, and most acceptable to the King.

1. "That an Act be passed to take away all corrections, Power, Authority, and Jurisdiction of Bishops, and all other Ecclesiastical Officers whatever, extending to any civil penalties upon any, and to repeal all Laws whereby the Civil Magistracy hath been, or is bound upon any Ecclesiastical censure to proceed ( as efficient) unto any civil penalties against any persons so cenured.

2. "That there be a repeal of all Acts or Clauses in any Act, enjoying the use of the Common Prayer, and imposing any penalties for neglect thereof, as also of all Acts or Clauses in any Act imposing any penalties for not coming to Church, or for meeting elsewhere, for prayer, or other religious duties, exercises or ordinances, and some other provision to be made for discovering of Papists, and Papists Receivers; and for disabling of them and all Jeptates and Priests from disturbing the State.

3. "That the taking of the Covenant be not enforced upon any, nor any penalties imposed upon the refusers, whereby men might be constrained to take it against their judgement or consciences; but all orders or ordinances tending to that purpose to be repealed.

4. "The things here before being provided,
for setting and securing the Rights, Liberties, Peace and Safety of the Kingdom, his Majesty's Person, his Queen, and Royal Issue may be restored to condition of safety, honour and freedom in this Nation, without diminution to their personal Rights, or further limitation to the Exercize of the Regal Power then according to the particulars before going.

5. "That a letter number out of the persons excepted in the two first qualifications of the Parliaments late propositions to the King, not exceeding five for the English ( being nominated particularly by the Parliament, who take-get with the persons in the Irish Rebellion in the third qualification) may be referred to the further Judgement of the Parliament, as they shall find cause. All other excepted persons to be remitted from the exceptions, and admitted to composition.

6. "That the rates of all future compositions may be lightened and limited not to exceed the several propositions hereafter exprested respectively: That is to say, 1. For all persons formerly excepted not above a third part.
2. For the late Members of Parliament under the first branch of the fourth qualification in the propositions, a fourth part. 3. For other Members of Parliament in the second and third branches of the same qualification, a sixth part.
4. For the persons nominated in the said fourth qualification, and those included in the tenth qualifications in eighth part; and that Real debs either upon Record, or proved by Witnesses, be considered, and stated in the valuation of their Estates in all the cases aforsaid.

7. "That those who shall hereafter come to compound, may not have the Covenant put upon them, as a condition without which they may not compound; but in case they shall not willingly take it, they may pay their composition without it.

8. "That the Persons and Estates of all Eng-ish not worth two hundred pounds in Lands or Goods, be at liberty, and discharged, and that the King's menial Servants, that never took up Arms, but only attended his Person, according to their Offices, may be freed from composition, or to pay (at most) but the proportion of one year's Revenues, or a twentieth part.

9. "That in order to the making and perfeing of compositions for delinquency at the rates aforesaid, the Rent, Revenues, and other dues and profits of all sequestr'd Estates whatever (except the Estates of such persons who shall be continued under exception as before) be from henceforth suspended and detained in the hands of the respective Tenants and Occupiers, and others from whence they are due for the space of six months following.

10. "That the faith of the Army, or other Forces of the Parliament given in Articles upon surrender to any of the Kings party, may be fully made good, and where any breach thereof shall appear to have been made, full reparations shall be made, and the persons in the parties injured, and the person offending being found out, may be compell'd thereunto.

II. "That there may be a General Act of Obfirmion to extend unto all (except the persons to be continued in exception as before) to abridge from all trepasses, misdemeanors, &c.
done in prosecution of the War, and from all troubles
The Actment of the Scots at their Proposals, which was touched at before, was chiefly manifested in a Remonstrance about this time made by the Commissioners of the General Assembly to their Committee of Elators, wherein among other things they declared;

The Scots Remonstrance.

That his Majesty moving the Propositions of both Kingdoms, and pestilizing the Proposals of the Army to be the sum of a Treat, to do much increase the Danger of Religion, seeing those Proposals, as they were and abandon the former defects of both Kingdoms in point of Religion, as they cannot accord (as the words stand) the continuance of Pretences, the toleration of Here and Sells, and the taking away the Ordinance enjoying the taking of the Covenant.

And a little further they thus express themselves:

These dangers of Religion we have insisted on as being so proper for us to speak to, but not as if we were insensible of the great danger of the King's person and of Monarchical Government, for preserving of which, according to our Covenant, our prayer and left endeavours shall not be wanting, and now the danger of Religion is so great and the grounds of our Care and apprehensions so pregnant as cannot least be esteemed and known for your Lordships in the bowels of Jesus Christ, and by the Pows of God which are upon you, that as your Lordships desire God and your own Conveniences and Safety, may not afterwards charge upon you the Ruins of Religion, King, and Kingdom; so your Lordships may be very tender and conscientious that no such design be entertained or get place amongst you, as tendeth to the disabbling of this Church and Kingdom from an effectual preserving and promoting the ends of the Covenant, or to the strengthening and enabling the enemies thereof by affording them the opportunity which they wait for to disturb the peace, and destroy the present Reformation: these and no better effects can be looked for, if the Army in this Kingdom, which hath been so bless'd of God, and so faithful to you, shall be disturb'd before this cause of God, which so much concerneth his Glory, the Reformation and the Defence of Religion, the Peace and Safety of the Kingdom, the honour and happiness of the King be fet upon a firm foundation.

The Earl of Lauderdale attended the King at Hampton-Court, and gave him full information of all these matters, and so far represented to him the uncertainty of his condition in reference to the Army, which became now by the practices of some base men very ungovernable, that he began to incline rather to the Scots; and the Commissioners of Scotland residing at London sent Letters to the Parliament dated November the 5th, in which they prefixed very much that the King might come to London and treat personally with the Parliament about the things controverted; urging for reasons thereof, because the King had been taken from Holden against his will, and without the consent of the Parliament, by the violence of the Soldiers, and still remained under the power of an Army, not in that freedom which was thought fit for a King, treating about a business of so great moment; but if it might not be thought convenient for his coming to London, that he may continue at Hampton-Court, so he be not under the power of the Army, but in such a condition as the Commissioners of both Parliaments might have a free conference with him.

The Agitators were much alarm'd at this interpretation of the Scots, and their keeping up their Army in Scotland, and from hence they became more violent than before in their practices against the King, which they expressed in several proposals to the General Council of Officers; and about this time in one of their debates at a General Council at Purvey it was proposed.

Whether it were safe either for the Army or the people to suffer any power to be given to the King: and in the discussion of this, it was said openly in the Council,

That they had gone about to make a Black-a-moor whether he would or not, and to set up a Power which God would destroy; that the power of Kings was a burthen some stone that would destroy all who vorther should fall upon it.

That the reason of their discontents in Council was from a compliance to save that man of Blood (meaning the King) and those principles of Tyranny which God from Heaven by his many significances had manifestly declared against.

All remembering the Covenanters, who had been well to the King, did what they could to oppose these proceedings, but the storm was too strong against them, & the King having from time to time notice of these agitations, thought it not imprudent to provide (see it should be too late) for his own safety, and by advice of Sir John Berkely, Colonel Legg, and Mr. Abbronham (who he then much trusted) he resolved to attempt to get to Jersey; and for the effecting thereof a Ship was provided somewhere about Southamton for his transportation; but before he took this resolution he thought fit to retract an Engagement made by Mr. Abbronham on his behalf not to depart from the Army without their consent, which we shall relate in Mr. Abbronham's own words:

When the differences of the Army grew great, and an active and powerful party thereof daily menacing violence to his Majesties person, his Majesty commanded me to return the Engagement which I had formerly given, alleging to Colonel Whalley affirmed to him, that the Officers of the Army had so little power to persuade him, as that they were scarce able to keep themselves from affronts; whereupon having found Colonel Whalley walking by the river side near Hampton-Court, I told him that I came to withdraw that word which I had given him for his Majesty not leaving the Army without their consent; the Colonel said, why then the King doth so? and I told him you are to understand it so. He added, it was fairly done, and he would take notice of it accordingly. This being done and the Ship and Horses and other convenience for the Kings escape in prepartion, he resolved to take the first opportunity he could to get his liberty, but hearing of some passages at the meeting of the Officers at Purvey, on the 11th of November, tending to the destruction of his person: (where Colonel Harison made a long narration concerning some things that lay upon his spirit, in relation to the King, Lords, and some saying, That the King was a man of blood, and therefore the engagements to him were taken off, and that they were to prosecute him: and that on the same day the Agitators of nine Regiments and the Generals Life-Guard, had prepared a Letter of the same strain by way of narrative to all the Soldiery of the Army, to draw them to a general rendezvous to declare against any settlement with the King.) he resolved that evening to remove himself, and accordingly about eight o'clock at night he got away, having Horatio laid ready to receive him on the other side of the River, and about nine o'clock, whilst the Commissioners of Parliament and Colonel Weekley (who commanded the Guard) expected when he should come out of his Chamber to Supper, and wondered at his long stay, at last some of them going in, and not finding the King, they found his Clock left there, and a Letter written with his own hand to the Commissioners to be by them communicated to both Houses of Parliament, Cromwell about midnight dispatched a Letter to the Speaker of the House of Commons with notice of the Kings departure: In the Kings letter to the Parliament, after he had discoursed somewhat about Captivity, & the wretchedness of Liberty, he protested (as before God) That he had not taken this design of withdrawing himself to disturb the public peace, nor any tendency tending to the establishment thereof, but only to preserve his own safety, against which he understood there was a treasonable Conspiracie. But towards the end of the Letter are these words, Now as I cannot deny that my personal safety is the urgent cause of this my retirement, so I take God as witness, that the public peace, is no less before mine eyes: and I can add no better way to express this my profession, (I know not what a wiser man may do) then by desiring and urging that all chief interests may be heard, to the end each may have just satisfaction: As for example, the Army (for the rest though necessary, yet I suppose are not difficult to confess) ought (in my judgment) to enjoy the liberty of their Conferences, and have an Act of Oblivion Indemnity, (which should extend to the rest of all my Subjects, and that all their Arrears should be paid, and duly paid, which I will undertake to do, so I may be heard, and that I be not blinded from using such lawful and honest means as I shall judge: To conclude, let me be heard with freedom, honour and safety, and I shall entirely resign myself, under the sound of retirement, and from my self to be Peter Patric. CHARLES Rex.

HAMMOND Gouverneur of the Isle of Wight, de-

At the Courts of Southampton-Buzzo.

The Parliament were well pleased to hear of the Kings being at Court, and ordered thereupon on the 16th of November.

1. That he should continue there and in the Castle.

2. That none that have borne arms against the Parliament but Inhabitants that have compounded shall remain in that Island.

3. That no Delinquent or Foreign should be admitted to come to him without leave of the Parliament of England and Scotland, and then appropriations should be speedily sent to him.

4. That for those and sundry shall be advanced for his accommodation: And,

5. That is should be considered who should attend his person.

In the little space of time betwixt the Kings departure from Hampton-Court, and his arrival at Coney-Castle in the Isle of Wight many great tempests appeared in the Army, which had been growing some while before, on this occasion. The Agitators having some jealousy, that Cromwell and Ireton and the rest of the General Officers designed to establish the King (and being acted and guided by divers persons not of the Army that were for a total subversion of Monarchical Government) disliked the Soldiery with much prejudice against them, as that they had fallen from their Principles, and were in their proceedings false and treacherous both to the Army and Kingdom, and by federal instructions of this kind which they dispersed printed papers they had made greater seditions and parties in the Army and much divided the Soldiery from the Officers, and both Officers and Soldiery amongst themselves; their disorders and discourses were much encouraged by the repair of the Agitators to the head Quarters, where they attended as a kind of Representative Council, and debated divers matters of great concernment: But the General doubting the event of these practices, and being willing to quiet the discourses then growing amongst the Soldiery, in the first place, dismissioned the Agitators to their several Regiments, and sent also most of the Officers then at the Head-Quarters to their respective and particular chas.

The Souldiers mutiny against their Officers.

The principal of them shot to death.

The King's letters from the Isle of Wight to the Parliament.

The four previous Acts were these:

1. An Act for raising, setting, and maintaining Forces by Sea and Land within the Kingdom of England and Ireland, and Dominion of Wales, &c.

2. An Act for recalling of all Declarations, Oaths, and Proclamations against the Parliament, or those who have aderred to them.

3. An Act, That those Peers who were made after the Great Seal was carried from the Parliament, may be made incapable of sitting in the House of Peers.

4. That Power may be given to the Two Houses to adjourn themselves as they shall think fit.

The first of these Acts was concerning the Militia, which devised the King, his Heirs and Successors of the power thereof for ever; for though it seem'd to be but for twenty years, yet if it lasted, that neither the King nor his Heirs or Successors, nor any other shall exercise any power over the Militia by Land or Sea, but such as shall act by Authority and Appointment of the Lords and Commons: It gives also an unlimited power to the two Houses to raise what Forces, and what number for Land and Sea, and of what persons (without exceptions) they please, and to employ them as they shall judge fit, and to raise what Money they please for maintaining them. The tides of the other Acts do sufficiently discover the nature of them, and therefore we shall not enlarge upon them: The Commissioners of Scotland would in no wise give their consent that these four Acts should be imposed on the King before he treated at London; and in a large declaration they protested against it, notwithstanding which, they were sent by the Earl of Denbigh, the Lord Montague, Mr. Lisle, Mr. Goodwin, Mr. Buckingham, and Mr. Kemp Commissioners from both Houses of Parliament, and on the 24th of December they were preferred to the King at Carpenters' Hall, but he insisting to force all interests, and finding the Scots openly to protest against them, refused to give his assent to any Acts till the whole peace should be concluded; and the Commissioners returned to London with their desay. The Army after the Rendezvous near Wight, had another some days after near King's Lynn, and from thence they marched to Wisbech, where the head-quarters for some time remained, and the chief Officers had many consultations about the present transactions between the King and the Parliament, for Cromwell and Ireton finding the Interest of the Scots was likely to be

be join'd with that of the King, and that the Civility of London was very favourable to them, they feared a downfall to their greatness, if they did not prevent the progress thereof, and strengthen themselves by drawing the inferior Officers and Soldiers who were much acted by the late mutinies against the King and, his Government, to have a good opinion of them; to effect which, as a pretence to procure a unity in the Army, a Full was solemnly kept amongst the Officers, and a whole day spent in Prayer and Preaching, and at the close thereof, all their officers that were concerned for the matter at issue, in the mind of God, were let at liberty, when as one well knowing in those affairs, published: "They had without doubt refused it before as the only expedient to re-imburse their last reputation; for if the King would have taken their price, to let Cromwell and Ireton Rule and Reign under him, no doubt but he might have come in, but because the Scots feared if because in by those Grandees of the Army, they and he might join together to effect them for all their old former provocations, and therefore out of mere safety (it may be) they outbid the Grandees to gain the Kings affection, which made them mad.

This much is related in a print and to manifest this practice, Cromwell and Ireton being present in the House of Commons when the Kings Answer was read, Ireton said: That the King had denied safety and protection to his people by denying the four Bills, That subjection to him was but in a sense, his protection to his people; this being denied, they might well deny any more subjection to him, and settle the Kingdom without him: That it was now expected after so long Patience, they should then their Resolutions, and not desist those valiant men who had engaged for them beyond all possibility of retreat, and would never forsake the Parliament, unless they took them first; and in the conclusion be prof'd for a Question to be put, That no more Address or application should be made to the King: This discourse was received with much admiration of many that had observ'd the late motions of the Army, and their declarations, who knew how contrary this his speech was from what he had often before affected on behalf of the King, and that most of these declarations were penned by him, in one of which were these words: "We do hereby profess we do not see how there can be any Peace to the Kingdom firm or lasting, without a due consideration of and provision for the Rights, Quiet, and Immunity of his Majesties Royal Family, and his late Partners: And in many others there were the like expressions, besides what was contained in the Armies proposals before recited; but now, Tho' that choice by Arms to compass their ends upon the King, began too late to discover, That the Government by an Army would introduce at last (as in the Roman State it did) The Army to be Masters of Government, This debate of non-addresses was very long in agitation, for it continued from nine in the morning till seven at night, and when the House was ready for a question, Cromwell spake to this purpose;

That it was now expost the Parliament should govern and defend the Kingdom by their own power and resolutions, and not teach the People any longer to expect safety and government from an arbitrary man, whose heart God had hardened; That those men who had defended the Parliament from so many dangers with the expense of their blood, would defend them therein with fidelity and courage against all opposition. Teach them not by neg-lecting your own and the Kingdome's safety (in which their own is involved) to think themselves betrayed, and left hereafter to the rage and malice of an incorrigible enemy, whom they have published for your sake; and therefore are likely to find his future government of them insupportable, and fuller of Revenge than justice, left despair teach them to seek their safety by some other means than ad-hering to you, who will not stick to your selves, and how detestable such a resolution in them will be to you all, I tremble to think, and leave you to judge:
And to enforce this Speech, at the later end thereof, in a kind of menacing manner, he laid his hand upon his sword; and in the end, a Declaration, and Votes were passed, which were after much debate attested to by the Lords; in these words:

The Lords and Commons assembled in Parliament, after many Addresses to his Majesty for the preventing and ending this unnatural war, raised by him against the Parliament and Kingdoms, have lately sent four Bills to his Majesty, which did contain only matters of safety and security to the Parliament and Kingdoms, referring the comparison of other differences to a personal Treaty between his Majesty, and those Assemblys, which do not rest upon a sufficient foundation, do hold themselves obliged to use their utmost endeavors, speedily to settle the present Government in such a way, as may bring the greatest security to this Kingdom, in the enjoyment of the Laws and Liberties thereof. And in order therewith, and that the House may receive no delay nor interruptions in so great and necessary a work, they have taken these Resolutions, and passed these Votes following, viz.

The Lords and Commons do declare, That they will make no further Addresses or Application to the King.

Resolved, &c. By the Lords and Commons assembled in Parliament, That no Application or Address be made to the King by any person whatsoever without the leave of both Houses.

Resolved, &c. By the Lords and Commons assembled in Parliament, That the person or persons that shall make breach of this Order, shall incur the penalty of High Treason.

Resolved, &c. That the Lords and Commons do declare, That they will receive no more any message from the King; and do enjoin, That no person whatsoever do presume to receive or bring any Message from the King to both or either of the Houses of Parliament, or any other person.

Within few days after these Votes of Parliament were published; and in compliance with them, a Declaration of the General, and General Council of the Army was made, and presented to the Parliament, in the close whereof it was thus express'd:

Fff 3
The Reign of King Charles the First.

1648. We do freely declare (for our selves and the Army, and in what should be further necessary for perfecting thereof, and for settling and securing of the Parliament and Kingdom, without the King, and against him or any other that should hereafter partake with him.

The Parliament also made a publick Declaration about the beginning of February with many injudicious arguments against it, and the laying open all those errors of his Government together, which they had with virulence and malice formerly published in parcels, but the more foster part of the people knew too well by what art the Councillors which produced these actions were framed to be perverted by them, and so great were the discontents in the City of London and the suburbs thereof that part of the Army was quartered about Pembreniner, the Acons and other places of the City for fear of Insurrections; and the month before these high transactions, 7 Lords & 13 of the House of Commons were chosen out of both Houses to sit as a Committee in Derby-House (where the Committee of both Kingdoms of England and Scotland had met before) who were impowered to suppress tumults and insurrections, and to that purpose to raise forces as they saw occasion; the names of these were, the Earl of Northumberland, Kent, Wurcetick, and Mancroft, and the Lord Say, Shore, and Marriage, and of the Commons, Sir Henry Vane Senior, Sir Henry Vane Junior, Sir William Aris, Sir Arthur Hasling, Sir Gilbert Gerald, Sir J. John Essex, Lieutenant General Cromwell, Nathaniel Fine, William Phipps, and Oliver St. John Esquires, Mr. Crew, Mr. Brown and Mr. Walley, these were pretty equally made up of Presbyterian and Independents; but the latter seemed to be most prevalent by the influence of the Army, but they were les violent in their actions, than otherwise they would, that they might not too much exasperate the Scots, for their Commissioners had about this time, repeating the four Votes against the King, propounded to know, whether the House by their Votes, that no person whatsoever do presume to make, or receive any application or address to, or from the King, would deiear the Scottish make or receive any address to, or from him, and suppose an incapacity upon him to perform Acts of Government in their stead, this Message caused great debate, but at last it was contented to, That the Scotch Commissioners might make address to the King; but these carriage in the House of Commons made the Army and their Independent friends out how to suppress or terrifie the Presbyterian, who in that House notwithstanding all the Military means, were yet the major part, though least active; and to effect this, about the beginning of March the Lords sent a Message to the Commons (which had been six months before rejected) to defire their concurrence to an Inagrement of all Members that fled to the Army; and die with the Army, which after eight hours debate was carried by nine voices in the affirmative, when there were near two hundred present, after many Presbyterians, who were aye by threat of some of the Armies Creatures, had left the House because it was late, not daring to Vote in the Negative; and was inmutated that if they had not approved of the Inagrement, a new charge would be exhibited by the Army to the Lords against the principal oppo- lters, which prevailed upon the weakness of many, though the wiser for believing not they durst attempt any such thing, for many arguments at this time were published against those proceedings, very well received by the people, some of which went so high as not to allow the Lords any judici- cature over the Commons; but others agreed, that, Still, today, that the House of Peers was a Court of judicature, but not without the King's special authority granted to them either by his right, or by his Com- mission; and the Lords by the Four Votes before mentioned, having denied all further address or application to the King, had cut off from themselves that fountain from which they derived all their power. During these prativities, to encrease and strengthen the Independent party, the discontent- ments of the people were much augmented in all places, against the Parliament and Army for their levanty against the King, for upon his denial to attend to the four Bills or Acts lately sent to him, the Governor removed most of his Servants from him, and restrained him to the Circuit of the Court within the Walls, and though he did it at first without the Authority of the Parliament, yet they afterwards approved of the act, which in the Island being necerst to the view of this usage, were very much offended with it, and one Captain Berleigh lately an officer in the Kings Army and an Inhabitant there, beat a Drum in Newport to draw some Soulers together to rescue the King, but being too hasty in the attempt, his endeavours were frustrated, and he himself was taken prisoner, and that took part with him and suppressed: he was after some time sent in custody to Winchester, where by a special Commission of Oyer and Terminer directed to Sergeant Wild of Winchester the then Chief Baron and others; he was tried and condemned of High Treason, and on the 10th of February injuriously executed for the same.

The King in this condition set forth a declaration to all his Subjects, which inflaged his irac- cussion towards them, and in that towards the end he thus expresseth himself (viz.).

"By what means or occasion I am come to this appearance in my affairs, I am utterly to seek, especially when I consider that I have sacrificed my two Houes of Parliament (for the peace of my Kingdom) at all, but what is much more dear to me than my life, my Conscience and Honor, defining nothing more, than to perform it in the most proper and natural way, A perio- nal Treaty; but that which makes me most at a loss is, the remembrance my signal compliance with the Army and their Interets, and of what importance my compliance was to them, and their often repeated protestations and engage- ments for my just rights in general, at New- Markett and St. Albans, and their particular explanations of these generals by their voted and revoluted proposals which I had reason to understand should be the utmost extremity would would be expected from me, and that in something therein I should be eased, (herein appealing to the conicences of some of the chiefl Officers in the Army, if what I have said, be not punctually true) and how I have failed of their expectations, or my professions to them, I challenge them, and the whole World, to produce the least colour of reason.
And now, I would know what it is that is defired: Is it peace? I have thew the way, (being both willing and fitness to perform my part in it,) which is a just compliance with all chief interests: Is it plenty and happiness, they are the inseparrable effects of Peace? Is it security? 1, who with all men would forget and forgive like me, have offered the Militia for my time: Is it liberty of Conscience?
He who wants it, is not ready to give it: Is it the right Administration of Justice? Offices of Truf are committed to the choice of my two Hontes of Parliament: Is it the Arrears of the Army? upon a settlement they will certainly be paid with much ease, but before, there will be found much difficulty, if not impofi-bility in it.
Thus, all the World cannot but fee my real and unwearied endeavours for Peace, the which, (by the Grace of God) I shall neither repeat me, nor never beackers in, notwithstanding my past, present, or future sufferings. But if I may not be heard, let every one judge, who it is that obstructs the good I would or might do; What is it that men are afraid to hear from me? It cannot be reason, (at least, nome will declare themselves so unreasonable as to confeder it) and it can be, lie importinent or unreasonable discontent; for thereby peradvventure I might more justly this my Refrain, than the cauters themselves can do; so that of all wonders, this is the greatest to me:
But it may be easily gathered hence, how these men intend to govern, who have used me thus,
And if it be my hard fate to fall together with the liberty of this Kingdom, I shall not blash for my self, but much lament the future mis-teries of my people, the which I shall fill pray
God to avert, what ever becomes of me.

During the time of those restraints, he betook himself to meditation, and then composed that molt excellent Book, entitled, "Embo Basanii, or, The Restoration of his Sacred Majesty in His Solitude and Sufferings."

About the month of June last, The Parliament sent visitors to the University of Oxford, but their authority was not submitted to by the Members thereof, who alleged that they could not acknowledge any visitors but the King, or his im-mediates, to substitute, without manifest perjuries, but about the beginning of April this year. The Earl of Pembroke being lately before by Vote or Ordinance of the two Hontes, made Chancellor of the University, reforted thither with some others that were with him made Visitors, and being armed with the authority of a vote of the Lords and Commons to expel all such Masters, Fellows, and Officers of Colledges, as refused to submit to their power. The next day after his arrival, he went to Christ-Church Colledge, and there by force removed the Dean, and all the Canons and Students that did not comply with him, and take the Covanent, and put others in their places, and in the like manner he proceeded in the Colledges of All-Souls, St. Mary Magdalen, and New-Colledges, and in all other Colledges and Halls, by displacing those that did not submit, and putting others in their places.

This Summer the King, though a Prisoner, was as formidable as ever since the beginning of his troubles, and many of the more moderate of his Subjects of both Kingdoms, which before had joined in Arms against him, began to look upon his estate with consideration, and they and others attempted by force to try their fortunes on his behalf. And first, an Insurrection was made in London, where some Apprentices in More-fields let upon a part of the Trained-Band who were there keeping Guard, and over-powred them, by which success their numbers hourly increased, and they divided themselves into two or three bodies, one whereof (which was the most considerable) having born before them an Ensign which they took from the Trained-Bands, march'd towards White-Hall, but being without any Arms but Sticks, a Troop of Horse from the Men's charg'd and dispersed them; yet at night they joined again, and surpriz'd Newgate and Ludd-gate, and shut up the Gates thereof, and seiz'd a Drake-piece from the Lord Mayors House, which they planted within Ludd-gate, being animated hereinto by some of the Army, to make their Conquest of them more Remarkable: The morning following, they laboured to get Arms, and brake open some Sale-ments Houses of Ammunition, and maffered the Magazine at Leaden-Hall, crying out in a tumultuous manner, For God and King Charles, but the next day General Fairfax entr'd Alder- gate with two Regiments, and marched to Leaden-Hall-street, and there charged this undisciplin'd multitude; who after a short Skirmish, were utterly dispersed, with little or no loss to the Affailants.

In South-Wales, about this time, Colonel Poyer Governor of Pembroke Castle, refused to yield up his Charge (though commanded thereunto) but the better to countenance his intention, his first pretences were to have the Arrears of him and his Souldiers paid to him, but this produced some expostulatory Letters betwixt him and the Parliament, and in the mean time he fortified the Castle, and stored it with provision for a defence, and Major General Langhorn, for the same rea-on, refused to disbarr his men, and so both resolved to run the same fortune. Langhorn forpriz'd Tenby Castle with the Parliament Commissoners therein; and for the support of the Souldiers, they raised contribution out the neighboring parts, and delivered for the King, to whom one Colonel Powel, a valiant Souldier of that Country, joynd. Colonel Horton was sent by Fairfax Commander in chief against them, with thirty Companies of Horse and Foot, who sent out Adjutant General Fleming to charge them, who when he came near, went to gain a Pafs from Poyer, which he found quitto to his hands, and gang on improvidently, he fell into an Ambuscade which Poyer had laid, whereby his men were disordered, and he with some few of them compell'd to thither in a neighbo'ring church, but perceiving himself unable to hold it out, he died (as it is thought) by his own sword, and the rest were taken prisoners: This successe was attended with the surprize of Cheepdoor Castle, which was taken by Sir Tho. Keynsham for the King, in the Governours absence. And now Fairfax thought a greater force was required than those with Horton to reduce South-Wales, and therefore Cromwell himself, was ordered to march with a strong power into that Country; but when the news of his advance came to Langhorne, he thought it best to fight Horton before his coming, and the other as willingly marched to meet him, and near St. Fagans on the eighth of May, the two Armies came in sight of one another, Langhorne had very much the other, but not well armed nor disciplin'd, and for that he did not so soon expect Horton, the conquest was the easier, for as soon as his men were charged, after a little resistance, Horton's men obtained a victory, in which they killed and took 1,500 Officers, and 3,000 Common Soldiers, Langhorne himself, and Powel, escaped by flight, Lieutenant General Cromwell entered Wales shortly after this, and formed ten by Castle, which yielded upon mercy, and Cheepdoor Castle was retaken by Colonel Enner, and from thence he marched to besiege Pembroke. Castle: Sir John Owen, whilst Cromwell besieged Pembroke Castle, got together some Forces in North Wales for the King, which the Sheriff would have suppress'd, but being too weak, was defeated, & taken prisoner by him; but shortly after, the same fortune befell Owen himself, by the Forces of Major General Milton. Pembroke Town and Castle held out courageously for a long time, but at length were so distressed, that they willingly would have surrendered, if they could have had any other Conditions, than to yield upon discretion; and to force them thereunto, Cromwell gave a furious assault to the place, which the besieged resolutely endured: But upon News that Duke Hamilton was preparing to march into England with an Army of Scots, he became incitative to give them better terms, and thereupon the Town and Castle was delivered up to him July 13 & 14, on these terms (viz.) Powel, Langhorne, Poater, and three other principal Actors, to submit to the Parliaments mercy: the other Commanders, Knights and Gentlemen, to depart the Kingdom within six weeks, for two years, the reft to return to their respective dwellings, and the Townsmen to enjoy their freedom and Liberties: Those that submitted to mercy, were afterwards tied as Traitors, notwithstanding the Prince's Letter in their behalf to General Fairfax; But his cruel favour was extended towards them, that they should cast lots for their lives, and to only Poater suffered.

April 30, The Duke of York, disguised in Women's Apparel, made his Escape from St. James's by Water, and landed at Dorn in Holland, by help of one Mr. Rumpfield, sent out purposely on that design by the Queen. Whilft some by Arms were endeavoring to free their Country, others attempted by Petitions in a mild way to obtain that by favour, which would not without great hazard and effusion of blood be procured by force: The County of Essex was the first that began, who succed's the 1653, Parliament, that the Army might be paid and disband'd, and the King admitted to a personal Trial; Surrey followed, and defined the like, but in higher Terms; and being numerous, a quarrel was made with the Southerns of Effingham, who came to keep guard against them, words were at first the weapons used, but in the end they came to blows; and some hurt was done on both sides; but night parted the Fray: The City of London succeeded next, and petitioned to the same effect; and also resolved, that thei' Prisoners who stood committed for their former defiance when the Parliament went out to the Army, might be released, as shortly after they were; and upon the Citys concert profession to adhere to the Parliament, their Militia was restored, and Major General Skippon was appointed Major General thereof; and of all the Forces within the late Lines of Communication; the Lieutenant of the Tower put in by the Army, was also discharged, and Mr. Woolf a Citizen, furtogated in his place; and because alarms of insurrections came from all parts, the General was easily intreated to draw off all the Forces he had from White-Hall and the Menz, and any other parts of London, or the late Lines of Communication upon the Citys promis to order a Guard for the Parliament, which they readily performed, and setted six hundred pounders yearly on their Major General for his entertainment.

The Kentish men finding the threat of Surrey so ill treated when they came in a peaceable manner to Petition the Parliament, resolved to make their demand with Swords in their hands, and to that purpose a numerous body of them were drawn together, against whom the Lord Fairfax (for so he was now by his Fathers death) marched with six thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse, the Kentish were ten thousand, but undisputedly they parted their Forces, and went away a Brigade to besiege Dover Castle, the General advanced, and defeated some of them between Crawford-Hall and Graversend, and from thence he sent Major Husbands before, who gained a piaisage over a Bridge at Northfield, and took some Prisoners; Fairfax followed, marching in a full body, expeting the Kentish, (who hovered in sight of him) would have engaged, but they were not prepared for it, and so without any resistance, he came near Maidstone, in which the Kentish men were drawn up into a Body, and had planted some great Guns, and barrocolled the avenues of the Town.

Fairfax having his Army by this time encreased to seven thousand, on the second of June at four o'clock at night from the Town, which was both times repulld, but the third time he got entrance, yet then the fight was more perilous than before, whilst the Parliament had to do only with those who manned the Streets, but were also galld with continual shot from the Houlies, getting all by inches, nor could they istnade the Town till after six hours fight, and much loffe on their own side: But of the Kentish, two hundred were slain, and above one thousand and three hundred taken Prisoners, with four hundred Horse, and eight piece's of Ordnance, and good Boody; and presently upon this, Rochefler was also quittd
...but the Duke of Buckingham retired towards Lincolnshire, and escaped beyond seas; Castleferry yet held out courageously, making frequent Sallies upon the besiegers with indifferent Successes and good hopes of relief from the North; for the Parliament of Scotland had far over ever since the second of March, and were much dissatisfied at the English proceedings in reference to the King, which was not a little encroached by the report of their Commissioners now returned, so that notwithstanding that the Parliament of England made them fair offers concerning the payment of the money due upon account of their Auxiliary Armies, both in England and Scotland, and on the four and twentieth day of July paid an Ordinance to establish the Presbyterian Government in England and Ireland (viz.) under Classical Provincial, and Parochial Assemblies: yet and would not receive, for they had framed a Committee of Danger, to consult of their affairs in relation to the Parliament of England, the Major part whereof being of Hampton, Voted a War, and the Scots published a Declaration, wherein they proposed:

That the King may come to London, or some of the Component, and this with Safety.

That special care be made for his carriage away, or satisfaction by punishing them that did it.

That the Army under the Lord Fairfax be dismissed.

That Presbytery be settled, and Settlers punished.

That all Members of the House be restored.

These actions drew many of the Kings party from the Northern parts to Edinburgh, and Wigton; a Captain in the English Army marched to them with his Troop, and fifty foot, and two Companies of Foot landed out of Ireland at Catterick, and marched thither also; moreover Warwick was further besieged by some Royalists, and Sir Thomas Graham, and Sir Philip Mainfraser raised forces for the King in Westmorland and Cumberland, with which they seized on Carlisle, and with them joined Sir Marmaduke Langdale, with some Horse, being commissioned to be General of the English forces for the King, with which now encamped to three thousand, he coated about the Northern Counties.

July the thirteenth, a Scots Army under Duke Hamilton entered England, the Van was brought up by the Duke himself, the Main Body by Major General Middleton, and the Rear by the Earl of Calder, these joined with Langdale, and fell upon Major General Lamers then Appleby, and forced him to retire into the Town, from thence he retreated to Kirkby-Sweten and after to Tatters, leaving some of his forces behind him, to defend the Castle, which was besieged and taken August 7, by Sir Philip Mainwra, Colonel Boson Governor of Scarcroft Castle declared for the King, and Pomfret Castle was taken by Major Morgan, in Timnosh Castle, Lieutenant Colonel Henry Lilburne declared for the King, but the Castle was suddenly retaken by Sir Arthur Haslerig.

The Scots fired some time at Kendal in Westmorland, and Major General Lambert's Army encamped daily with additional forces, and Lieutenant General Cromwell having quieted Wales, marched to join with him, and in his way took Pomfret Town, but not the Castle; Hamilton left Kendal and marched into Lancashire, intending for London, which the English Army resolved to hinder, and therefore marched to Preston, where Hamilton and Langdale lay with their fors, reported to be twenty thousand strong, Cromwell and Lamers, not joined were reckoned to have five thousand Horse and Dragoons, and seven thousand Foot. Aug
8 the 17. both Armies faced one another, Major Smithson Commanded the foresmold of the English, who charged furiosously on the Scots Van, and routed them, and alarmed the whole Army, and so the Battels joined on a Moor two miles East of Preston and the fire was very hot for two hours, and then the Scots gave round, which encouraged the English to pursue them, and that so fiercely, that they were forced to divide, one part being a Body of three thousand Horse, moved towards Lancaster, and was followed and disperred by Colonel Twisten and Colonel Thornhill (who took multitudes of them prisoners;) and the other part Horse and foot marched over the River Ribble, whom the Main of the English Army followed, and at Rible-Bridge the Scots made a stand, defending the pasts hourly for two hours, even to the path of Pike, but were then constrained to retire. The next morning the Scots drew up a Hill on the side of Preston, when being forced by the English, they fled in great disorder to H recommes, which they plundered, and the next morning after marched towards Warrington (the English pursing all the way,) next Warrington the Scots taking advantage of a Past, made another halt, but were again beaten with the loss of a thousand men, and were pursed to the very Bridge, where the foot in number 4000. being defeated by the Horse, laid down their Arms and submitted to mercy, Hamilton got away with three thousand Horse to Nantwich, where the Country being in Arms feized upon most of them; Lieutenant General Cromwell marched towards Camberland, to meet Morant who was marching with a Reserve of Scots, giving order to all the Parliament Commanders in these Counties to follow the flying Scots, by some of whom Major General Middleton who commanded four hundred Horse was de-tested and taken prisoner, and the rest dispersed: Hamilton himself was met with at Nantwich, and made to submit to mercy by the Lord Gray of Cromwell, who sent him prisoner to Asby de la Couch, by this days light, the English took more prisoners than their whole Army amounted to.

On the 10th the Scots suffered a great loss, and came to Darom, where they met and engaged in Westminister-Hall, by the Earl of St. Mary's, whose Langdale was apprehended in an inn: Cromwell improved his successes, and came to Darom, where they met and engaged.

Cromwell entered Scotland by their invite-ment, and to smooth his way, he published the following Declaration:

Whereas we are marching with the Forces of the nation,
Parliament of England into the Kingdom of Scotland, in pursuance of the remaining part of the Enemy, who lately invaded the Kingdom of En-l gland, and for the recovery of the Garrison in Barlay and Carlisle. These are to declare, that if any Officer or Soldier under my Command shall take, or demand any monies, or shall take any Horse, Goods, or Wines without Order, or shall abuse the people in any sort, he shall be tried and punished with death by a Court Martial.

To him Argyle, Lowden, Leuen, and other of the Scotch Nobility repaired, and contracted with him for subduing of the publick Enemy: and to much feared was he in Scotland, that the following Agreement was contented to by them.

First, That the Armies under Argyle, and the other under Lanrick and Monroe with all the forces in day of the Garrison in Scotland be disband, ed, and Barwick and Carlisle be delivered to the English.

Secondly, That the settlement of Religion at home, and promoting Reformation abroad, be ordered under the determination of the General Assembly, and all Civil differences be referred to a Parliament speedily to be called.

Thirdly, That no party that were in the last Engagements against England, be of the new Parliament, or of the General Assembly, and so he returned into England after he had been invited to Edinburgh to Feasts and Banquets, and highly careed by the States of Scotland with all expressions of Honour; and that in Yorkshir as he marched homewards, he was desired to reduce Scarcrought and Pomfret Castles, which was then promised, but not till some time after effected; Col-chesster had endured a tedious Siege, and was now brought to such secrecy of provision that the besieged had not Horse-fleesh enough to serve them one day (that being the food which they had fed on almost a fortnight, and not purchased without much blood (spilt in divers Sallies for dead Horses,) and now perceiving all hopes of succour utterly frustrated, they were necessitified to yield upon these Conditions following:

The Common Soldiers to depart with life, and the Officers to remain at the General disposal, and by to exempt from mercy whom he pleased; the remainder to be remitted to the Parliament mercy, and the Town to raise fourteen thousand pounds to preserve it from Plunder.

The Prisoners of Quality were the Earl of Norwich, Capel, and Longborough, eleven Knights, Twelve Colonels, eight Lieutenant Colonels, nine Majors, thirty Captains, and sixty-five Gentlemen; the private Soldiers were about three thousand; three of the Knights were condemned to die by a Court-Martial (viz.) Sir Charles Lucas, Sir George Lisle, and Sir Bernard Gaskin A Fiorenine; but the last was reprieved because a stranger, and the other two shot to death, the first having (as the General said in his Letter to the Parliament) falsified his word with him) the second directed the shooting of payned Guns against the Laws of Arms.

And to General Fairfax after much loafs of time and men, and difficult service for a quarter of a year) took possession of the Town of Catterfie, August the 27th, after which he marched up and down the Counties of Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridge, and Harford to settle peace, and with the Garrison, and then returned to St. Albans his Head-Quarters: and thus we have briefly described the military actions of this year, and whilst the Army was busied in fighting, the Parliament were taken up with Petitions from the several Counties for a Treaty with the King; the City of London among the rest had preferred one, and, whilst deferred in one before, the release of their imprisoned Citizens, which were the Aldermen Langham and Bunch, and Sergeant Glyn their Recorder, to which the House readily consented, and likewise repealed their Orders against the Earls of Suffolk and Middlesex, and the Lords Berkley, Haddington, Maynard, Willoughby of Parham, and the seven Members, for they became very well inclined to peace with the King, now they were freed from the insolency of the Army by their distance from them, and a Treaty was resolved on, and the Earl of Middlesex, Sir John Hipsey, and Mr. Bulkeley went tent to the King, to let him know their resolution: who returned with his ready compliance thereunto; upon which the Parliament Voted.

That the Votes of Non-Addresses should be recalled.

That such persons as he should send for, as necessary to him in the Treaty, he admitted.

That he be in the same State of freedom as at Hampton-Court, with such Servants as he desired.

That five Lords and ten Commons be chosen Commissioners to Treat with the King, and the place to be Newport in the Isle of Wight. And that the King be admitted to invite the Scots thereunto to Treat only concerning that Kingdom.

Which Votes were sent down to the King, who was to Treat personally with these Commissioners (viz., the Earls of Northumberland, Salisbury, Pembroke, and Middlesex, and the Lord Say, for the House of Lords: and the Lord Wilmot, Mr. Piers, Sir Henry Vane the younger, Sir Harbottle Grimston, Sir John Pett, Mr. Brown, Mr. Crew, and Mr. Bulkeley for the House of Commons, and with these were joined Mr. Hollis and Mr. Glyn.

Munday September the eighteenth the Treaty began: The Proposities were in number eleven.

The first was for calling in all the King's Declarations, which he should offer to, with this Proviso, That neither of this Constitution, nor any other of his, advantage should be taken, unless the articles were concluded.

The 2 Proposition was concerning the settlement of the Church, in reference to which he was descended, to settle the Directory, and in case an Act to confirm the Assembly, and to establish the Presbyterian Government for three years, referring Liberty to Himself: and his Party to use the old forms: But would not agree to the utter abolishing of the Episcopal Hierarchy, nor the selling of their Lands.

The third Proposition was for setting the Militia in the hands of the Parliament for twenty years, solely, to which he assented.

Likewise to the fourth, for making void the Ceftion of Ireland, and remitting the Government of it both Civil and Military to the two Houses at Westminster.

And to the fifth and sixth, for calling all Horses and Tithes since the carrying away of the Great Seal, and for payment of Publick Debts.

The 7th Proposition concerning Delinquents, to whom the Parliament proposed great favour; the King moderated them, he was content that they should be fined, and prohibited access to Council or Court without the Parliament's content, that they should be deprived for three years of their right of sitting in Parliament, and brought to Tryal (if the two Houses should think fit) to suffer according to the merit, whereas they should be legally convicted: But he would by no means hear of branding them with Treason, nor taking away either Lives or Possessions from any, but such as after a legal Tryal should be found guilty of breaking the established Laws of the Land.

The eighth, for imposing the Parliament to confer all Officers of the Kingdom, and the Chief Magistrates for twenty years he agreed to; and to

The ninth, for confirming the new Great Seals, with all Grants and Commissions issued by it. And to

The tenth, for ratifying all Privileges, Grants, and Charters and Immunities to the City of London, with power to dispose of the Tower, and their own Militia to be confirmed to them; and the Ci licens to be exempted from Military service out of the Liberties of the City, unless at the Parliament's appointment.

The last was for total exterminating the Court of Wards, which was also condemned to, so as an hundred thousand pounds might be yearly paid to the King by way of compensation for it.

The Earl of Ormond had gotten back into Ireland, and raised forces there in opposition to the Parliament by the Kings Commission, but the King extremed the Commissioners, That if the Treaty should take effect, the Irish affairs should be managed at the discretion of the houses only.

The King having thus far complied with the Parliament, they likewise at his desire Voted:

That he be in Honour, freedom, and safety, according to the Laws.

Secondly, That he have his Revenue as before, excepting the deductions for such Forts and Garrisons, as were of old accustomed to be maintained.

Thirdly, That he have compensation of the Court of Wards.

Fourthly, That an All of Obligation be past with such exceptions and limitations as should be agreed on by both Houses.

Most men thought now that the King and Parliament would have united, and so in all likelihood they had, nothing being in difference but only the business of Episcopacy. But whilst the King was treating for Peace at the Isle of Wight with the Commissioners of Parliament, the Officers of the Army were contriving at Windsor the destruction of both, and many private meetings were had both there, and at London, by the Levellers and some of their Independant friends about a frame of Government to be represented to them, the refult whereof was,

That some persons should be chosen by the Army to represent the whole Body, and that the well-afflicted in every County (for so they thought) in their Party should choose one person to represent them: and those to meet at the Head-Quarters.

That these persons ought not to exercise any Legislative power, but only to draw up the Foundation of a just Government, and to propose to the well-afflicted people in every County to be agreed to, which Agreement should be above Law, and therefore the bounds, limits, and extent of the people Legislative Deputies in Parliament, contained in the Agreement should be drawn up into a formal contract, to be mutually signed by the well-afflicted people, and their said Deputies upon the days of their elections respectively.

To prevent confusion the Parliament may not be by force immediately dissolved, but the day of its dissolution be inserted in the Agreement, by virtue of which it should be dissolved.

That this way of Settlement should be mentioned in a Remonstrance from the Army.

When these Proposals were transmitted to the Army, the matter thereof was very well approv'd of by the Chief Officers; but Colonel Harris told the Agents implored to them:

That they could not stay so long from going to London, as to perfect an agreement for such a Settlement, and without their speedy going (said he) we are unanimously destroyed; we fully understand that the Treaty between the King and the Parliament is almost concluded upon, as the conclusion whereof we shall be examined by King and Parliament to disband, the which if we do not are unavoidably destroyed for what we have done already, and if we do not disband, they will by All of Parliament Proclaim us Traitors, and declare us to be the only hinderers of settling peace in the Nation, and then we shall never be able to fight with both Interests of the King and the Parliament. So that he and the Officers with him declared the first thing the Army was to do, was to cut off the Kings head, and force & thoroughly purge (if it be not) the Parliament. The Agents did not disapprove of this horrid resolution, but pressed against the doing it, without first giving security to the Nation (to use their own words) for the future settlement of their liberties and freedoms, especially in frequent, free, and facecitive Representatives. The dire effects of these Councils will follow in the sequel of this History; in prosecution whereof, the Army sent up a Petition to the Parliament to try their tempers:

For a scrutiny to be taken for discovery of the The Army

Centurion and Allers in the late bloody War, and that speedy justice should be done upon them. That the same fames may have the same Juicice and punish-ment in the person of the King or Lord, as in the per-son of the poorest Commoner, that such as speak or act in the Kings behalf (still he be acquainted of shedding innocent blood) be proceeded against as Traitors. When this would not do, they framed their Remonstrance in bolder terms which they sent to the Parliament by fix Officers inclosed in a Letter from the General, dated the 10th of November.

Requiring, That the King be brought to Justice as the Capital cause of all the evils of the Civil War.

Secondly, That a preordinary day be set for the summoning the Prince of Wales, and Duke of York, and if they refused to come to declare them incapable of Government or Succession, and to stand exalted as Traitors, and if they rendered themselves incapable to be proceeded against for satisfaction, and that the Revenues of the Crown be sequestred.

Thirdly, That publick Justice be done against the Allers in the late War.

And lastly, They concluded, defiring their appear-ances with the old pretence of قال the Country of free Quarter; and request that a Period may be put to this Parliament; and are to take some new Representatives, and that we King should be admitted for the future, but upon election of and upon draft for the people, to be limited by the Representatives, &c.

In the mean time, General Fairfax commanded Colonel Hammond by his Letters to deliver up his charge of the Kings person to Colonel Ever, by

by whom the King was conveyed out of the Isle of Wight to Hurst-Caple the 30th of November. But the Parliament declared their ill repentance of this action, and voted, That the seizing upon the person of the King, and carrying him prisoner unto Hurst-Caple was without the advice and consent of the House.

And thus the Treaty was violently broken off, yet the Lords Voted the Kings Concessions a sufficient ground for Peace, and forthwith adjourned, and the Major part of the Commons Voted the same. But the Army being now come up to London, and quartered at White-Hall, St. James, the Mens, and several Villages near, they resolved to hinder these proceedings, and therefore discharged the Trained Bands from being a Guard to the Parliament, and Ordered Colonel Prides and Rice's Regiment to supply their places, by whom above forty Members coming to the House, were seized and committed to Guards in Westminster, and the parts adjoining; and not satisfied with this, they accquitted Major General Brown, and ninety odd Members for inviting in the Scots the last Summer, and therefore required they might be excluded the House: At these proceedings the Commons (being displeased) adjourned for four or five days, in which space the Army was busied in compleating their Model of Government, wherein it was amongst other things proposed:

That the present Parliament should be dissolved the 3d of April next: And that the Representatives of the whole Nation should consist of three hundred persons, half which number should suffice to make an All of Laws, and that in the Intervals of Parliament a Council of State should govern.

And this Declaration, together with half a score of Modifications, they termed, The Agreement of the People: which was afterwards presented to the House of Commons by Sir Hardress Walker, and fifteen Officers when the House new moulded by the Army, met again (for besides that they forced out, a great number abdicated themselves) and to testifie their submission to the Army, they restored the Votes of Non-Addressers, and repealed those which approved of the Kings Concessions, and Voted, Their Message be received from the King upon pain of Treason: That the General should take care of his person: and that the Council of War should draw up a Charge of Treason against him; which manifestly did impious intention to destroy him, which before they had determined: But before this open and avowed act, some secret practices were designed upon his life, as appeared in the Letters and Informations of one Donges and Osborn against Captain Ralph, who commanded a Company of the Guards about the King, whom Osborn particularly accused to have projected his death, by poison or pibal, and not without the privy of Colonel Hammond and some Chiefs of the Army that invited him thereunto: and though great endeavours were used to obstruct any proceedings in the business, yet the clamour of people was so great, that they were forced to commit him to prison, and subject him to trial; but by the sticking of some of the prevailing party in his behalf, the Indictment against him was found Ignoramus by the Grand Jury of Hampshire, at Southampton or Winchelsea, by the advice of Maynard of Council with him, because there was but one witness to each fact, as in cases of Treason there ought to have been two.

December the tenth, the King was brought from Hurst-Caple with a strong Guard to Winchelsea, next day to Ferryman, and the next day to Windfor: In the mean time the two Houses differed concerning the Committees situate, That it is Treason for the King to levy War against the Commonwealth, and drew up an Ordinance for his Trial as a Traitor, and the Lords denied that the King can commit any Treason against the Commonwealth, and therefore rejected the Ordinance of the Commons, and declared, That no All of the Commons is binding without their consent; and adjourned for a fortnight, upon which the Commons Voted, That all Members and others appointed to all in any Ordinance with Peers, are empowered and enjoined to sit, all, and execute notwithstanding the Peers joyned not therein; and to earneth were both the Commons and the Army about the Kings Trial, that the Queen defining to see her Husband before his Arraignment, could not obtain a Pass for her secure coming and returning.

January the sixth, the Ordinance for the Kings Trial was turned into an Act of the Commons alone, and ingrossed, and Proclamation was made two days after in Westminster-Hall, Cheapside, and the old Exchange for Witnessess to come in against him, and Commissioners were appointed about it; and now the City (or rather a contemptible party therein, suborned to that purpose) petitioned the House for Justice against the King. And Hillary Term, beginning January the twenty third was adjourned till fourteen days after, to give place to the proceedings against him.

January the nineteenth, the King was brought from Windfor to St. James's House, and all things about him were prepared for his fatal Tragedy, in which the Commons proceeded notwithstanding the diffent of the House of Lords, and the Remonstrance of the Parliament of Scotland, now converted against it: The Act of Parliament which directed the Trial of the King, appointed a new Tribunal, called the High Court of Justice, who were impowered to convene, hear, judge, and execute Charles Stuart King of England. His Title in Writs they abrogated, and ordered the great Seal of England to be broken, and a new Seal to be made with the Crois for England, and the Harp for Ireland thereon, and these Words, The Great Seal of England, and on the Reverse, the Picture of the House of Commons sitting with these words, In the first year of freedom by Gods blessing restored, 1648.

Thus this great, though unfortunate Prince, March of three mighty Kingdoms, was now through the inefurbable Providence of the Omnipotent Disposer of all things, subjected to the miserable condition of a calamitous prisoner to his own Subjects, by whom he was tried, condemned, and lastly executed, yet not without a sharp retaliation (however late) upon the heads of the greatest part of those that were the chief contrivers and actors of so abhorred a fact, as in the sequel of the Story will appear.
Of his Taxations.

King James dying, left his Son a large Domininion, but a poor Exchequer, which was the occasion that his Taxations were more frequent than before in his Fathers Reign.

In his first year, the Parliament at their first Session granted him two Subsidies from Protestant, and four from Popish Recusants, and from the Clergie three; and till the Parliament took order therein, he continued the levies as in his Fathers time of Tonnage, Poundage, and other sums by way of impost upon Merchandise imported and exported.

In his second year he engaged in a War with France, and for the relief of Rochell, he raised near two hundred thousand pounds by Loan.

In his third year, in a Parliament holden at Welfminister, they gave him five Subsidies.

In his sixth year, he revived an ancient Custome or Usage by which all that were qualified by the Law for Knighthood, were to take upon them that order, or to make fine for relief of the same, whereby a hundred thousand pounds was brought into the Exchequer.

In his ninth year, by the advice of his Attorney-General, and other his Council learned in the Laws, severall Writs were issed under the great Seal of England, for the charging of the Ports, Towns, Cities, Boroughs, and Counties of this Realm respectively, to provide and furnish Ships for the defence of the King and the Kingdom, whereby great sums were raised. And in a Parliament holden in Ireland, the Deputy obtained some Subsidies for the payment of the Army of that Realm, and the encrease of his Majesties Revenue there.

In his sixteenth year, the Earl of Strafford obtained of the Irish Parliament the grant of four Subsidies; And the Convocation of Bishops in England gave him an ample Benevolence of four Shillings in the pound for six years, to be assised on all the Clergie in England, towards the carrying on of a War with Scotland then begun.

And in the same year, The Parliament of England then assembled, granted to him four entire Subsidies for relief of his Army then raised against the Scots, and for relief of the Northern parts of the Kingdom then much harassed by an Army of the Scots quartering in those parts, who imposed great Taxes on the Inhabitants where they lay for their maintenance.

In his seventeenth year, the same Parliament granted two Subsidies for the further relief of his Majesties Army, and the Northern parts of the Kingdom; and likewise a Subsidie of Tonnage and Poundage, and other sums of money payable upon Merchandise exported and imported, from the twenty fifth of May to the fifteenth of July following, and when that Act was expiring, they granted another for the same duties from the fifteenth of July to the tenth of August following; and by five other subsequente Acts, the Parliament granted the like Subsidie and Impostion upon Merchandise to the third of May, 1642. And the said seventeenth year, severall sums of money were by Act of Parliament charged upon persons according to their Ranks, Dignities, Offices, Callings, Estates and Quality, by way of Pole, for the speedy disbanding two Armies then in the bowels of the Kingdom.

This year also a Contribution and Loan was granted for the relief of Ireland, where a bloody Rebellion had broken forth the year before.

And in his eighteenth year, an Act passed for raising and levying of moneys for the necessary defence and great affairs of the Kingdoms of England and Ireland, and for the payment of Debts undertaken by the Parliament.

There were all the Taxations either by Loan or otherwise raised by Royal Authority during the Kings Reign. But the War which the Parliament raised without his Authority, and against it, was supported and maintained by great and vast sums of money illegally levied on the Subjectts by Contribution, Affeilments, and Excises, which cannot be properly here inferred; and we with the memory of such unjust proceedings, may be for ever effaced.

Of the Laws made in His Reign.

Having under the head of Taxations set down such Acts of Parliament as granted money to the King, we shall herein make no further mention of them in the enumeration of the other Laws enacted during his Reign.

In the Parliament holden in his first year, an Act was made for punishing abuses on Sundays; and an Act to enable the King to make Leases of Lands parcel of his Duchy of Cornwall; and an Act for cesse obtaining Licenfes of Alienation, and in the pleadings in the Exchequer in Ireland; and an Act for restraining of ill behaviour in Inns and Ale-houses.

In his Third Year.

The Petition of Right was enacted, and the several Statutes following (viz.) An Act for reformation of divers abuses committed on the Lords Day, commonly called Sunday.

An Act to restrain the passing, or lending any to be populous bred beyond the Seas.

Montgomery, and his Heirs, and a yearly Rent of two hundred pounds a year to the said Bishop of Duresfne and his Successors in lieu thereof.

Affairs of the Church in his Time.

The King was a Zealous Protestant according to the profession of the Church of England; for the peace and defence whereof, he laboured much all the time of his Reign, though the malice and ignorance of the enemies thereof, of much obfuscated his pious endeavours.

In his first Year, some differences were revived about the Tenents of Arminius, which began in the later end of his Fathers Reign, and were heightened by the Commons House of the Parliamcnt then newly assembled, the members whereof generally favoured the oppugners of those points, and the controversy was the more remarkable, because it divided the Bishops them-selfs, but those of that Order that were reputed Arminians, did not own themselves to be such,
but maintained, That what they held, was ever the Doctrine of the Church of England contained in the 17th Article thereof, and the like was asserted by those that opposed those Tenents, so that both made claim to that Article, and about the Explication thereof, and the consequences from thence derived, the peace of the Church was not a little 1648.

A Conference at York-house for ending the Controversies of Arminians and Calvinists.

The King's Declaration against meddling with their Controversies.

In his fourth year at the controversy of Mr. Richard Montague to be Bishop of Chichester, which was in Bow-Church, according to the usual custom in such cases all persons were summoned to appear, to show cause why the Elec there present should not be confirmed; whereupon one William Jones, a Stationer of London excepted against Mr. Montague as unfitting for the Episcopal Office, because latey Questioned by the Parliament for a Book he had writ, wherein they said were many dangerous opinions of Arminianism and Popery (yet upon examination thereof) some sharp and invective expressions were the greatest offences in it, but exceptions were taken at the exceptions of Jones, though the reason thereof appears not otherwise than what is acknowledged in the Record by Dr. Rives (substitute at that time) for the Vicar General) Nulio modo legismen comperuit, nec aliquid in hac parte postis evis eximentium diceros, expectes vel apparetes, ito that the Bishop was confirmed, and immediately after he was fined out a Pardon under the great seal of England for all Errors before committed, either in speaking, writing, or printing, whereas he might hereafter be Questioned.

In the same year one Richard Smith, a Secular Priest, titular Bishop of Cheltenham, in parvisius Judicium actat, and executed Episcopal Jurisdiction in Lancashire, with his Miter and Crosier, conferring Orders on divers Priests, and in granting and administering confirmation, which much disturbed the Peace of the Church of England, and made disorders amongst their own party; for Nicholas Smith a Jefuit wrote bitterly against him, urging that a Bishop over the English Catholics was useless in times of perfecution (as he called it) there being but two peculiar performances of a Bishop (viz.) ordination and confirmation; for the former it might be supplied by forein Bishops, since the English Papists were most bred abroad; and for the latter he offered out of Thomas Aquinas and other Divines, that by Commission from the Pope a Priest, though no Bishop, might confer; he added likewise, that a Bishop was but a name, and the English Church, confiding that the present prelates of that order, the Religion needed no unnecessary expenses.

Thee and the like objections were answered by Doctor Kellifon, Reector of the English Colledge at Dublin, and many other Secular Priests, which occasioned great animosities betwixt the Regular and Seculars; but the King to shew his dislike of the Bishops presumptions, by his Proclamation, promised an hundred pounds to be paid to any that should apprehend him, besides all the profits that accrued to the Crown, from the person who apprehended him, which frightened him into France as was mentioned before in the History.

In his sixth year Davenant Bishop of Salford Bishop Davenent question, and, being an hundred pounds to be paid to anyone that should apprehend him, besides all the profits that accrued to the Crown, from the person who apprehended him, which frightened him into France as was mentioned before in the History.

In his ninth year the Sabbatian Controversy was revived by one Theophilus Bradkere, a Minister of a place, which first began in the year 1595, occasioned by a Book put forth that year by one Dr. Bennet, for before that time (as in General at this day) no civil recreations were denied to any of the people at such times as they were not exercised in their publique devotions at Church; in which Book the following opinions were maintained.

1. That the Commandment of sanctifying every seventh day, as in the Mofaical Decree, is moral and perpetual.

2. That whereas all other things in the Jewish Church were taken away (Priesthood, Sabbath, Temples, and Sacrifices) this Sabbath was to be continued, that it still remain.

3. That there is great reason why we Christians should take our selves asstrangely bound to rest upon the Lord's Day, as the Jews were upon their Sabbath, being one of the moral Commandments, for before all were of equal Authority.

4. That the rest upon this Day must be a notable and singular rest, a most careful, exact, and precise rest, after another manner than men are accustomed.

5. That scholars on this Day are not to study the Liberal Arts, nor Lawyers to consult the Law, nor penitent mens Evidences.

6. That the Seigeants, Apparitors, and Summitors be restrained from executing their Offices.

7. That judges not to examine causes for the preservation of the Peace.

8. That no singing of any Belshazzar one that day is not to be justified.

9. That no solemn Fasts, nor Wedding-days to be made on that day (with permission not withstanding of the face to Lords, Knights, and Gentlemen of Quality.)

10. That all honest recreations and pleasant lawful on other days (as hunting, fencing, bowling and firing) this Day to be forborne.

11. That no man to speak or talk of pleasures, or any other worldly matter.

The Doctrine was at first very well received because of the piety of such persons as maintained it in their publique Writings; but a while after ter it was opposed, as galling mens necks with a Jewish yoke against the liberty of Christians; and further, it was urged that Christ as Lord of the Sabbath had removed the rigour thereof, and allowed men lawful recreations.

That this Doctrine puts an unequal Infringe on the Sunday, on let porpote to eclipse all other holy days, to the derogation of the Authority of the Church, and that this strict observance was set up out of fiction to be a Character of difference to brand all for Libertines who did not entertain it; so that Archbishops *trigging called in all such Books as were written on this Subject. But Brad brone who revived this matter at this time was questioned by the High Commissioun Court, whoe well tempered fervency to prevail upon him, that submitting himself to a private conference, and perceiving the unfoundness of his own principles, he became a convert, conforming himself quietly to the Church of England ever after.

Just in this juncture of time the King being troubled with Petitions on both sides by the strict and the more moderate observers of the Lords Day, thought good to follow his Fathers Royal example upon the like occasiun in Lancashire, where in his Progrs in the 14th. year of his Reign taking notice that some Preachers perverted the people to forrigorous obervation of the Sabbath, that it was unlawful therein to dresse meat, sweep their Houss, kindle the fire, or the like, and that the Popish Priests took advantage thereby to pervert many to Popery, perverting them that the Protestant Religion was for rigourous, that no lawful liberty was allowed therein, the year after he set forth a Declaration to this effect: That for his good peoples lawful recreations, His pleasure was, that after the end of Divine Services, they should not be disbarred, leted or disencouraged from any lawful actions; such as dancing either of men or women, or for men keeping, watching, or any such barbarous Recreations; and that no mention of busie May-Games, Whittan-sles, or Morrice dances, and setting up of May-Poles, or other sportes therewith used, so as the same be had in due and convenient time, without impediment, or ie of Divine Service, and that women should have leave to carry vassell to the Church for decoring of it, according to their old custom; with prohibiting all unlawful Games to be used on the Sundays only, as Bear-baiting, Bull-baiting, Interludes, and Bowling (all times in the meaner sort of people prohibited.)

In his tenth year by the procurment of Laud Bishop of London, all such Improprion in Ireland as were in the Crown, were by the King refered to the Church, and at a Convention in that Kingdom concurrant with a Parliament then in being, the 30 Articles of the Church of England were there receivd for all to subscribe unto.

In his 13th year the same Bishop of London being some time before transfrated to the See of Canterbury, and himself a strict observer of the Rites and Ceremonies of the Church, did in his Metropolitan Visitation more rigourously than before prover conformity therunto, which occasioned many differences in the Church about Divine Worship, (viz.) about the holiness of Churches, bowing at the Name of Jesus, and the manner of Adoration in Gods House, which left was by the Conformists practised to be towards the Communion Table, as the most remarkable place of God's presence, others would not admit of the name of Table, but have it Altar; and then a great controversy was raised about the placing of it, some would have it at a distance fixed with the sides East and West, ends North and South, and a gradual advance next the East wall of the Chancel, citing a Canon, and the practice of the Kings Differences Chappel for the same, whilst others preferred doctrine of Ceremones.

In the same year or the year after, the Book of Service or New Liturgy was sent into Scotland to be used in that Kingdom, the circumstances whereof, and the mysteries therein occasioned are likewise related in the foregoing History.

In his fourteenth year on the 13th of April a Parliament assembled at Westminster, and with the Parliament a Convocation began, but the Parliament being after a moneth dissolved, the King nevertheless continued the Convocation under the Title of a Synod, which was authorized under the great Seal of England, the Acts of this Synod were scarce any time in use, so that we shall here only insert the Titles of the 17 Canons that poffed therein:

1. "Concerning the Regal Power.
2. "For better keeping of the day of his Majesties most happy Inauguration.
3. "For suppressing of the growth of Popery.
5. "Against Securites.
7. "A Declaration concerning some Rites and Ceremonies.
8. "Of Preaching for Conformity.
9. "One Book of Articles of inquiry to be used at all Parochial Visitations.
10. "Concerning the conversation of the Clergy.
12. "Chancellors alone not to confine any of the Clergy in fundry caues.
13. "Excommunication and Absolution not to be pronounced but by a Priest.
14. "Concerning the Commutations and disposing of them.
17. "Against vexatious Citations.

As to the Oath concluded in the Synod, which was a subject of much discourse at that time, and after in the succeeding Parliament that the Members of the Synod and the whole Episcopal Clergy suffered much thereby, it is here set forth at large according to the true tenor thereof.

"I A.B. do swear, that I do approve the Doctrine and Discipline or Government established in the Church of England, as containing all things necessary to salvation: And that I will not endeavour by my self, or any other, directly or in indirectly to bring in any Papist Doctrine, contrary to that which is so established, nor will I ever give my consent to alter the Government of this Church, by Archbishops, Bishops, Deans, and Archdecons, &c., as it stands now established, and as by right it ought to stand, nor yet ever to subject it to the usurpations and future persifions of the See of Rome. And all these I do plainly and sincerely acknowledge and swear, according to the plain and common sense and understanding of the same words, without any equivocation or mental evasion, or secret reservation whatsoever. And this I do hearty willingly, and truly, upon the faith of a Christian. So help me God in Jesus Christ.

As soon as these Canons were published, various were men censtures upon them, and many objections were raised against them, because they were generally condemned as illegally passed to the prejudice of the Fundamental Liberty of the Subject, though their fitting was justified by the opinions of the ablest of the Kings learned Counsellors in the Laws; but against the Oath many exceptions were made, some of which we shall insert.

1. Because the (fort.) did leave the Oath too loose, that neither the makers nor the takers thereof understood the same.

Secondly, These words were disliked (viz.) (we will never give consent to alter this Church Government, as if the same were intended to bridge the Liberty of King and State in future Parliaments and Convocations, Goodman, Bishop of Gloucester the day before the ending of the Synod repaired to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and acquainted him that he could not with his Conscience subscribe these new Canons, and thereupon he was by the King committed to the Gate-house, and it appeared afterward that he scrupled some passages about the Corporal presence.

In Scotland the dissenters were so great about the Service Book that this, that the King raised an Army to reduce them to obedience; and from this beginning many and great calamities ensued in the Church and State in the few remaining years of this Kings Reign.

The Liturgy and shortly after Episcopacie it self; were both abrogated by those that usurped the Government of the Kingdom, and (which is the more to be lamented) many Ministers of the Gospel in England, who were reputed learned and pious men, and had conformed to the established Doctrine and Discipline of the Church, to the scandal of Religion, joyned with those that opposed the Kings just Authority, and the Laws, and by their preachings and writings excited the people to an unlawful and unnatural War, on pretence of Reformation of Religion, forgetting, That not Guns and Swords, but Prayers and Tears ought to be the Arms of the Church; and then came in this flood of Errors that does yet too much obscure the beauty thereof; for hitherto though some differences arose in Discipline, yet so far was there unity amongst us, that the Ministers in the common grounds of Religion and of the Ministry were all one, and all preached one Faith and Substance of Doctrine, but we shall no further enlarge on these things which will make matter for an entire History of it if left to describe.

Works of Piety done by this King and others in his Reign.

Pembroke College in Oxford was erected and built in the place where formerly Broadcole in Oxfords-Hall flood, at the Charge of Thomas Tifdale of Glastonbury in the County of Oxford, who gave five thousand pound thereunto; and Richard Wighwick Rector of East Ilsie in Berkshire gave it Land of the yearly value of an hundred pounds, and hereupon King James in the later end of his Reign gave his licence for the building the Colledge, and granted to it a Charter of Mortmain of seven hundred pounds a year; but the College was not built till the first year of this Kings Reign, and he gave to it the perpetual Patronage of the Church of St. Alans near adjoining, Sir Finto Greif, Lord Mayor of London, founded a History Professorship in the University of Cambridge, and gave an hundred pound a year thereunto for ever; and St Thomas Adams a competently learned and worthy Citizen, and sometime Lord Mayor of London, erected and endowed an Arabick Professorship in the same University.

Anthony Blencourt sometime Provost of Oriel College in Oxford, gave twelve hundred pounds towards the re-edifying of the Front of that Colledge, and by his example some other Benefactors did to largely contribute, as to new build the whole Colledge, which from a very old and decaying Building, is now as handsome a uniform pile as any in that, or any other University in Europe.

The Queen Henrietta Maria wife to this King of his greatest goodwills and love to Learning, procured of the King her Husband the perpetual Patronage of several good Parsonages in Hants, to be granted to Queens College in Oxford; and the King out of his care to have the Inhabitants of Ely and Guernsey well educated, gave some Fellowships in Ely College and Pembroke College in Oxford, to the Natives of those Islands.

Sir William Paddy Knight, Doctor in Philick gave two perpetual Patronages to St. John College in Oxford, and beautified the Chappel thereof, and endowed some singing men and Choristers to make a Quire therein; and William Land Archbishop of Canterbury built a new Court in the same Colledge, a very elegant Fabrick, and was otherwise a good Benefactor thereto, he also enlarged the publice University Library, and purchased it at a great price many manuscripts of the Eastern Languages; and by that Example, Sir Kenelme Digby a Valiant and Learned Knight, gave a numerous Collection of Choice and Excellent Books to it.

The ancient Hall of Clare-Hall in Cambridge, and many lodgings therebuilt at the charge of Barony Oak, Poet of the University, and Fellow thereof, and some other Benefactors (provided chiefly by his Solicitation,) which is too much of it, as handfome a building as any in England.

The King was very solicitous to repair the ancient Cathedral Church of St. Paul in London, which was much decayed with age, and advised with Arch-Bishop Lang, and some others of his Counsel, how to effect so pious and so noble a purpose, which was after some time refolv'd on, and he himself at his own charge repaired some part thereof, and by his inducement, Sir Paul Pindar, a wealthy and worthy Citizen, and many others, contributed largely thereunto, so that the work went on very fast, and had not the Civil Wars made an interruption to it; in few years St. Paul's Church would have been made the most magnificent Structure of Europe.

Mr. John Egger erected and endowed a Free-School in the Parish of Alton in Hampshire, which was confirmed by Act of Parliament.

The King also, by his Letters Patents, gave a new church built at Plymouth, the like at Edinburgh.

The Plague breaks out in London.

Earthquakes.

A Star appears at Noon a little after Prince Charles his birth.

The great Fire at London-Bridge.

Ordnance which the Garrison of Berwick had seized at Dunfermline, where sitting merry at Dinner, with about twenty Knights and Gentlemen, on a sudden the Magazine of Powder that lay in a vaulted Room, took fire by accident, whereby the Earl and his Company were blown up.

The fame year likewise, a Pond in Camp-Bridge became red as blood, the water whereof was taken up in Bafons, retained still the same colour. Many fights also were in the Air, as Armies fighting one against the other, which were looked upon as the fall prelages of the ensuing Wars: Neither is that strange Thunder and Lightning unworthy of mention which happened at Wiltcorm in the County of Devon in the fourteenth year of his Reign, where a Ball of fire was seen to come into the Church in the time of Divine Service, whereby three persons were killed, and three more and two hurt, divers of whom had the linings of their clothes burnt, though their outward Garments were not so much as singed, and most of the seats were turned up-side down, and the Pillars, Steeple, and Church, more damaged than the expense of three hundred pounds could repair.

Of His Wife and Children.

He married Mary, the Daughter of Henry the fourth King of France, whose Marriage was solemnized in the year, 1635, being the first year of his Reign; He had Issue by her, four Sons, and as many Daughters; the eldest Son born before the time, was baptized Charles, and lived not above two hours: His second Son born May the twenty ninth, 1635, was also named Charles; and afterwards created Prince of Wales. And in the year, 1660, Reftor'd (after many years Seclusion in Foreign Countries) with the universal Congratulation of his Subjects to his Fathers Throne, happily blest with the Regal Virtues of a Illustrious Monarch: His third Son was born October the 13th, 1653, and was baptized James, and created Duke of York, a Prince of Invincible Courage, and Heroic Valour; as his Actions in France and Flanders, yet fresh in memory, have given sufficient Testimony: His fourth and last Son was born the twentieth of July, 1660, and Chriftened Henry, afterwards created Duke of Gloucefer: He, from his Brothers happy Retumation, deceased on the 13th of September, 1660, thereby bereaving the World of those fair hopes which had been generally conceived of his Noble and Princely Endowments. His Eldest Daughter Mary, was born November the 4th, 1634, and afterwards married William of Nassau, Prince of Orange, by whom he had one Son named William, Heir and Successor to his Father in his Dignities; she quickly followed his Brother the Duke of Gloucefer, viz. the 24th of December, 1660, her loss being very much bewailed, especially by any who had Relation to her Service, as being a Princesse of universal goodness, Charity and Bounty. His second Daughter Elizabeth, was born the 28th of December, 1635. She died at Carlisle in the Isle of Wight, September the 9th, 1650, for want of Grief (as it is not without reason believed) of her Father's death.
tiers unfortunate Death: And his third Daughter Anne, was born the seventeenth of March, 1636, who also dyed very young: His fourth and last Daughter, was born June 16th 1644, at Exeter, from whence she was brought up to St James's, but afterwards conveyed into France by her Governesse the Lady Dalkeith; She was married to the Duke of Argy, Brother to Louis the fourteenth, the present King of France: a Prince who is of incomparable Beauty and Gallantry of Spirit.

Of his Death and Burial.

His death was strange and unparalleled; we read of many Kings who came to violent ends, but never any that was so formally and solemnly murdered, by a publick Tryal and Execution, which was done in the manner following.

On Saturday, January the 30th 1648. The wicked High Court of Justice fell in Westminster Hall, whereas John Bradshaw of Gray's-Inne was President, he had a Mace and Sword carried before him, and twenty habited like Gentlemen for his Guard, under the Command of one Colonel Fox (formerly a Brawier or Tinker) when the pretended Court was set, and beguile made, and silence commanded; The Act of the Commons for erecting the said Court was read, in these words.

"Whereas it is notorious, That Charles Stuart, is the now King of England, not content with the many intracions which his Predecessors had made upon the People in their Rights and Freedom, hath had a wicked design to subvert the ancient and fundamental Laws and Liberties of this Nation and in their place to introduce an Arbitrary and Tyrannical Government, and that besides all evil ways to bring his design to pass, he hath procured it with fire and Sword, and levied and maintained a Civil War in the Land against the Parliament and King, whereby this Country hath been miserably wasted, the publick Treasure exhausted, Trade decayed, thousands of people murdered, and infinite of other mischiefes committed, for all which high offences the said Charles Stuart might long since have been brought to example & condign punishment; Whereas also the Parliament well hoping that the restraint and imprisonment of his person, since it had pleased God to deliver him into their hands, would have quitted the distressers of the Kingdom, did forbear to proceed judicially against him, but from by said experience that such remodelled bodies served only to encourage him and his complices in the continuance of their evil practices, and raising new commotions, Rebellions, and Invasions: for prevention of the like and greater inconveniences, and to the end no chief Officer or Magistrate may hereafter presume traitorously and malitiously to imagine or conceive the enlaving or destroying of the English Nation, and to expect impunity; Be it enacted and ordained by the Commons in this present Parliament assembled, and it is hereby enacted and ordained, That..."

Mr. King, Crier of the Crown.

The Court being thus sate and called over, the King was brought to the Bar by Colonel Haeker with Halberdeers, the Mace of the Court conducting him to his Chair within the Bar where he sat, and then the President Bradshaw said to the King.

Charles Stuart, King of England, The Commons of England assembled in Parliament being sensible of the great calamities brought upon this Nation, and of the innocent blood shed (which are referred to you as the Author of it) according to that Duty which they owe to God, the Nation, and themselves, and according to that power and fundamental right repos'd in them by the People, have considered this High Court of Justice, before which you are now brought, and you are to hear your Charge, upon which the Court will proceed.

Solicitor Coek, My Lord, in behalf of the Commons of England, and of all the people thereof, I do accuse Charles Stuart here present of High Treason, and Misdemeanors, and I do in the name of the Commons of England desire the Charge may be read unto him.
The King. Hold a little.
The President. Sit the Court commands the Charge to be read, afterward you may be heard.
The Charge was read as followeth,

That the said Charles Stuart, being admitted the Charge of England, and therein trusted with a free, united Power to Govern by, and according to the Laws of the Land, and not otherwise, and by his Treas, Oaths, and Office, being obliged to use the power committed to him, for the good and benefit of the people, and for the preservation of their Rights and Liberties, yet nevertheless one of a wicked design to erect and uphold in himself an unlimited and Tyrannical power, to rule according to his will, and to overturn the Rights and Liberties of the people; and to take away, and make void the foundations thereof, and of all rights and remedies of mis-Government, which by the Fundamental Constitutions of this Kingdom were refered on the people's behalf, in the right and power of frequent and successive Parliament or National Meetings in Council, He, the said Charles Stuart, for accomplishment of such his design, and for the professing of himself and his adherents, in his and their wicked praisethes, to the same end hath Traitorously and maliciously levied War against the present Parliament, and the people therein Represented.

Particularly, upon or about the thirtieth day of June, in the year of our Lord One thousand six hundred forty and two, at Beverly in the County of York; and upon or about the thirtieth day of July in the year aforesaid, in the County of the City

By which cruel and unnatural Wars, by him, the said Charles Stuart, levied, continued, and renewed, as aforesaid, much Innocent Blood of the Free-people of this Nation hath been shed, many Families have been undone, the publick Treasury wasted and exhausted, Trade obstructed, and miserably decayed, vast expense and damage to the Nation incurred, and many parts of the Land spoiled, some of them torn to desolation.

And for further profession of his said evil designs, He, the said Charles Stuart, doth still continue his Commissions to the said Prince and other Rebels and Revolters, both English and Foreigners, and to the Earl of Ormond, and to the Irish Rebels and Revolters, associated with him, from whom further Invasions upon this Land are threatened, and the procurement upon the behalf of the said Charles Stuart.

All which wicked designs of Wars, and evil practices of him the said Charles Stuart have been, and are carried on, for the advancing and building up of the personal interest of will and power, and pretended Pretexts to himself, and his Family, against the publick Interest, common Rights, Liberty, Justice, and peace of the people of this Nation, by, and for whom He was intrusted, as aforesaid.

By all which it appears, That He, the said Charles Stuart hath been, and is the Occupant, Author, and Contriver of the said unnatural, cruel, and bloody Wars, and therein guilty of the Treasons, Murthers, Rapes, Burnings, Spites, Distortions, Damage and Mischief to this Nation, and or committed in the said Wars, or occasioned thereby. And the said John Cook, by proclamation (saying to himself on the behalf of the people of England, the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter any other Charge against the said Charles Stuart, and also of replying to the Answer which the said Charles Stuart shall make to the premises, or any of them, or any other charge that shall be to exhibited) doth for the said Treason and other crimes on the behalf of the said people of England, impeach the said Charles Stuart, as a Tyrant, Traitor, Murderer, and a publick and impolite Enemy to the Commonwealth of England: and pray, That the said Charles Stuart, King of England, may be put to Answer all and every the premises, and such proceedings, Examination, Trial, Sentence, and Judgment may be therefore had, as shall be agreeable to Justice.

The King limited often during the reading of the Charge, especially at these words: Tyrant, Traitor, Murderer, and publick Enemy of the Commonwealth.

President, Sir, You have now heard your Charge, You find that in the clofe of it, it is prayed to the Court in behalf of the Commons of England, that you answer to your Charge, which the Court expects.

King, I would know by what power I am called bither; I was not long ago in the Isle of Wight, but I came there is a longer story than I think fit at this time for me to speak: But there I entered into a Treaty with both Houses of Parliament, with as much faith as is possible to be had of any people in the World: I Treated there with a number of Honorable Lords and Gentlemen, and I treated boldly and uprightly; I cannot say, but that they did very nobly with Me, We were upon a conclusion of the Treaty: Now I would know by what lawful Authority (there are many unlawful Authorities, Thieves and Robbers on the High-way) I was brought from thence, and carried from place to place, (and I know not what) and when I know by what lawful Authority, I shall answer.
The Reign of King Charles the First. 593

Remember I am your King, your lawful King, and what fin you bring upon your own heads, and the Judgement of God upon this Land, think well upon it, think well upon it I say, before you go on from one sin to a greater, therefore let me know by what lawful Authority I am seized here, and I shall not be unwilling to Answer. In the mean time, I shall not betray my Trust: I have a Trust committed to me by God, by old and lawful defect; I will not betray it to Answer so a new unlawful Authority.

Bradshaw. If you had been pleased to have observed what was hinted to you by the Court at your first coming hither, you would have known by what Authority: which Authority requires you in the name of the people of England, of whom you are Elected King, to answer them.

King. I deny that.

Bradshaw. If you acknowledge not the Authority of the Court, they must proceed.

King. I do tell them so, England was never an Elective Kingdom, but an Hereditary Kingdom for these thousand years: Therefore let me know by what lawful Authority I am called hither, I do stand more for the Liberty of my People than any here that come to be my pretended Judges; and therefore let me know by what lawful Authority, and I will answer, otherwise I will not Answer.

Bradshaw. Sir, How really you have managed your Trust, is known; your way of answer is to interrogate the Court, which becometh not you in this Condition, you have been told of it twice or thrice.

King. Here is Lieutenant Colonel Cobbett, ask him, if he did not bring me from the Isle of Wight by force: I do not come here as submitting to the Court; I will stand as much for the privilege of the Houses of Commons rightly understood, as any man here whatsoever; I see no House of Lords here that may constitute a Parliament, and (the King too) should have been. Is this the bringing the King to his Parliament? Is this the bringing an end to the Treaty on the publick Faith? Let me see a lawful Authority warranted by the Word of God, the Scriptures, or by the constitutions of the Kingdom. I will not betray my Trust, nor the Liberties of the People; I am sworn to keep the Peace by that duty I owe to God and my Country, and I will do it to the left breach in my Body. As it is a sin to withstand lawful Authority, so is it to submit to a Tyrannical, or any otherwise an unlawful Authority.

Bradshaw. The Court expects your final Answer, and will adjourn till Monday next: We are satisfied with our Authority that are your Judges, and it is upon Gods Authority and the Kingdoms; and that peace you speak of, will be kept in doing Justice, and that's our present work. So the Court adjourned, and the King was conducted back: They had to contriv'd it, that divers schismatical Soldiers and fellows were placed about the Court, to cry Justice, Justice, when the King was remanded, thinking all the rest of people would have blessed to the same tune, but they (almost all) cryed God bless him, and were (some of them) well cudgelled by the Soldiers for not reviling and exclaiming after the mode of the Army; yet the Court took no notice hereof: so far was his Majesty already fore-judged and condemned to sufferings.

Monday, January the 25 th. The King was brought again to his Tryal.

Solicitor Cook. May it please your Lordship, I did at the last Court, in behalf of the Commons, of his of England, exhibite, and give into this Court a Mapply, Charge of High Treason, and other high Crimes against the Prisoner at the Bar, where I do accuse him in the name of the people of England, and the Charge was read unto him, and his Answer required: My Lord, He was not then pleased to give an Answer, but instead of Answering, did dispute the Authority of this High Court: My humble motion to this High Court in behalf of the Kingdom of England is, That the Prisoner may be directed to make a positive Answer, either by way of Confession, or Negation, which, if he shall refuse to do, That the matter of Charge may be taken pro confesso, and the Court may proceed according to Justice.

Bradshaw. Sir, You may remember, at the last Court you were told the occasion of your being brought hither, and you heard a Charge read against you, &c. You heard likewise what was prayed in behalf of the people, that you should give your Answer, to the Charge: You were then pleased to make some scruples concerning the Authority of this Court, and said, you knew not by what Authority you were brought hither; you did divers times propound your Questions, and were as often Answered, That it was by Authority of the Commons of England Assembled in Parliament, that did think fit to call you to account for those High and Capital Misdemeanors, withwherewith you were then Charged. Since that the Court hath taken into consideration what you then said, they are fully satisfied with their own Authority, and they hold it fit you should stand satisfied therewith too; And they do require that you do give a positive and particular Answer to this Charge exhibited against you: they expect you should either confesse or deny; if you do deny, it is offered in the behalf of the Kingdom to be made good against you: Their Authority they do now to the whole World, and the whole Kingdom are to rest satisfied therein, and you are to rest satisfied in it; and therefore you are to give a positive Answer.

King. When I was here last, 'tis true, I made 4th that Quizzon, and truly, if it were only my own particular cafe, I would have satisfied my self with the Protection I made here the last time, against the Legality of this Court, and that a King cannot be tried by any Superior Jurisdiction upon earth; but it is not my case. I am the sole authority and the liberties of the people of England, and (do you pretend what you will,) I stand more for their Liberties than you; for if power without Law may make Laws, and may alter the fundamental Laws of the Kingdom, I do not know what subject he is in England that can be free of his life, or any thing that he calls his own; therefore, when I came hither, I did expect particular Reasons to know by what Law, what Authority, you proceed against me here, and therefore I am a little to feek 1648. "Seek what to say to you in this particular, be- cause the Affirmative is to be proved, the Neg- gative (often) is very hard to do; I shall tell you my Reasons as short as I can. All proceed- ings against any man whatsoever.
The Reign of King Charles the First.

Bradshaw. Sir, I must interrupt you, what you do, is not agreeable to the proceedings of any Court of Justice: You are about to enter into argu- ment and dispute concerning the Authority of this Court before whom you appear as a Prisoner, and are charged as a High Delinquent; you may not dispute the Authority of this Court, nor will any Court give way unto it, you are to submit to it, &c.

King. Under favour, I do plead for the liberty of the people of England more than you do; and therefore if I should impede a belief upon any man with- out Reasons given, it were unreasonable.

Bradshaw. Sir, I must interrupt you: you may not be permitted, you speak of Law and Reason, and there is both against you; Sir, the Vote of the Commons of England Assembled in Parliament, is the reason of the Kingdom, and they are those that have given that Law, according to which you should have Ruled and Reigned; Sir, it will be taken notice of, that you stand in contempt of the Court, and your contempt will be recorded ac- cordingly.

King. I do not know how a King can be a Delin- quent, but by all that I ever heard, all men may put in Demurrers against any Proceedings, as I negled it, and I do demand that, if you deny that, you deny Reason.

Bradshaw. Sir, Neither you, nor any man are permitted to dispute that point, you are conclud- ed; You may not demur to the Jurisdiction of the Court, if you do, I must let you know, that they over-rule your Demurrer, they fit here by the Au- thority of the Commons of England, and all your Predecessors and You, are responsible to them.

King. I deny that, show me one President.

Bradshaw. Sir, You are not to interrupt while the Court is speaking to you, this point is not to be debated by you; if you offer it by way of De- murrer to the Jurisdiction of the Court, they have considered of their Jurisdiction, they do af- firm their own Jurisdiction.

King. I say Sir, by your favour, That the Commons of England were never Court of Jurisdi- cature, I would know how they came to be so?

Bradshaw. Sir, you are not to be permitted to go on in that speech, and their discontents. Then the Clerk of the Court read as follow- ebd.

Charles Stuart, King of England, you have been accused in the behalf of the people of Eng- land of High Treason, and other high Crimes, the Court hath determined that you ought to an- swer the fame.

King. I will answer the same so soon as I know by what Authority you do this.

Bradshaw. If this be all you will say, then Gentlemen, you that brought the Prisoner hither, take charge of him back again.

King. I do require that I may give my Reasons why I did not answer, and give them time for that. Bradshaw. Sir, It is not for Prisoners to re- quire.

King. Prisoner. Sir, I am not an ordinary prisoner.

Bradshaw. The Court have affirmed their Jurisdiction, if you will not answer, we shall give Order to record your fault.

King. You never heard my Reasons yet.

Bradshaw. Sir, your Reasons are not to be heard against the highest Jurisdiction.

King. Shew me that Jurisdiction where Reason is not to be heard.

Bradshaw. Sir, we shew you it here, the Com- mons of England, and the next time you are brought, you will know more of the pleasures of the Court, and it may be their final determina- tion.

King. Shew me where over the House of Com- mons was a Court of Jurisdiction of that kind.

Bradshaw. Sergeant, take away the Prisoner.

King. Well Sir, Remember that the King is not suffered to give in his Reasons for the liberty and freedom of all his Subjects. Bradshaw. Sir, You are not to have liberty to use this Language, how great a friend you have been to the Laws and Liberties of the people, let all England, and the world judge.

King. Sir, Under favour, it was the Liberty, Freedom, and Laws of the Subject that ever I took, I defended my self with Arms, I never took up Arms against the people, but for the Laws. Bradshaw. Sir, the command of the Court must be obeyed, no Answer will be given to the Charge, so the King was guarded forth to Sir Robert Constable, and the Court adjourned to the Painted-Chamber, Tuesday twelve a Clock.

Tuesday, January 23. The Court sat again, seventy three Commissioners of those before na- med were present.

The King brought into the Court, set down.

Solicitor Cook. "May it please your Lordship, my Lord President, This is now the third time of that by the great grace and favour of the Court, the Prisoner hath been brought to the Bar, be- fore any Issue joined in this cause. My Lord, I did at the first Court exhibit a charge against him, containing the highest Treason that ever was wrought on the Theater of England, That the King of England, and trusted to keep the Law, that had taken an Oath to do, that had Trib- ute paid him for that end, should be guilty of a wicked design to subvert and destroy our Laws, and introduce an Arbitrary and Tyrannical Go- vernment, and in defiance of the Parliament and their Authority, set up his Standard for War against the Parliament and People; And I did Humbly pray in behalf of the people of England, That he may speedily be required to make an Answer to the charge; But, my Lord, instead of making any answer, he did then dis- pone the Authority of this High Court, your Lordship was pleased to give him a further day to put in his Answer, which day being yester- day, I did humbly move, That he might be re- quired to give a direct and positive Answer ei- ther.
The Reign of King Charles the First.

1648. "ther by denying, or confessing of it: But, my Lord, he was pleased to demur to the Jurisdiction of the Court, which the Court did then over-rule, and command him to give a direct and positive Answer: My Lord, besides this great delay of Justice, I shall now humbly move your Lordship for speedy Judgment against me: I might desire your Lordship upon the whole, That according to the known rules of the Laws of the Land, if a Prisoner shall stand contumacious in contempt, and shall not put in an answer, guilty or not guilty of the charge given against him, whereby he may come to trial, that by an implicit confession it may be taken pro confesso, as it hath been done to those who have deferred more favour than the Prisoner at the Barr hath done. But besides, my Lord, I shall humbly press your Lordship upon the whole fact, That the House of Commons, the Supreme Authority and Judicid of the Kingdom, they have declared, That it is notorious, that the matter of the charge is true, as it is in truth, my Lord, as clear as crystal, and as the Sun that shines at noon, The Court, which your Lordship and the Court be not satisfied in, I have now rending in the peoples behalf, several Writs to produce, and therefore I do humbly pray, and yet I confess it is not so much, as I, the innocent Blood as hath been shed: (the cry whereof is very great,) for Justice and Judgment: and therefore I do humbly pray, that speedy Judgment be pronounced against the Prisoner at the Barr.

Bradshaw. Sir, you have heard what is moved by the Council on behalf of the Kingdom against you, you were told over and over again, That it was not for you, or any other man to dispute the Jurisdiction of the Supreme and Highest Authority of England, from which there is no Appeal, and touching which there must be no dispute: yet you did persist in such carriage, as shews you have no manner of obedience, nor did you acknowledge any Authority in them, nor the high Court that constituted this High Court of Justice; Sir, I must let you know from the Council, that they are very sensible of these delays of yours, and that they ought not (being thus authorized by the Supreme Court of England) to be thus trifled with, and that they might in Justice, and according to the Rules of Justice, take advantage by these delays, and proceed to pronounce Judgment against you, yet nevertheless they are pleased to give direction, and on their behalf, I do require you, that you make a positive Answer unto this charge that is against you, in plain terms, (for Justice knows no respect of persons) you are to give your positive and final Answer in plain English, whether you be guilty or not guilty of these Treasons laid to your charge.

King. When I was here yesterday, I did desire to speak for the Liberties of the people of England, I was interrupted, I desire to know yet, whether I may speak freely or not.

Bradshaw. Sir, you have had the resolution of the Court upon the like Question the last day, and you were told, that having such a charge of so high a nature against you, your work was, that you ought to acknowledge the Jurisdiction of the Court, and to answer to your charge, when you have once answered, you shall be heard at large, make the best defence you can. But Sir, I must let you know from the Court (as their commands) That you are not to be permitted to fall out into any other discourses, till such time as you have given a positive answer concerning the matter charged upon you.

King. For the Charge I value it not a rush, it is the Liberty of the people of England that I stand for, to me to acknowledge a new Court that I never heard of before, I that am your King, that should be an example to all the people of England, to uphold Justice, to maintain the old Laws, indeed, I do not know how to do it: you poke well the first day that I came here, (on Saturday,) of the Obligations that I had laid upon me by God, to the maintenance of the Liberty of my people; the same Obligation you spoke of, I do acknowledge to God, that I owe to him, and to my people, to defend as much as I may, the ancient Laws of the Kingdom, therefore until that I may know that this is not against the Fundamental Laws of the Kingdom, I cannot in particular Answer; if you will give me time, I will shew you my Reasons, this— Here the King was interrupted.

Here being interrupted, The King said again, by your favour, you ought not to interrupt me: How came I here, I know not, there's no Law for it to make your King your Prisoner; I was in a Treaty upon the publick Faith of the Kingdom, made to me by the two Houses of Parliament, that was the Representation of the Kingdom, and I had almost made an end of the Treaty when I was hurried away, and brought hither, and therefore ——

Bradshaw. Sir, you must know the pleasure of the Court.

King. By your favour, Sir.

Bradshaw. Nay Sir, by your favour, you may not be permitted to fall into those Discourses; You appear as a Delinquent, You have not acknowledged the Authority of the Court, the Court craves it not of you, but once more they command you to give your positive Answers, Clerk, do your Duty.

King. Duly Sir!

The Clerk then reads:

"Charles Stuart, King of England, you are accused in behalf of the Commons of England, of divers high crimes and Treasons, which charge hath been read unto you; The Court now requires you to give your positive and final Answer, by way of confession or denial of the charge.

King. Sir, I say again to you, so that I may give satisfaction to the people of England of the clearness of my proceedings, not by way of answer, not in this way, but to satisfy them that I have done nothing against that Trust that hath been committed to me, I would do it, but to acknowledge a new Court against their Privileges, to alter the Fundamental Laws of the Kingdom, Sir, you must excuse me.

Bradshaw. This is the third time that you have publicly disavowed this Court, and put an end upon it, how far you have preserved the Privileges of the people, your actions have spoken; but truly Sir, mean intentions ought to be known.
The Reign of King Charles the First.

known by their actions, you have written your meaning in bloody characters throughout the whole Kingdom: But Sir, you understand the pleasure of the Court; Clerk, Record the default, and Gentlemen, you that took charge of the Prisoner take him back again. So the King went forth with his Guards, and the Court adjourned to the Painted-Chamber, the Cryer (as at other times) crying, God bless the Kingdom of England.

Saturday, 27th January 1648. The Court sat again in Westminster-Hall, the President was in his Scarlet Robes, after him 67 Commissioners anwiered to their Names; the King came in, in his wondrou posture with his Hat on, a company of Souliards and seditionous persons were placed about the Court to cry for Justice, Judgment, and Execution; the people not daring to cry, God bless Him, for fear of being again beaten by the Souliards.

Bradshaw. Gentlemen, It is well known to all most of you here present, that the Prisoner at the Bar hath been several times convicted and brought before this Court to make answer to a Charge of High Treason, and other Crimes which are alleged against him, in the name of the People of England, in which Charge being required to Answer, He hath been so far from obeying the Commands of the Court, by submitting to their justice, as he began to take upon him Reasoning, and debated unto the Authority of the Court, and the High Court that appointed them to Try and Judge him; but being overruled in that, and required to make his Answer, He still continued continuations, and refused to submit to answer. Hereupon the Court (that they may not be wanting to themselves, nor the truth repos'd in them, nor any man's willful prevent Justice) they have considered of the Charge and of the continuance, and of that confession which in Law disturb'd on that continuance; they have likewise considered the necessity of the Case, charg'd upon this Prisoner, and upon the whole matter, they are resolved, and have agreed upon a Sentence to be pronounced against him, but in respect he dare not attend the same, to be read, and pronounced, the Court hath refused to hear him. Yet Sir, thus much I must tell you beforehand (which you have been minded of at other Courts) that if that which you have to say be to offer any debate concerning the Jurdisdiction, You are not to be heard in it; you have offered it formerly, and you have struck at the Root, that is, the Power and Supreme Authority of the Commons of England, which this Court will not admit a debate of, and which indeed is an irrational thing in them to do, being a Court that All upon Authority deriv'd from them. But Sir, if you have any thing to say in defence of your self concerning the matter charg'd, the Court shall give me in Commands to hear you.

King. Since I see that you will not hear any thing of debate, concerning that which I confest I thought most material for the Peace of the Kingdom, and for the Liberty of the Subject; I shall waive it, but only I must tell you, that this many a day all things have been taken away from me, but that I call dearer to me than my life, which is my Conscience and mine Honour: And if I had a respect of my life, more than the Peace of the Kingdom, and the Liberty of the Subject, certainly I should have made a particular defence for my life, for by that, at least, I might have delayed an ugly Sentence, which I believe will pass upon me; therefore certainly Sir, as a man that hath some understanding, some knowledge of the world (if that true zeal to my Country had not overborne the care that I have for my own preservation) I should have gone another way to work than that I have done. Now Sir, I conceive that a hasty Sentence once past may sooner be repented of, than recalled; and truly, the self same defire that I have for the peace of the Kingdom, and the Liberty of the Subject, more than my own particular ends, makes me now at last desire, that I having something to say that concerns both, I desire before Sentence be given, that I may be heard in the Painted-Chamber before the Lords and Commons, this delay cannot be prejudicial to you; whatsoever I say, if that I say be no reason, thofe that hear me must be Judges, I cannot be Judge of that that I have to say. If it be reason, and really, for the welfare of the Kingdom, and the Liberty of the Subject, I am sure it's very well worth the hearing; therefore I do conjure you, as you love that which you pretend (I hope it's real) the Liberty of the Subject, and peace of the Kingdom, that you will grant me this hearing before any Sentence past; but if I cannot get this Liberty, I do protest that your fair laws of Liberty and Peace are pure fowls, and that you will not hear your King.

The President said, This was a deciding the Jurisdiction of the Courts and delay; yet the Court withdrew for half an hour, advised upon it, and fat again.

Bradshaw said to the King, That the Courts had considered what be had sav'd and also their own Authority.

The return from the Court, said he, is this. That they have been too much delay'd by you already, and they are Judges appointed by the High Authority, and Judges are no more to delay, than they are to do justice, and may preside upon the matter that you have offered, they are resolved to proceed to Sentence, and to Judgment; that is their unanimous resolution.

The King presied again and again, that he might be heard by the Lords and Commons in the Painted-Chamber, with great earnestness, and was as often denied by Bradshaw: at last, the King desired that this motion of his might be entred.

Bradshaw began in a long Speech to declare the Grounds of the Sentence, much aggravating the Kings offences, and misapplying both Law and History to his present purpose. When Bradshaw had done speaking, Broughton the Clerk read the Sentence drawn up in Parchment to this effect.

After the sentence read, the President said, This Sentence now read and published, is the Act of Sentence, Judgement, and Repository of the whole Court. Here the whole Court stood up, as attending to what the President said:

King. Will you bear me a word, Sir?

Sir. You are not to be heard after the Sentence.

King. No Sir?

Sir. No Sir, by your favour, Sir, Guard, withdraw your Prisoner.

The King not being admitted to reply, was taken by his Guards to Sir Robert Cotton's House, and the Court rose; as he passed down the stairs the Soldiers scoffed at him, and cast the smock of their Tobacco (a thing very infective to him) in his face, and stove the pipes in his way, and one more insolent than the rest, spit in his face, which he in great patience took with more notice of, than to wipe the spittle away; and as he passed further, hearing some of them, by the intervention of their Officers cry out unjust, injustice, and Execution, he said, Alias poor Sons, for a piece of money, they would do so for their Commanders.

The Court after the Judgment given, went into the Painted-Chamber, and appointed Sir Har- dres's, Water, Arvon, Harrison, Dean, and Okey, to be a Committee to consider of the time and place for the Execution; The King hearing thereof, requested an Officer of the Army to go to them, to denote that he might see his Children before his death, and that Dr. Fox, the Bishop of London, might be admitted to assist him in his private Devotion, and receiving the Sacrament, both which were granted to him upon a motion to the Parliament.

The King at his Trial, (as you have read,) refused earnestly to have his Reasons heard against the Jurisdiction of the Court, but was often denied, but that the weight of them may not be suppur't for a further manifestation of the impurity of his unjust Judges, we shall here infer them, faithfully transcribed out of the Original Copy under the Kings own hand.

Having already made my Protestations not only against the illegality of this pretended Court, but also that no earthly Power can justly call me (who am your King) in Question as a Delinquent, I would not any more open my mouth upon this occasion more than to refer my felt to what I have spoken, were I alone in this case concerned; But the Duty I owe to God in the preservation of the true Liberty of my people, will not suffer me at this time to be silent: for,

how can any Free-born Subject of England call life, or any thing he possest his own, if Power without right daily makest new, and abrogate the old Fundamental Law of the Land, which I now take to be the present Case; Wherefore when I came hither, I expected that you would have endeavoured to have satisfied me concerning these grounds, which hinder me to answer to your pretended Impeachment; but since I see that nothing I can say will move you to it (though Negatives are not so naturally proved as Affirmatives) yet I will shew you the Reason why I am confident you cannot Judge me, nor indeed the meanest man in England, for I will not (like you) without throwing a Reaion, seek to impose a Belief upon my Subjects.

There is no proceeding just against any man but what is warranted either by God's Laws, or the Municipal Laws of the Country where he lives. Now, I am most confident, that this days proceeding cannot be warranted by God's Law, for on the contrary, the Authority of obedience unto Kings, is clearly warranted, and finitely commanded both in the Old and New Testament, which if denied, I am ready instantly to prove, and for the Question now in hand, there it is said, That where the word of a King is, there is power, and who can refuse him, habit deofl ibon, Eccle. 8, 4. Then for the Laws of the Land, I am no less confident, that no learned Lawyer will affirm that an Impeachment can be brought against the King, they all going in his Name; and one of their Maxims is, That the King can do no Wrong. Besides the Law, upon which you ground your proceedings, must either be old or new; if old, then it; if new, tell what Authority warranted by the Fundamental Laws of the Land hath made it, and when; but how the House of Commons can elect a Court of Judicature, which was never one itself (as is well known to all Lawyers) I leave to God and the world to judge: And it were full as strange that they should pretend to make Laws without King or Lords Houfe, to any that have heard, speak of the Laws of England. And admitting, but not granting, that the People of England Commination could grant your pretended power, I see nothing you can shew for that; for certainly you never asked the Question of the tenth man of the Kingdom, and in this way you manifestly wrong even the poorest Plowman, if you demand not his free consent, nor can you pretend any colour for this pretended Commination, without the consent at least of the major part of every man in England, of whatsoever quality or condition, which I am sure, you never went about to seek, so far are you from having it. Thus you see, that I speak not for my own right alone, as I am your King, but also for the true liberty of all my Subjects, which consigns, not in sharing the power of Government, but living under such Laws, and such Government as may give themselves the best assurance of their Lives and property of their Goods. Nor in this midst, or do I forget the Privileges of both Houses of Parliament, which this days proceedings doth not only violate, but likewise occasion the greatest breach of their publick Faith (I believe) that ever was heard of, with which I am far from charging the two Houses, for all the pre- tended

Tended Crimes laid against Me, bear date long before this late Treaty at Nonsport, in which I having concluded as much as in Me lay, and hopefully expecting the two Houses' agreement thereunto, I was suddenly surpris'd, and hurried from thence as a Prisoner, upon which account I am against my will brought hither, where since I am come, I cannot but to my power defend the antient Laws and Liberties of this Kingdom, together with my own just right; But for anything I can fee, the higher House is totally excluded.

And for the House of Commons, it is too well known, that the major part of them are detained or deterred from sitting, so as if I had no other, this were sufficient for me to protest against the lawfulness of your pretended Court.

Besides all this, the peace of the Kingdom is not the least in my thoughts, and what hopes of settlement is there so long as Power reigns without due cause of Law, changing the whole frame of that Government under which this Kingdom hath flourished for many hundred years (nor will I say what will fall out in case this lawless, unjust proceeding against Me do go on) and believe it, the Commons of England will not thank you for this Change; for they will remember how happy they have been of late years under the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, the King my Father and my Self, until the beginning of these unhappy troubles, and will have cause to doubt, that they shall never be so happy under any new. And by this time it will be too sensibly evident, that the Arms I took up, were only to defend the fundamental Laws of this Kingdom, against those who have tupped my power hath totally changed the antient Government.

Thus, having shewed you briefly the Reasons why I cannot submit to your pretended Authority without violating the truth which I have from God, for the welfare and liberty of my people. I expect from you either clear reasons to convince my Judgement, (heewing that I am in an error, (and then truly I will readily answer) or that you will withdraw your proceedings.

The report from the persons before named to consider of the me and place of the executing the sentence against the King, was on Monday the 39th of January delivered in the Painted Chamber, to the Commissioners then present, in these words, That it is the opinion of the Committee, that the open Street before White-Hall is a fit place, and that the King be there executed to morrow.

The Court approved of this Report, and ordered a Warrant to be drawn for that purpose, which was presently ingrossed, and Sigh'd and Seal'd by all the Commissioners present, in these words, (sic.)

At the High Court of Justice for Trying and Judging Charles Stuart King of England, January the 29th, 1648.

Whereas Charles Stuart King of England is, and daintely Convicted, Attainted, and Condemned of High Treason, and other high Crimes, and Sentence upon Saturday last was pronounced against him by this Court to be put to death by severing his head from his body, upon which Sentence, Execution yet remains to be done. These are therefore to will and require you, to see the said Sentence executed in the open Street before White-Hall, upon the morrow being the 30th day of this instant month of January, between the hours of ten in the morning, and five of the afternoon of the same day, with full effect, and for your so doing, this shall be your sufficient Warrant, and these are to require all Officers and Soldiers, and other the good people of this Nation of England to be affisting unto you in this service: Given under our Hands and Seals, &c.

This was signed and sealed by all the Commissioners whose names are herebefore expressed, except such of them who are mark'd with this note. (§)

But of those that signed and seal'd the Warrant, it must be remembered, That Colonel Richard Inglis or's hand and seal was against his consent put to it by Oliver Cromwell, but his early withdrawing of the fact, and his active and successful endeavours for the restoration of King Charles the Second to his Crown and Kingdoms, notably obtained his pardon, but the Kings favour with it, and the Dignity of Knight of the Bath, which was content'd on him at the ensuing Coronation.

Colonel John Hutchinson also for his conjunction with General Monk to reduce this Kingdom to its antient Government, and his hearty repentance for what he had in doing contented to and acting in this impious sentence, obtained his pardon for it.

The same day that the Warrant was signed and sealed, the Duke of Gloucester and the Lady Elizabeth were brought to the King, whom he most joyfully received, and giving his blessing to the Prince, He bid her remember to tell her Brother James, when ever he should see him, but he should take no more upon Charles as his elder Brother only, but be obedient to him as his Sovereign: And that they should love one another, and forgive their Fathers Enemies; And then said unto her, Sweet-heart, you will forget this, No, said she, I shall never forget, while I live, and pouring forth a-bundance of tears, promised him to write down the particulars.

Then the King taking the Duke of Gloucester upon his Knee, said, Sweet-heart, Now they will cut off thy Father's head, (upon which words the Child looked very wistfully on him;) mark Child what I say, They will cut off my Head, and perhaps make thee a King: But mark what I say, you must not be a King so long as your Brother Charles and James are alive, for they will cut off your Brothers Heads, when they can catch them, and cut thy Head off too at last, and therefore, I charge you, do not be a King by them. At which the Child, sighing, said, I will turn in pieces first, which falling to unexpectedly from one so young, it made the King rejoyce exceedingly.

Another Relation from the Lady Elizabeth's own Hand.

What the King said to me the 29th of January last.
Being come to the end of the Park, he went up the Stairs leading to the long Gallery in Whitehall, where he used formerly to lodge. There finding an un-expected delay in being brought upon the Scaffold, which they had begun but that morning, He pull the mot of that time (having received a Letter from the Prince in the interim by Mr. Seymour) in Prayer.

About 12 a Clock, his Majesty (refusing to Dine) eat only a bit of Bread, and drank a glass of Claret, and about an hour after, Colonel Hacket with other Officers and Soldiers, brought him with the Bishop and Colonel Tomlinson through the Banqueting-House to the Scaffold, where the pavement was made through a Window. A strong Guard of several Regiments of Horse and Foot were placed on all sides, which hindered the near approach of his miserable and distressed Subjects, (who for manifesting their sorrow, were most barbarously used) and the King from speaking what he had designed for their ears: Whereupon finding himself disappointed, he omitted much of his intended matter, but having viewed the Scaffold (which had Irons driven in it to force him down to that Block by Ropes, if that he should have refrited) and the Axe (of whose edge he was very careful, having minded (one present) of touching it with his Cloak).

Being upon the Scaffold, he looked very earnestly upon the Block, and asked Colonel Hacket if it could be no higher; and then spoke thus, (directing his Speech chiefly to the Bishop and Colonel Tomlinson.)

I shall be very little heard of any body else, I shall therefore speak a word to you here. Indeed no body could have held my peace very well, if I did not hold think that holding my peace, would make some men think, that I did submit to the Guilt, as well as to the punishment. But I think it is my duty to God first, and then to my Country, to clear my self both as an honest man, a good King, and a good Christian. I shall begin first with my Innocences, and in truth, I think it is not very needful for me to insist long upon this; For all the world knows that I did never begin a War with the two Houses of Parliament, and I call God to witness, unto whom I most freely make an accounts that I did never intend to intrude upon their Privileggs: They began upon me, it is the Miltia they begun upon: They confessed the Militia was mines, but they thought it fit to bestow it from me. And so be theirs, if any body will take to the Date of Commissions of their Commissions and mine, and likewise to the Declaration, he will see clearly that they began these unhappy Troubles, not I. So as for the guilt of these enormous Crimes that are laid against me, I hope that God will clear me. I will not (for I am in charity) and God forbid that I should lay it upon the two Houses of Parliament, there is no necessity of either, I hope they are free of this Guilt, but I believe that ill Infirmities between them and me, have been the cause of all this Blood-shed, so that as I find my self clear of this, I hope (and pray God) that they may too, yet for all this God forbid I should be so ill a Christian, as not to say God's judgments are just upon me: Many times he dealeth justly by an unjust Sentence, that is ordinary: I will say this, That unjust Sentence that

On Tuesday the 30th of January, which was the fatal day on which the King was put to death. The Bishop of London did in the morning read Divine Service in his presence; to which duty the 27th. Chapter of St. Matthew being the History of our Saviour's Passion, was appointed by the Church Calendar for the second Lesson: but he supposing it to have been selected on purpose, thanked him afterwards for his seasonable choice. But the Bishop modestly declining those undue thanks, told him that it came by course to be read on that day, which very much comforted his Majesty, who proceeded to the remaining duties of receiving from the Bishop the Holy Sacrament, and the other preparations for his approaching passion.

His Devotions being ended, about ten a clock he was brought from St. James's to Whitehall by a Regiment of Foot, with Colours flying, and Drums beating (through the Park) pait marching before, and part behind, with a private Guard of Guards about him, the Bishop on the one hand, and Colonel Tomlinson (who had the charge of him) on the other bare-headed. The Guards marching a close pace, as on a solemn and sad occasion to their ill-tuned Drums, He bid them go faster, (as his usual manner of walking was) saying, This he now went before them to strive for an Heavenly Crown, with its followers than be had often encouraged his Soldiers to fight for an Earthly Diadem.
I suffered to take effect, is punished by an unjust Sentence upon me: so far I have said, to them you that I am an innocent man. Now to shew you that I am a good Christian, I hope there is a good man that will bear me witness that I have forgiven the world, and every particular that has been the chief cares of my death, who they are God knows. I do not desire to know, I pray God forgive them. But this is not all, my charity must go farther; I wish that they may repent; for indeed they have committed a great sin in that particular, I pray God with St. Stephen, that this be not laid to their charge: and wishal, that they may take the way to the peace of the Kingdom, for my charity commands me, not only to forgive particular men, but to endeavour to the last gap, the peace of the Kingdom. So, Sirs, I do wish with this one to write.

Then speaking to the Executioner, he said, I shall say but very short prayers, and when I thrust out my hands — let that be your sign.

Then he called to the Bishop for his Night-Cap, and having put it on, he said to the Executioner, does my Hair trouble you; who defined him to put it all under his Cap, which the King did accordingly by the help of the Executioner and the Bishop: Then the King turning to the Bishop said, I have a good Coach and a gratious God on my side.

Bishop. There is but one Stage more, this Stage is turbulent and troublesome, it is a short one but you may consider it will soon carry you a very great way, it will carry you from Earth to Heaven: and there you will find a great deal of cordial joy and comfort.

King. I go from a corruptible to an incorruptible Crown, where no disturbance can be, no disturbance in the world.

Bishop. You are exchanged from a Temporary to an Eternal Crown, a good exchange.

The King then said to the Executioner, Is my Hairwell, and took of his Cloak and his George, giving his George, to the Bishop, saying, Remember.

Then he put off his Doubtlet, and being in his Waist-Coat, he put his Cloak on again; then looking upon the Block; he said to the Executioner, You must set it fast.

Executioner. It is fast, Sir.

King. When I put my hands on this way, stretching them out, — Do your work.

After it was said thus two or three words (as he stood) to himself, with hands and eyes lift up, immediately fooping down, he laid his neck upon the Block: and then the Executioner again putting his Hair under his Cap, the King (thinking he had been going to strike) said, Stay for the sign.

Executioner. Yes, I will, and it please your Majesty: And after a very little pause, the King stretching forth his hands, the Executioner at one blow severed his Head from his Body; The Head being off, the Executioner held it up, and shew ed it to the people, which done, it was with the Body put in a Coffin covered with black Velvet for that purpose, and conveyed into his Lodgings at White-Hall; and from thence it was carried to his House at St. James's, where his Body was embalmed and put in a Coffin of Lead, and laid there a fortnight to be seen by the people: And on Wednesday seven-night after, his Corps embalmed and coffined in Lead, was delivered over to the Care of four of his Servants, viz. Master Herbert, Captain Anthony Midmay, his Servers, Captain Preston, and John
His sufferings were such, as nothing but their history at large can in any measure expressive; such was his fortune, that in the greatest of his prosperity and milley, he retained an equal temper of mind; and although his indulgence to his people induced him to confend to devest himself of some part of his Prerogative for his own time, to satisfy the caufeless jealousies of his Enemies, yet he would not consent to diminish the Regal power of his Successor, and in what concern'd Religion, where he believed his confidence unsatisfied, no humane consideration could alter him; His clemency was very trancendent, for although no King ever received more reproaches and indignities from seditious Subjects, he never was heard to revile any of them, but rather to pray for the conversion of the most, and commiserate such others whom the malitious arts of his Enemies had perverted.

In several Battails in our unnatural War, where the success was to his party, he always lamented his Victory, and never had any signal Conquest; but he used it rather to invite his Enemies to receive his mercy and pardon by offering treaties of accommodation, than by improving those advantages to their ruine, which lenity was imputed by many to him, as one of the main causes of his misfortunes.

In Council he was quick and discterning, but somewhat too deliberate in Execution, and though none of his Counsellors equal'd him in parts; yet was he to disdinet of his own judgement, that he frequently declined that to follow the advice of others (most commonly to the worse,) as was in two things remarkably observ'd; In being persuaded to silent to the Act for perpetuating his late Parliament, and to the Earl of Strafford's death; of the first indeed he never openly complained; because he did it to shew his confidence in his people, (though ungratefully deceived in it,) but of the later he often repented.

To his Dometicks he was more like a familiar Friend than a Mafter, but did so temper his affability with a Majesty of Port, that it begot in most of them a Reverence and Love; yet such was the ingratitude even of some of them, that they mingled and joyned in the Crueltie with the most violent of his Enemies. To conclude, though his death was horrid and ignominious, and acted in the most immense degree of annoyance, by a wicked, mean, and incomendable part of his people; never died Prince more lamented by the generality of them.

Of Men of Note in His Time.

The first fifteen years of his Reign (following the many years of Peace that went before in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth and King James,) gave small encouragement to Martial Men, yet many of the Kings Subjects of Spirits addicted thereto, lifted themselves in the Service of forein Princes and States, and gave flag nal proofs of their Courage; amongst which, Those of most remark that have come to our knowledge, we shall mention in this place. In this number, Sir Charles Morgan bred in the Wars of the States of the United Netherland against the Spaniards, deserves a famous Memory, who 1648, who being employed in Germany with six thousand English, more disquieted Count Thiby the Empe- tors General, than the King of Denmark could do with a far greater Army; Sir John Burroughs also at Cadiz, and the Isle of Rbs, perform'd Serv- ices never to be forgotten, and was a great Cap- tain, and Sir Simon Harcourt also in Ireland, as before in many other parts, gave such proof of his excellency in Arms, as made his a los much la- mented by all good men. In the Wars of Ger- many, The names of Rutin, Lefty, Fleetwood, Douglas and Hamilton, are recorded to Posterity. Lefty served to great Honour in the Emperors Court, and was made a Count of the Empire; But of all the others, Rutin only served in our unhappy Wars, and deservedly had the Title of Earl of Brainford and Forth conferred on him; Many others, Brave and Expert Commanders there were, whose Eminences appeared not, till the Kings Service called them to the defence of his Crown and Dignity; of all which, If we should here make mention, they would fill a Vo- lume. Those of most Note were, The Marqueis of Montrosi, the Earls of Lindsey, Rochester and Carnarvon; the Lords, Jacob Ashley, Arthur Capel, George Goring, and Ralph Hipping; Sir Henry Gage, Sir Richard Greene, Sir Charles Lucas, and Sir George Lisle, and Major General Harveys, each of which were able for Skill, Coun- rage, and Conduct, to Command Armies. We may name amongst thefe, The Earl of Strafford, from the little time of whole employment in War, great signs appeared of rising glory, and more had been, if an untimely and immured death had not 1648, crop'd his springing Lawrels.

The most famous men of Learning in his Time were of the Clergie, whereof Davenport Bishop of Salisbury, Andrews Bishop of Winchester, Morton Bishop of Durham, Laud Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, Hall Bishop of Norwich, Prideaux, Bishop of Worcester, Riller Arch-Bishop of Armagh, and his Successor Bramhall; Sanders Bishop of Lincoln, Mr. Chillingworth of Trinity Collège in Oxford, and Dr. Hammond, one of the Canons of Christ Church in the fame Uni- versity; and Mr. Meth of Christ's Collège in Cambridges, and Mr. Hales of Eaton, are moft cele- brated; But others there were of great Learn- ing, as Lucius Lord Faulkland Secretary of State, a great Mafter of all sorts of Learning; Sir Edward Cook likewise that famous Common Law- yer, and Mr. John Selden of the fame Profession, a moft Renowned Antiquary, and Thomas Holy of Malmsbury, that Excellent Mathematician and Philosopher, all flourished in his Reign. Nor may we omit the Poets then famous, which excelld or equall'd all that went before and shall come after; such as were Mr. Benjamin John- son, Mr. Edmund Waller, Mr. The Care, St. John Suckling, Mr. Tho. Randolph, Mr. Thomas Care- wright, Mr. Abraham Cowley, and Sir William Davenant; The first whereof by his profound Learning and Judgement, fowed a Poet was to be as well made as born: And the later, though he wanted Learning, made as high and noble flights as fancy could advance without it.
King Charles the Second.

THE FIRST THIRTEEN YEARS

OF THE

1648.

King Charles the First being deprived of Life on the thirtieth of January One thousand six hundred forty and eight, in the manner before mentioned, his Eldest Son Prince Charles, by unquestionable Right succeeded to the Crowns of England, Scotland and Ireland, in the Eighteenth year of his Age. Proclamation and Coronation the usual Ceremonies attending Royal Succession could not now have their due course, nor are they in this Kingdom necessary circumstances of our Monarchy, nor by our Law (which admits of no Interregnum,) the Successor to the Crown has all the Rights thereof from the first moment after the death of his Predecessor. The Ruling part of the House of Commons who usurped the Government with violence on the Petition of the late King (as hath been related) knew they could not be secure if they refted there; so that immediately thereupon they published an Act even against Kinging Government itself, expressing therein:

That whereas several pretences might be made to this Crown, and Title to the Kingly Office set on foot, to the apparent hazard of the public Peace, be it enacted and ordained by this present Parliament, and by the Authority of the same, that no person whatsoever do presume to Proclaim, declare, publish, or in any way promote Charles Stuart (Son of the late King Charles) commonly called the Prince of Wales, or any other Person to be King, or Chief Magistrate of England or Ireland, or of any Dominions belonging to them, by colour of Inheritance, Succession, Election, or any other claim whatsoever, without the free consent of the People in Parliament, first had and signified by a particular Act or Ordinance for that purpose, any Law, Statute, Wills, or Customs to the contrary notwithstanding, and whatsoever shall contrary to this Act Proclaims, &c. the said Charles Stuart, shall be deemed and adjudged a Traitor and suffer accordingly.

Yet this Inhibition did not deter many Loyal Subjects from doing their Duty; and on the second of February this year, the following Proclamation was printed and scattered about the Streets of London.

We the Noblemen, Judges, Knights, Lawyers, Gentlemen, Freeholders, Merchants, Citizens, Yeomen, Stewards, and other Freemen of England, do according to our Allegiance and Covenant at these presents, heartily, joyfully, and unanimously acknowledge and Proclaim the Illustrious Charles Prince of Wales, next Heir of the Blood Royal to his Father King Charles (above late wicked and Traitorsous Mother we do from our Souls abominate, and all parties and confessors thereof) to be by Hereditary Birthright, and lawful Succession, rightful, and undoubted King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, and the Dominions thereunto belonging, and that we will faithfully, constantly, and sincerely in our several places and callings defend and maintain his Royal Person, Crown and Dignity with our Estates, Lives, and just drop of our Bloods against all opposers thereof, whom we do hereby declare to be Traitors and Enemies to his Majesty and his Kingdoms. In testimony whereof we have caused these to be published and proclaimed throughout all Counties and Corporations of this Realm, the first day of February, in the first year of his Majesties Reign.

God save King Charles the Second.

Coronation which is the next Solemnity, the exclusion of the King by the malice of his Enemies made impossible at this time to be celebrated. The Army had been before modelled into... ble to those designs of changing the Monarchy of England and Ireland to a Commonwealth (for neither this alteration, nor the death of the late King could have been effected without a Military assistance) which was first discovered when Colonel Pride seduced or terrified from sitting near two hundred of the Members of the Commons-House of Parliament, being those who had on the fifth of December before by Vote approved of the late Kings concessions for a Peace at the Isle of Wights, and those that remained after this violation complied so far with the Army herein, that after a first seeming dislike of their proceedings, they relented and decreed, never to re-admit them; and such others who had given their Negatives to the said concessions, were likewise Ordered not to sit in Parliament, till they had entered their dissent to them.

The Houfe of Peers continued yet sitting, and in regard the Commisions of the Judges were determined by the Kings death, they sent to the Commons for a Conference about that, and other matters relating to the settling of the Government, but they without returning an answer, declared the Kingly Office to be unnecessary and-barbarifm, and that the Lords Houfe was dan-gerous and uileful, and therefore to be laid aside; but that they might not be totally excluded from Government, they declared that they might be capable of Elections into the Houfe of Commons, of which afterward three of them only accepted; namely the Earls of Pembroke, and Salisbury, and the Lord Howard of Effricle, but the Peers in general very much restric- ted these indignities put upon them by a small part of the Houfe of Commons, and in a Protestation by them published in the name of all the Peers and Barons of the Realm.

"They affected their own Privileges, and the Fundamental Laws of the Nation, and dis-claimed and protected against all Acts, Votes, Orders, or Ordinances of the said Members of the Commons-House, for erecting of new Courts of Justice, to try or execute the King, or any Peer or Subject of this Realm, for altering the Government, Laws, great Seal, Ancient forms of Writs, or legal Processe, raising new Forces, and imposing new Taxes, or Oaths, granting Commissions, or making Officers, as likewise against the Traitorous Murthering of the late King, and the dis-inheriting of his Son the Prince of Wales, and particularly against that insolent and Frankit Vote (as they called it) of February the fifth, concerning their a-bolishing the Houfe of Peers as uileful and dangerous, all which Acts, Votes, and Orders, they declared to be not only illegal and there-fore void, but likewise detestable and detru-cive to the Rights and Beings of Parliament, the Fundamental Laws of the Realm, and the Lives, Liberties, and Properties of the Peo-ple.

This made little impression upon the Commons, and to prevent the assembling of the Lords, the Army by their appointment or connivance set a Guard upon the Doors of their House; and in further prosecution of their former Votes against Monarchy, they formed and passed An Act for the Excommunication of the Royal Line, the Aboli-hment of Monarchy in this Kingdom, and the set-ting up of a Commonwealth, which they ordered to be publifh'd and proclaimed in all parts of the Kingdom.

Alderman Reinaldfon the then Lord Mayor of London, a person of great integrity and Loyalty, and the then Lord Mayor committed to the Tower, was ordered for publishing this Act in London, and was therefore discharged from his Office, and with three of the Aldermen that were of his judgment, committed prisoners to the Tower of London, and one Andrew was by a Common-Hall chosen in his place, who with Pennington, Atkins, Polifhfon, Ponk, Edmonds, & Pack then Aldermen of London, and some others proclaimed this exorbitant Act in several places of the City. But this great Alteration so much amuzed the generality of the people, that the Parliament thought fit to give them some satisfaction, which was endeavoured by a Declara-tion, to shew the Reasons of those proceedings, wherein many plausible pretences were exhibited, the chiefest whereof is, A Promise of de-liverance from the Bondage introduced by the Nom-inal Conquests, and of maintaining the Ancients Laws (which they exulted for their excellence and equality) adding, That they might well con-fift with the present Government of a Republicke upon some safe alterations of Form only, leaving the Subfiince intact, and reforming the abuses there-of: They promised likewise, The establishment of a form and safe Peers, the advancement of elective Protestant Religion, and the liberal maintenance of a Godly Ministry; the settling of Treaties and Alliances with Foreign Princes and States, the en-couragement of Manufactures, for the increafe and flourishing of Trade, and the maintenance of the Poor in all places of the Land.

About the time of publifhing this Declaration to compleat the model of their Government, they abolished all the ancient Forms of Sovereignty, in the style and Title of Wits, Commissions, and other publicke Instruments, and ordered for the future, all of them to be effaced. In the name of the Keepers of the Liberties of England by the Authority of Parliament; and likewise they caufed the Old Great Seal to be broken, and a New one to be made, having on one side a Red Crofs and Harp, as the Arms of England and Ireland, with this Inscription [The Great Seal of England,] and on the other the Picture of the House of Commons, with these words, viz. [In the first year of Freedom by God's blessing refored, 1647.] and as another Ensign of their Domin-ion, they appointed that all the Money which from that time was to be coined, should be in the Kings Impreffion, bear the Crofs and Harp, in this Motto [God with us.] Those Titles in the first of Queen Elizabeth, and the third of King James, which enjoyed the taking the Oaths of Supremacie and Allegiance to the Kings and their Successors, were repealed by them, and a new Oath was framed to be tending to all that were to be put into place of publique Trufl, or made Free-men of Corporations; the ancient Judicial, & Legitmate Power of the King, and both Houses of Parliament, they allom'd to themselves; but the Executive part of Government ment, they committed to a Council of State ered by Act of Parliament, which confined of 40 persons of the chiefs of the Army, and others of desperate Fortunes of the most active in these alterations.

The Parliament of Scotland did by their Com- missioners protest against these acts in Eng- land, and particularly they disclaimed the pro- ceedings against the late King, but the new Eng- lish States resolutely anwär'd.

That they of Scotland were at liberty to all in their own affairs, but were not to limit or impose upon others, with many extravagant expressions to to justify their acts, but in the close they in- timated them to a resemblance with themselves, saying, That if Scotland thought fit to vindicate their own freedom and liberty, they should be ready to afford them all neighbourly assistance.

Before this answer could arrive in Scotland, the Scots had taken other resolutions; for on the third of February in this year, the King was pro- claimed at the Crofts at Edinburgh, The Chan- cellor of Scotland dictating to Lyon King at Arms, the words of the Proclamation, as fol- loweth,

The Estates of Parliament presently convoced in this second Session of this second Triennial Parlia- ment, by Vertue of an Act of the Committee of Estates, who had power and authority from the last Parliament, for convening the Parliament; con- sidering, that from hence as the King Majesty, who lately resigned, is contrary to the silent and Proclamation of this Kingdom, removed by a violent death; and that by the Lords Steffing, there is left unto us as a righteous Heir and lawful Successor, Charles Prince of Scotland and Wales, now King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, we the Estates of the Parliament of the Kingdom of Scotland, do therefore most unanimously and cheer- fully in recognition and acknowledgment of his just Rights, Titles, and Succession to the Crown of this Kingdom, hereby proclaim and declare to all the World, That the said Lord and Prince Charles, is by the providence of God, and by the lawful Right of undoubted Succession, King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, whom all the subjects of this Kingdom are bound humbly & faithfully to obey, maintain, and defend, according to the National Covenant, and the solemn League and Covenant between the Kingdoms with their Lives and Goods, against all deadly Enemies, as their only righteous Sovereign Lord and King. And because his Maj- esty is bound by the Law of God and fundamental Laws of this Kingdom, to Rule in Righteousness and Equity, to the honour of God, the good of Re- ligion, and the Welfare of his People: It is hereby declared, That before he be admitted to the Exer- cise of his Royal Power, he shall give satisfaction to this Kingdom in those things that concern the security of Religion, the Unity between the King- doms, and the peace and Peace of this Kingdom, according to the National Covenant, and the so- lemn League and Covenant; for which end we are resolved with all possible expedition, to make our humble & earnest address to his Majesty; for the Testification of all which, we the Parliament of the Kingdom of Scotland publish this our Act

The Scotch Commissioners here, were about this time call'd home, but just at their departure, they sent an Expofulatory Declaration to the sit- ting Members of our Parliament, wherein they put them in mind of all their Vows, Oaths, and Pro- lection for the maintenance of the King, Men and Right; and upbraided to them their shameful abjuration and infringing of them by what they had lately alled.

This was so ill received by the Parliament, that they imprisoned the Meffenger that brought it, and voted the Paper scandalous and sedition, and all such persons Traitors as should join with or ad- here to the Subscribers: They also sent after the Commissions, and secured them till a Copy of the Paper was sent into Scotland, to know if the Parliament & Estates there would own the same, and upon which a Meffenger was sent from Scotland to our States, to justify what their Commissioners had done, and to compain of the imprisonment of them, as a thing contrary to the law of Nati- ons, and thereupon the Commissioners were re- leased and returned home, but these proceedings on either side increased the distrust and jealousies of each other.

In the summer of this year, several Loyal Per- sons insuccesfully in many places attempted by arms to free the last King from great opprogen and eminent danger, under which he was then lay, as was shew'd in the History of that time, of which number the Duke of Hamilton, the Earl of Hol- land and Norwich, the Lord Capel, and Sir John Owen were about the later end of February, on the beginning of March following, tried and conden- med by a High Court of Justice erected for that purpose, (a Copy of that fatal Original made for the destruction of the late King) of which the Duke of Hamilton, and the Earl of Holland, and the Lord Capel were executed the 9b of March; but the Earl of Norwich and Sir John Owen were pardoned; The Earl of Nor- wich upon an equal division of the House of Parlia- ment in a Vote for his life, was sav'd by the casting Voice of Lemball the Speaker; but Sir John Owen had on his behalf the suffrage of many more voices than those against him, which was re- ported to be done at that time in a kind of popu- lar generosity; for that the Nobleman had made great intercession for them by those of his Allies (in favour with some Grandees in power, but Sir John Owen a Commoner coming from a remote part, had none that interceded on his be- half.

The Scotch Com- missioners send the Parlia- ment an Ex- postulatory Declaration.

The Duke of Hamilton, Earl of Holland, Lord Capel, were tried by a High Court of Justice.

The Earl of Nor- wich and Sir John Owen pardoned.
Duke Hamilton who first came upon the Scotfield, in his Speech declart his affection to this Kingdom, and the occasion of his coming into England with an Army, that is to say, his being commanded thence by the peremptory Command of the Parliament of his own Country, which if he had dis obeyed he bad suffered the same penalty he was to suffer here for obeying. He said many things in vind-dication of himself from the imputation of having been inconstant in his Religion or false and unfaithful in his alliances toward the King his Master, he seemed also to intitate a readiness to serve them in what they much defird of him, namely, the discovery of those who were the Inveter of him in,
so that his life might have been spared; with other things which concerned his condition as a dying man.

The next that came after him was the Earl of Holland, who spokt upon the Honour of his Family, and the Nobility of his Education, profess his sincerity and confirms adherence to the true Prolitie, and grounded his justification, acto to the matter for which he was condemned, alledgeing his defection from the Parliament, not to have been one of any ill design against the State or Kingdom, or any abjuratio of his first principles, which lead him faithfully to serve the Parliament, whose service he should not have deserted, had not the changes and alterations among them carried them be-gond what was reasonable, or what perhaps they themselves as at first intended. He prayed God to bless this Kingdom, and to settle it in the Ancient way of Government by the King, Lords, and Commons, and wish the present change might not bring confusion upon it, unless the Kings Poffcrty might be lookt upon, and owned by the People, and re-establish'd in their Native Rights: without Bloodshed, that his Blood might be the last that should be spilt, and concluded, as he was Chancellor of Cambrige, with his Prayers to God for a blessing upon that University.

The last of the thee that suffered, was the Lord Capels, who having made a very able and substantial defence for himself, both from the antic Laws and Privileges of the Nation, and from their own Acta and Confus, (though all in vain) behaved himself at his death, like what he had theved himself all along tobe, in his resolute acting for the Kings service, a perion of a high Spirit, and Heroick fortitude, and delivered what he had to say with a fearles and undaunted Deportment, wherein after an ample account of his Religion, professing his bringness and devotion to the true Protestant Religion, as it was established in the Church of England, he took the liberty to urge the unbelief of his Extemporaneity, contrary to the Law of Arms, to Honour, and the word given him at his rendering of himself, against the Justice of the known Laws of the Land, and for another cause, than his maintaining the fift Commandment: He express much trouble and re-penance, for having been one of those that gave their Vote to the Bill of Attainder against the Earl of Stratford, and manifested to the world the high opinion, and venerable Rememberance he had of the late Kings transcendcnt Verte, Nobility of Mind, and ability of Parts: Next he prayd

in preparation of Propositions to be sent to him in order therunto, but they were so much divert-together with the Lord Rea, the Gordon and those of the Clan of Mackenzie being jealous that the Covenanters (for so they called the Scotch Par-that he could not with Honour and safety yield to them, drew many Forces together in the North of Scotland, and seized on the Town of Inverness in the Kings name, expecting many others to come in to them, intending to moderate the Councils of the Estates at Edinburgh, that the King might be admitted to his Government without any previous conditions. This rising in the North was not so privately managed, but the Seis Parliament had advice of it some time before it was put in Execution, and they thereupon made

The Reign of King CHARLES the Second.

1648. The Colonels Ker and Stranghan, who marched with so much expedition, that they prevented any considerable conjunction of Forces, and dispersed those that they had got together.

This breach in Scotland, and the suppression of it, made the Government at Westminster believe it not unfortinuate to make some overtures to the Eilates at Edinburgh, to tempt them to a breach with the King, with an offer of their utmost assistance against him and all his adherents, but they could not prevail.

The King being now at the Hague, had intelligence from time to time of the Countess of Strafford, and resolved to go into France, that from thence he might more easily pass to some part of his own Dominions to receive their Commissioner: in prosecution of which intentions he left Holland, and came to St. Germain near Paris, where the Queen his Mother then was, and all the way he passed both through the Cities of the United-Provinces, and the Spanish Netherlands, he was very splendidly entertained. The Duke of Lorrain met him on the Frontiers of France, and at Compigny the King of France received him and accompanied him to Paris, and from thence to St. Germain, where he halted a few months together with the Duke of York, who repaired to him out of Holland.

In the midst of this prosperous fortune of the established new Common-wealth, there was to great a disturbance made by a Party in the Army, called Levellers, that if it had not been suppressed, all their Building had been tumble down. For the better understanding whereof we shall shew how this name came to be applied to them, &c then briefly set down the disorders that happened.

They were formed out of those Agitators mentioned in the reign of the late King, and were termed Levellers upon a pretended Principle, which they expounded, to end an equal righteous distribution of Justice in Government to all degrees of people, that it should not be in the power of the highest to oppress their inferiors; nor should the meanest of the people be out of capacity to arrive at the greatest Office and Dignity in the State. This was very pleasing to the Inferior Officers of the Army and Soldiers, but those that influenced them were a more considerable sort of persons, who to gain power and Authority to themselves, found out means by heightening this dissenter, to estray and dislodge the Administration of others, and to be pleased with nothing that was done by the Parliament or the Chiefs of the Army, and now the infection was spread among some of the Superior Rank of Officers, who in a jealousy of the aspiring greatness of Cromwell and Ireton (though they appeared not openly themselves,) spirited the private Soldiers to a deposition in the Army upon those Levelling principles.

There to come near the proceedings intimated, that there appeared a general self-feeling in the Magistrates and Chief Officers of the Army, whereby that Reformation for which they contended, was not thoroughly pursued as it ought, either in Spirituals or Civils. Cromwell endeavored to suppress it in the beginning, and sauntered Orders to be used to forbid their private Meetings, but not succeeding therein, several of the Soldiers were seized on, and tried and condemned at a Court Martial, and one Lackey a butler Acton in the business was shot to death, and eleven Regiments were immediately by Lot drawn out to be sent into Ireland. But this did rather incense than alloy the heat; for many of the Soldiers were so pursued with, as to be much discontented with their being allotted to the Irish Service; allying, It was a contrivance to divide them. That they were not Mercenaries, but persons that took Arms upon righteous Principles of Reformation of Government, and that till they saw such a settlement established as might answer the ends of their first Engagements, they would not divide. And hereupon many Regiments Revolted from their Officers, and if some Great Ones that seemed to approve their actions, had not betrayed them, the Parliament's Authority then, and the following Greatness of Cromwell had been laboured and prevented.

At Burford five thousand Horse and Foot of these Diffenters were drawn together, and laid there as they pretended, in order to a Treaty under the Faith of Cromwell's word, that no part of the Army should draw nearer to them than the distance of ten miles, whereby they were left vigilant, and in this their security, Colonel Reynolds (one accused by them to have discovered their Councils) fell in upon them with a greater Body than they had, and quickly routed them, taking nine hundred Horse and four hundred Foot prisoners, whereof one Thimbyson and two or three principal Leaders were immediately shot to death, and the rest by Cromwell's lenity or meditation pardoned; And after this great preparations were made to be sent into Ireland.

But these Commotions gave the Marquis of Ormond and those that acted for the King under his Lieutenantcy in that Kingdom, a fair opportunity of reducing it to the obedience of the Crown, wherein he was so prosperous, that the King had some thoughts of going thither, and a peace was made with the most considerable of the Confederate Irish; but contrary to their faith and promise, the Popes Nuncio by the interpositions of some of the Popish Clergy prevailed with the Irish-Irish under Owen Roe O'Neal to refuse to come under the Kings Authority.

Nevertheless, the Lord Lieutenant with the conjunction of the several Forces under the Marquis of Clanricard, President of Connaught, the Earl of Cabra, the Lord Inglis, and the Lord Moy, Colonel Mark Trevor, Sir Thomas Armstrong, the Lord Tant and General Preston had made up a very powerful Army, and had reduced to the Kings Authority all the Cities and Towns in the Kingdom, except Dublin and Londonderry; and Londonderry was besieged by Sir Robert Steward, and Colonel Audry Merivis with a good Bight, and Owen Roe likewise was by Colonel Trevor with his Army a little before defeated. The Lord Lieutenant being thus strengthened, determined with the whole in a greater part of his Army to march before Dublin, and came about the middle of June to a Village called Finglas, about two miles distant from it on the North-side of the River.

Colonel Michael Jones was Governor of the City of Dublin, a man of Courage, but bred to the Laws; and as he was a person of great Capacity, (by the experience he had gained in the Active Wars of Ireland) he acquired a very good knowledge and conduct in matters of War. The Lord Lieutenant in vain attempted by all fair means to coax him to a compliance with the King's affairs; yet those within were in so great fear at the approach of the Army, that it was a fierce affair to be made the first day; and all probability the City had been taken; but it is said the Lieutenant was unwilling to it, out of a tenderness to the English Protestants therein. After a day or two, skirmishes were very frequent betwixt the Dublin Horse and those of the Army; in which those of the City always prevailed, whereby they were much encouraged, and in one of those skirmishes Sir Walter Dungan a valiant Commander of the Army was taken, whilst they lay at Finglas: But the Lord Lieutenant perceiving the station of the Army, as it then lay, inconvenient for a close siege, drew it over the River (which was every where fordable above the Bridge) to a place called Ranimns, and whilst he lay there, it was resolved at a Council of War to raise some fortifications at a place called Baggesrath, next the Colledge of Dublin (where there was an old Castle motled) thereby to prevent any relief to the besieged by Sea. This design muchalarm'd those in the City, and the Governor was resolve'd to do what he could to hinder the fortification, and for that purpose he resolved to give orders for some Companies to fall out to beat them from the place. The Garrison had been reinforced a little before with a Regiment of Horse under Colonel Regnels, and two Regiments of Foot under the Colonels Penalties & Hunkys, and many other parties of Horse and Foot from the Garrisons that surrounded in several parts of the Realm, which additional Force were to the number in all of three thousand or thereabouts, besides that, with these from England, good hopes of provisions of all sorts were put into the City, so that the Souliers were in good heart; the Governor was very private in his design of the sally, which was in this manner perform'd.

The night before he appointed all the Horse and Foot, except such as were employed on the necessary Guards, (which were to the number of 5000,) to be drawn together very early in the morning in the Colledge Green and Grounds adjacent, within the Works, without sound of Trumpet, or beat of Drum, and with their Colours and Arms trailed; and the Ports were not to be opened till the Forces were all at the Rendezvous, and Centinels were set all along the line to prevent the going over of any to give intelligence. After all things were thus set in order, about eight in the morning, the Forlorno-hope march'd out to Baggesrath, consisting of an hundred Fire-locks, and after these a small Party of Horse followed, commanded by Colonel Theophilus Jones (the Governor's Brother;) and Major Meredith and all the rest of the Troops and Companies went after as fast as they could march with order and convenience. There was a Dutch made cross the high-way betwixt the Town and the Castle to intercept the passage to it, which was guarded by a party of Souliers, but these were presently dispersed by the forlorno-hope of fire-locks, who march'd immediately up to the Castle, and took it by storm, putting all that were in it to the sword: Encouraged by this success and some more force being come up, they advanced towards the main Camp, betwixt which and the Castle at Baggesrath, they were met by Sir William Vaughan The siege raised by the Marquess of Ormond, with a party of Horse, who made some considerable resistance (and indeed all that was made;) but he was slain, and all his party routed; and from thence they followed on to the main Camp, which was by this time in so much confusion, that they made no resistance, but were discomfited, notwithstanding that the Forces from Dublin march'd only in single Troops and Companies, having not time to draw together in Battalia. My Lord Lieutenant endeavoured to make a stand, but being not able to prevail, he with most of the Horse retreated, and march'd off, some of the Foot that were got within the Walls of Ranimns, made conditions for their lives, and had quarter.

This case Victory was much admired, but the occasion thereof was fail to proceed from the great animosities amongst the English and Irish in the Lieutenants Army, whereby enufed a manifold carelessness and indiscretion amongst many of them. Moreover, Inhabitants March'd from them a fortnight after they came before the place with a great body of the English to secure the Province of Munster, where Cromwell, lately made Lieutenant of Ireland by the Parliament, was design'd to land with his Army consisting of seven Regiments of Foot, four of Horse, and one of Dragoons.

About the time that this happened, or shortly after, and in the like manner, Sir Robert Stewart and Colonel Mervin were beaten from the siege of Londonderry by a resolute sally out of the Town made by Sir Charles Coote the Governor. The siege of Londonderry raised by Sir Charles Coote's Son in Law Ireton, (next to him in chief Command of the Irish Army,) altered their purpose of landing in Munster, and with all imaginable haste transported then Forces to Dublin, near to which City in a short time after the Victory they landed, and after a little day to refresh the Souliers, Cromwell March'd the Army to the Town of Drogheda, which a little after the defeat near Dublin, had been strengthen'd with an addition of five and twenty hundred Foot, and three hundred Horse, with many boat and resolute Officers, Sir Arthur Aflon heretofore Governor of Reading and Oxford for the late King, was Governor of the place, a person in whose Courage and Conduct great confidence was plac'd. As soon as Sir Cromwell came in sight of the Town, he sent a summons, which being refused, he immediately began his approaches, and was very active at the siege, making many furious onlets on the Town, with great loss to his Army; but at last he carried it by storm, and to strike a terror in the other Towns and the rest of the Forces that held for the King, all that were found in arms were put to the sword; amongst which the Governor himself, and The King removes from France to the life of Jersey.

Mr. John Berkley and Colonel Stingely appeared in Cornwall.

Mr. Windham came with a message from the King to the Council of Estates of Scotland.

Windeam landed not at Jersey in many weeks after his departure from Scotland, but when he came thither, the King received him very well. The substance of his Message was:

That the King would be pleased to acknowledge for lawful their Parliament, and particularly the two last Sessions of that Assembly, which being obtained, they offered to Treat of the means to re-

Dulph peace and obedience to his Authority in that Kingdom.

This overture admitted of great Debate in the Kings Council, for as yet the desperate condition of his affairs in Ireland, and other parts was not known to him; some that had no good opinion of the Scots, from their experience of their dealing with the late King, expected very small fruits of a Treaty with them, and rather adisted to rely upon the endeavours of Monroes, and the other Con- federates; but others reasoned, That their in Scotland now in power being the most prevalent Party of that Kingdom, and having with them the conjunction of the Kink (by which the people of Scotland are always much influenced) were more likely to affihim in the obtaining the Crown of England (if he agreed with them) than any others, whose designs were full of hazard and un-
The argument for peace, 1649.

The Parliament forces the King to leave Jersey and go into France.

The Earl of Caffells is sent to the King in behalf of the Commissioners of Parliament.

The Earl of Caffells makes all the haste he could to Scotland, and soon as the Committee of Estates and Assembly of the Kirk, who were met, delivered his Message and Letters to them from the King.

To the same effect also was a Letter to the Committee of the Kirk,

"That the Kingdom of Scotland upon his late Message, together with the consideration of all the petitions, letters, and other arguments, which have been vouchsafed to him, have now again fallen into the hands of the Protestant Ministers, and Mr. Brown, who are desired to his Majesty; not that they have thought to force him to a compliance, through his necessity, to his prejudice, or weary him by importunities; but by making their noble addresses to him, by this their humble submission, in which their desires, they hope, will appear to reasonable and just, that he will soon conceive into them, which they humbly beg at his hands. Affording him, that by that means he will be most powerful in the advancing and effectuating his Throne; it being the nature of his noble Subjects, and all truly noble minds to be soonest overcome with such allurements. That in these their humble addresses, they did manifest the world their Loyalty and Confidence to him; neither was it their purpose to flatter, but to be Faithful and free; that if he would please to confederate to what was promised by the Kingdom of Scotland, it would make him happy, and give them some hopes to live at peace, under the shadow of the wings of his Government.

And
And as soon as he had ended, the Commissioners of the Kirk having presented themselves to him, Mr. John Levison made a Speech, wherein, He prest his Majesty to hearken to the just desires of the Estantes and Kirk of Scotland, that so he might enjoy the blessing of God, and be received by his people in comfort and peace to promote the work of the Lord, and make them happy.

After these speeches, they produced their Commissions, and delivered their letters, together with the propositions from the Estantes and Kirk of Scotland, which were immediately read, and the Commissions and letters, together with the propositions from the Estantes and Kirk of Scotland, were as followeth;

1. "That all those who have been and continue to excommunicate by the Kirk of Scotland, may be removed from having access to the Court.

2. "That he would be pleased to declare, that he would by solemn Oath under his hand and seal, allow the National Covenant of Scotland, and the solemn League and Covenant of Scotland, England and Ireland, and that he would presently secure the ends thereof in his Royal Station.

3. "That he would ratify and approve all Acts of Parliament, enjoying the solemn League and Covenant, and effecting the Presbyterian Government, the Directory of Worship, the Confession of Faith and Catechism in the Kingdom of Scotland, as they are already proved by the general Assembly of the Kirk, and by the Parliament of that Kingdom. And that he would give his Royal Assent to the Acts of Parliament, enjoying the same in the right of his Dominions; and that he would observe the same in his private and Family, and never make opposition therein, or endeavour any change thereof.

4. "That he would consent and agree, that all matters civil might be determined by the present and subsequent Parliaments of the Kingdom of Scotland, and all matters Ecclesiastical, by the ensuing general Assemblies of the Kirk, as was formerly confederated and agreed to by his late Father. After the King had heard them, he demanded whether these papers they had delivered to him contained all particulars which they had to propose or define; whether they had power to recede from any particular proposed or to be proposed, also if they had any thing to offer for the carrying on of his service against England.

To which they answered, That they had acquainted him with the utmost of their power and skill.

A few days after, The Treaty began, wherein the King found many difficulties in every Article; for though that which related to the prohibiting all whom the Kirk had excommunicated from access to the Court, would deprive him of the service and attendance of the Earl of Montrose, and many of the Royal Nobility and Gen-try of that Kingdom, he thought not fit to break with them for this; but doubting when he should have obtained the Kingdom he might by degrees make them sensible of their mistaken zeal in their actions towards such persons, and win them to a relaxation of their rigour of that injustice; But that which most perplexed him, was the cause of Religion expressed in the severity of those propositions which required him by solemn Oath under his hand and seal to allow the Covenant, and to establish the Presbyterian Government, wherein they insisted so much as to deny him the use of the Liturgie to his own person; The King urged, that there was no reason why he should relinquish the Religion for which his Father had died a Martyr, and that which he was willing to permit in his subjects, liberty of Conscience, it would be very inconsistent with their solemnly pretended desires of Peace and Agreement, to deny him the same privilege which he was so ready to give them. That the Covenant by them senced, is the fulfils Covenant to bind them to him, and not for him to take, to hear to him or his, so that he thought it sufficient to pass an Act for his People to take it. He likewise offered to confirm the Presbyterian Government in Scotland; provided, that he himself might have admittance three Chaplains with him of his own Election.

During this Treaty, the Earl of Canworth end Mr. Murray arrived at Breda with new instructions to the Commissioners concerning the Militia which put a further dam to the conclusion of this Article and indeed it was faid, The King was willing to admit of a little delay in expectation of what he might obtain from the endeavours of the Marquis of Montrose, who was after many discouragements, (of which some mention shall be hereafter made) about this time embarqued for Scotland, and about the midst of April landed in the Isles of Orkney, accompanied with the Lords Treadway, the Master of Piciddle, Sir John Berry, Henry Graham (his natural Brother,) Colonel Johnstone, George Drummond of Ballach, and other persons his friends and confederates, with two Ships and a small Frigate of 14 Guns, 1500 Arms, and 500 German Soldiers; Colonel King had promised to come up to him with some Holo from Sweden, but did not do it; Colonel Ogilvy, and Colonel Cockburn, who were trusted with certain sums of money for the raising of men and arms, (the one in Amsterdam, and the other in Poland) fald in their duty, and conversed the money to their own use; and two of four Ships which he had, (wherein were about 200 German Soldiers, and many implements of War) were cast away upon the rocks a little before his landing; but these disasters which might have分成 a great relishment, abated nothing of his Courage and Magnanimity.

The Estantes of Scotland had no Forces in any of these Islands, whereby he had a good opportunity to raise men to form a little Army for his landing on the Main; the people were raw and undisciplin'd, much fallen from that Courage for which the ancient Inhabitants of these Isles have been fam'd; but nevertheless, he was forc'd to make as good a shift as he could with them; and whilst he was busied here in his levies, the Lord of Piciddle endeavoured to raise two thousand men for his assistance in the Earl of Seaforde Territories.
Lieutenant Colonel Stuart, with other confidetable Officers: Monsurs himself made a shift to escape for the present, by quitting his Horse, together with his Belt and his Coat with the Star, and shifting himself into an ordinary Highlanders Apparel. In this Fight the Royal Standard was taken upon which was portrayed the head of the late King lying a bleeding, and several other parts of the body, and this following Motto, Judge and revenge my Cause, O Lord. And the Lord Pi-ss-foder's Son who was Standard-bearer, was slain.
Colonel Strachan received a shot upon his belly, but in regard it lighted upon the double of his Belt and Balf-coat, he had no harm thereby.

So welcome was the news of this Victory to the State and Kirk of Scotland, that they bestowed as a reward upon Strachan a thousand pounds ftering, and a Chain of Gold: upon Lieutenant Colonel Haeket: a thousand Mark Sterling. But that which Crowned this Victory to them with the highest joy and satisfaction, was the getting of the Monroes perfon into their power: as indeed it was impossible for him to make his escape, so narrowly was he way-laid all the Country round, and so strict a search and enquiry was ordered to be made after him, besides a large reward premied to whomsoever should apprehend him; yet for the space of three or four days he kept himself undiscovered, by wandering up and down in the open fields with one Advocate only in his mistery, still being very near famished with hunger, it was his fortune in the end to fall into the hands of the Lord of Aiton, a Person who had formerly adhered to the Marquefs, and had been befrieded by him, and of whom upon that consideration, he doubtles hoped for the favour of not being discovered by him, if not of advisement towards his concatalion: But Aiton, for fear of what he must have suffered if he had been known to have concaled him, or for want of opportunity in re-

Southbank, to see Two Children of his that were

The Lord
Chancellors
Speech to him.

SIR,

I am commanded to mind you of the last judgment of God against you for your perfidius breaking of the Covenant, which might justly provoke God to divers your Councils and Affairs, for being been so eminent an author and diligent mischief against this Nation; you abandoned the Covenant, and defied the Oaths of God, and did invade your Native Country, and with mole inhumanity and barbarous cruelty did burn and waste divers parts thereof, and have spilt much blood of his Majesty's good Subjects, taking advantage of that time, when the prime Commanders, and Forces thereof were employed elsewhere. For these Crimes you were communicated by the Church, and forsook by the Parliament of this Kingdom, and yet still continued in the highest contempt against God, under that fearful Sentence of Excommunication: and to this day you have remained within the smallest show of Repentance. And God by his Providence hath now justly brought you both to receive the Sentence of your condemnation.

Hereupon Montefio's humbly desiring to know of his Lordship whether it were the Parliaments pleasure that he might be permitted to speak what he had to say for himself, and humbly craving that Liberty from them, he was told by the Chancellor, that the Estates in Parliament did give him free liberty to speak what he could say for himself.

Then Montefio,

My Lord, said he,

"I am glad that I may have liberty to answer for my self, though I am here your Prisoner, yet my cause is good, nor is there any breach of the Covenant on my part, in which I declare to be true to his Majesty, his Heirs and Successors, Concerning what I have acted in relation to the Wars and Affairs of this Kingdom, I had not only a general Commission, but particular Orders for what I have done from his Majesty, which I was engaged to obey by the said Covenant, and concerning my coming over now, I was astounded that you had professed to comply with his Majesty in the present Affairs, in which he hath employed me; and upon that account it was that I have acted, I desire to refer my self, and do submit unto this present Parliament, and the Authority thereof, to be my Judges in this case, whom I own as a true Parliament by Authority from his Majesty, and I shall be come, however it shall please God to deal with me. As for my life, if you take it away by this Authority, it is well known unto all the world, that I regard it not; death is a debt which all owe, and must once be paid by each one: And I shall be willing and much rejoys to go the same way which my Master pfaffed before me, and it is the joy of my heart not only to do, but also to fitter for him.

Moreover, he added to this effect, "That he appeared before them with so much the greater respect and reverence, by reason of the agreement he heard they had made with his Majesty, that he never was engaged in the League and Covenant, and therefore was not unjustly to be condemned for opposing it, since he was sensible of how far consequence it had proved to these disreputable Kings, and the welfare of his late Majesty, against whom those that ruled up in Arms in England were plainly affiled, and upheld by a faction of this Kingdom: that as he had never been the occasion of shedding blood but in battel, and by the necessity of War, so he had been ever careful to prevent all disorders as much as could be, and to have as many lives as possibly lay in his power."

The Lord
Chancellors
Speech to
him.
King Charles the Second.

1650. "what ever he had acted formerly against them to make a diversion of those Forces that were going from hence against his late Majesty, was merely in obedience and zeal to his Majesties service, at whose Command he so readily and without blush or delay did his Arms and retreat, as he had before cheerfully taken them up in his Majesties defence. That as for his coming in at that time, it was in order to the accelerating of the Treaty between his present Majesty and them, to the end that his Majesty being not driuen to rely wholly upon their affability might be enabled to make the better conditions with them. That since he had done nothing but what became a good Christian, a good Subject, and a good Neighbour, he defined them more to be trait or partial in their Judgment, but to judge him according to the Laws of God, of Nature, of Nations, and of the Land, as they would answer the contrary to the righteous Judge of the World.

After he had been thus examined and tried, he was commanded to withdraw; the Parliament were not very long debating the matter, ere they unanimously resolved to proceed to his Sentence of Condemnation, which (he being called in again,) was denounced against him in this Form.

You are to be carried back to the place from whence you came from thence you are to morrow being the one and twentieth of May 1650 to be carried to Edinburgh-Cross, and there to be hanged upon a Gallows thirty foot high, for the space of three hours, and then to be taken down, and your head to be cut off upon the Scaffold, and hanged upon Edinburgh-Tophobool, and your Legs and Arm, to be hanged up in other publick Towns in this Kingdom, and your Body to be buried at the place where you shall be Executed, except the Kirk shall take off your Excommunication, then your Body shall be buried in the common place of Burial.

After the denouncing of the Sentence, at which he altered not his countenance, or teemed in manner manner to be moved, it was again guarded back to prison, where being again hanged and importuned by the Ministers, he expressed how much he was beholding to the Parliament for the honor they had put upon him; for that he accounted it a greater honor to have his head stand upon the Prison-Gate for this Quarell, than to have his picture in the Kings Bed-Chamber; and left his Loyalty should be forgotten, they had highly honoured him in designing Meeting Monuments to four of the chiefest Cities to bear up his Memorial to all Posterity, wishing he had flesh enough to have sent a piece to every City in Christendome to witness his Loyalty to his King and Country.

The next day being the one and twentieth day of May, the day appointed for his Tragedy, he was led forth to his Execution, at which time his winning was his department, and his Speeches so powerful, that they made a very great impression upon the Spirits of the people, to the great dishonour of some who observed the passions of his death, were of opinion, that he had drawn away more from the Kirk-party by his manner of dying, than he 1650. could have vanquish in the field by force of Arms.

Upon the Scaffold he delivered his mind to the people in this following Speech:

"I am sorry if this manner of my death be scandalous to any good Christian. Doth it not often happen to the righteous according to the wages of the wicked, and to the wicked according to the wages of the righteous; doth not sometimes a just man perish in his righteousness, and a wicked man prosper in his malice; they who know me, should not disbelieve me for this, many greater than I have been dealt with in this kind, yet I must not say, but that all Gods J udgements are just; for my private fans, I acknowledge this to be just with God, I submit my self to him; but in regard of man, I may say they are but Instruments: God forgive them, I forgive them; they have oppressed the Poor, and violently perverted Judgement and Justice; but that he is higher than they, will reward them: What I did in this Kingdom, was in obedience to the most just commands of my Sovereign, for his defence in the day of his distress against those that rose up against him. I acknowledge nothing, but fear God, and honour the King, according to the Commandments of God, and the Law of Nature and Nations; and I have not sinned against Man, but against God, and with him there is mercy, which is the ground of my drawing near to him. It is objected against me by many, even good people, that I am under the Ceniture of the Church, this is not my fault, since it is only for doing my duty, by obeying my Princes most just commands, for Religion, his Person and Authority: yet am I sorry they did excommunicate me, and in that which is according to Gods Laws, without wronging my conscience or allegiance, I define to be relaxed; if they will not, I appeal to God, who is the righteous Judge of the World, and who must and will, I hope, be my Judge and Saviour. It is spoken of me, that I had blaim'd his Majesty for his Forbid; for the love King, he lived a Saint, and died a Martyr; I pray God I may in end as he did; if ever I should with my soul in another mans stead, it should be his. For his Majesty now living never people, I believe, might be more happy in a King, his commands to me were most just, in nothing that he promiseth will he fail, he dealeth justly with all men, I pray God he be to dealt withal, that he be not betrayed under trust as his Father was. I desirous not be mistaken, as if my carriage to you at this time, in relation to your wisest, were flabbon; I do but follow the light of my own Conscience, which is condoned by the working of the good spirit of God that is within me. I thank him, I go to Heavens Throne with joy, if he enable me against the fear of death, and fuminish me with courage and confidence to embrace it, even in its most ugly shape, let God be glorified in my end, though it were in my condemnation; yet I say not this out of any fear or distaste, but out of my duty to God, and love to his people, I have no more to say, but that I desire your charity.
The rigorous prosecution of Montrofa in that violent manner, was chiefly from the intimation of the Kirk, who at that time had great Authority, and did so much influence the people, that it was almost impossible to appease the scorn they raised against him. He had been excommunicated long before, and in that Church excommunication is so terrible, that now will have any manner of conversion from that pernicious proceeding, and the generality of the people, when they see a man whom their Ministres declare to be excluded from Heaven, are easily induced to think him unworthy to live on earth. Many, if not the greatest part of those that pursued his life, were earnest for the admission of the King, but so much did their zeal exceed their discretion, and so strongly were they intoxicated with the Covenant, and seduced by the inventors and accelerators of it, that they believed neither their Laws nor Religion in safety whilst he liv'd.

The King upon the Message sent to him, prepared for his journey to Scotland, and about the beginning of June took Shipping at Schevening in Holland, and after a happy evasion of double danger that threatened him in his Voyage, (one from a sudden storm which drove and cast him upon certain Dinih Islands, and yet without any loss of ships or men; and on the other side much respect and civil usage from the Inhabitants;) the other from a fleet of Parliament Vessels, which were sent out under Popham to intercept his passage) he landed safe at a place called the Spey in the North of Scotland. The Estates and Parliament of Scotland in the mean time employed their consultations about the formity of an Army for the service of the King, as they pretended, and an Act was published for the rating of every fourth man through the Kingdom, who was capable to bear Arms: The Earl of Leven was made General of the Foot, and Holburn Major General, David Leijey Lieutenant General of the Horse, and Montgomery Major General, the supreme command of the whole Army being reserved for the King himself, whom at his first Arrival they entertained with high Compliments, and much Acclamation, and seemed to congratul-

The Treaty was now near a conclusion; for whatever the Kings just retrenchments were, his Council perfwaded him to comply and accord with the Kirk in the exigence of his present condition; and as for the Militia, he offered to confirm it in the hands of the Estates for five years; but whilst matters were in this ncnefis of com- polure, news was brought of the defeat and execution of Montrofa, which much surprized the King, considering the time of doing it; and through he omitted not in an express by Mr. Murray to manifest his great dislike of the action (for he was much afflicted at it,) yet he was prevail'd on with much regret not to urge it so far to a rupture; he told them in his Letter,

"That he was very sorrowful and grieved to bear a report which came to him by credible persons, that notwithstanding those hopeful overtures lately made between him and them, they were tending to their Peace: Yet that these had not been some bloody deed of his good Subjects of the Kingdom of Scotland; and that the manner and effect thereof according to the report he had heard of it, did very much trouble him; but that he might know the particulars more certainly, he desired to understand the business fully from themselves, of whom he required an account."

A while after, the Treaty being ended to the satisfaction of the Estates, They sent a foilem 1650. Message to invite him to Scotland, and in answer to what he write about Montrofa, they brought him not to stumble at, affur ming him that there was nothing in what they did, but to accomph his ends, and to serve his interests to the left Advantage. They likewise requested him, to make all possible speed in coming to them, promising they would with their lives and fortunes offer to effect his a.. lish him in the Throne of his Kingdoms. And

And not long after when the City of Aberdeen presented him with five hundred pounds forring, the Committee of Estates seemed di-placed thereat; and last other Cities and Towns should in the like manner testify their duties to him, they declared, That what Money or Plate any had a purpose to deliver to the King, should be brought into the public Treasury; and in conformity to this dealing towards him, they proceeded to reform (as they called it) his retinue, inter-dicting all whom they titled Malignants, (which were most of his faithful Servants) from all employment both about his person and in the Army.

The Commonwealth of England had sufficient intelligence from the beginning of all these occurrences, and of the Engagement of the Scots to establish the King in the Thrones of all his Dominions, and that they might not be surprisized by them, they drew many Troops and Regiments together, and formed an Army which they sent to the Borders of Scotland.

Fairfax, who was to Command this Army, refused to obey the Charge, nay, insubordinately that they ordered him a Committee with larger power than that by which he had formerly commanded their Armies, excusing his refusal by reason of great indisposition of health occasioned by his wounds and other inconveniences of the late War.
Upon this, Cromwell, who was newly returned from Ireland (where he had been very Victorious)
the Chief Command of the Army conferred up on him, which he (after some little show of deal) accepted of, and about the latter end of June he marched towards Berwick in order to his advance into Scotland. The Scots whilst this preparation was making, sent many expeditional Letters to Sir Arthur Haudlegir then at Newcastle, urging the breach of Covenant and the Union between the two Nations, which availed nothing; yet they did not neglect the raising an Army for their defence, for matters were at this time grown to a greater height than to be decided by the Pen.

Cromwell, upon repair to the Borders, published a Declaration in the name of the Parliament of England to justify their proceedings in this manner towards the Scots, and to reproach a perverted part of them for that breach of the union betwixt the two Nations, which they imputed to the English, (for they would not lay the blame of their imputations on the whole Nation) but so great was the afflication of the generality of the people of Scotland towards the King, that this Declaration made little impression on them, though some privately kept intelligence with Cromwell, to the raine of themselves and their Country.

About the end of July the English Army to the number of nineteen thousand freemen, Of-cers and Soldiers, marched into Scotland, and came after little resistance (in the defence of four Paffes) to Montgomerie, most of the Scots who inhabited the Borders had left their habitations, which put the Army into more strength for subsistence than they expected, but a fleet of English Ships waited on their motions on the coasts of Scotland, yet Cromwell pretending to com-
most of them Liucers, made a very bold charge, and put the English Horse to a little confusion, but they immediately rallied, and were so confedered by their foot, that by six in the morning, the Right Wing of the Scotch Horse was routed, and the Left without striking a stroke ran away, and the Foot facing this rout and flight of their horses, and not able in any order by reason thereof to engage (without any resistance) threw down their Arms and fled, giving the English the full pursuit of them eight miles beyond Haddington. The Scots were so preoccupied the day before as to send to Edinburgh to affure Prince Charles a certain Victory over the English, and it was immediately reported that some of the Ministers declared it in their Sessions as the mind of God to have them delivered up into their hands; but in the midst of this confidence they found themselves miserably frustrated, and their despairing and despisted Enemy a Conqueror. The number of the Scotch slain in this Battle were reckoned to be four thousand, and nine thousand were taken prisoners with all their Ammunition, Bag and Baggage, and ten thousand Arms. The Officers and Prisoners of most note were Sir James Laundale, next Commander in Quality to David Leslie, the Laird of Liberton, Adjutant General Rickerton, Scots-Master General Campbell, Sir William Donglas, and Colonel Gordon, twelve Lieutenant Colonels, six Majors, forty two Captains, seventy five Lieutenants, seventeen Cornets, two Quarter-masters, an hundred and ten Ensigns-Bearers, and two hundred Horse and Foot Colours, with seven and twenty great Guns; and all this obtained with the losses of not above three hundred English Soldiers, and one Officer (Major Rokeby) who survived the Battell, but died afterwards of his wounds.

The Scots after this day lost quitted Leith and Edinburgh, whereof the next day Cromwell took possession; and the King retired to St. John's, where the Committee of Estates were assembled. The defeat of the Scotch Army produced not those effects as the King expected upon the Ruining part of the Nobility and Clergy of the Kingdom; for instead of enlarging their interest, by taking into their conjunction those whose help they had before rejected for their affection to their King. They ascribed the overthrow of the Army to the admitting of him into Scotland before he had given full satisfaction to the King in what they required of him; and in prosecution of these Counsels, they began very much to impose upon him, and remove from his person the most faithful and Loyal of his Servants.

The King could not brook this insolent carriage toward him, and therefore resolved at any hazard to free himself from the trouble of it, and by advice of some of his best and most faithful friends, he took horse one morning, with three of them in his company, pretending to ride out a little way a Hawking; and rode directly to the Lord De- days house near Dunske where he was received by some of his Loyal Subjects and Servants, with whom he kept intelligence, and from hence he was hurried to the Earl of Northumb. He was heard the Marches of Hantu, the Earl of Aben- chel and Seafelbus, and the Lord Ogilby and New-
King CHARLES the Second.

1650. Newburgh, and Major General Middleton, with the Gordons and the men of Auball, were ready to appear for him with no contemptible force; but he laid till by an express sent to them he should be informed of the certainty of their condition.

This secret and sudden departure of the King did much perplex the Committee of Estates, who were very apprehensive of the consequence of his joining with the Gordons and the Auball men and hearing he was gone to the Lord Dudgeon House, they resolved to send Major General Montgomery with a party of Horse to persuade his return to them (many of the chiefs of the Noblemen and Ministers being by this time sensible that these breaches and divisions would but give the English (then in the bowels of their Country) greater advantage against them, and that nothing could save the whole from ruin, but a general uniting of all parties under the King against the common Enemy.) Montgomery arriving at the house, went in to the King to acquaint him that he came thither by order of the Committee of Estates, humbly to entreat him to come back to St. John's, and being admitted to his presence, he fell at his feet, beseeching him to forget what ever had been hitherto committed derogatory to his Royal Authority, affirming him that he should hereafter be observed with all imaginable duty and respect. The King having heard this Message, conferred with his friends what to do thereupon, and though he could not easily forget the impositions and refrains he had so lately endured, being persuaded by their advice, that his return might be a means to unite all interests to him; and being assailed by Montgomery of the reality of those at St. John's to his service, he condescended to return with him thither, to the general joy of the moderate of all parties as well Covenanters as Royalists; yet he wanted not at the same time an assurance from the Gordons and the rest in the North to secure him against the Kirk and all their adherents that should oppose his Authority.

The Committee of Estates were much more compliant with the King at his return than before; and having summoned a general meeting to be held at St. John's confilling of the King, Lords, Barons and Burgess to consult for the good of the Kirk, King and Kingdom; together with the Commissioners of the Kirk then at Sterling to adjourn their sitting thither; they applied themselves to compose all differences amongst dissenters, of which the most formidable were, Hanty, Middleton, and those in the North; but after a while, by the prudence of this assembly, and the good advice of the moderate Clergy, all was concluded; and the Duke of Hamilton, the Marquess of Huntly, and the Earls of Lyndeborough, Lauderdale, Lauderdale, Calendar, and Crawford, by the Lords Buchain, Dudgeon, and Middleton of the Scots, with many others were received into favour and promise of employment in the Army; and of the English, the Earl of Cleveland, the Lord Ewerworth, the Lord Shilton, and some few other Royalists were continued about the King; for before, none of that Nation but the Duke of Buckingham, Maffey, Graves and Timo, were permitted near his Person.

Whilst these matters were agitated betwixt the King and the Committee of Estates at St. John's, Cromwell was not idle, he had begun to fortify Leith, and laid a close siege to Edinburgh Castle; and on the fourteenth of September he marched to Linlithgow, (near which place the main of the Kings Army lay) and sent a summons to the Town, but was resolutely denied by the Governors, and he returned back to Linlithgow, where General Drane came to him from England with recruiting men and supplies of all sorts of provisions; But since he could not effect any thing against Sterling, he resolved to try what might be done in the West of Scotland, and in October he marched to Glasgow upon intelligence that Major General Montgomery was ordered by the King to march into those parts, to secure that County which was then wavering in their allegiance. In this expedition he hoped to prevail very much either by subduing Ker and Strachan (who lay in those parts) to his power, or gaining them to his party; which a design he had long before projected, and so far by his dispositions proceeded in that way; and John Gallyer, Mr. Patrick Galloway, and Mr. Rutherford Ministers, with many others of that order withdrew from the Assembly at St. John's, and in print remonstrated in the name of themselves and the Western Churches against the present proceedings, and the admission of Malignants (such they call'd the Kings bet Subject's) to power and employment; and with these Ker, Strachan, the Laird of Warrefon, Sir John Chisholm, and Sir James Swart and others contradicted.

The Estates and Commissioners of the Kirk at St. John's, relented much this Remonstrance and the defection of the Ministers, but no means they could then use was of force to reconcile them; in fomuch that the division of publick Revolutioners and Remonstrators (for by those names they were distinguished) continued in that Kingdom with much animosity till the year 1660, that the King was restored to the full exercise of his Authority, though the cause thereof (which was the joining all interets to oppose the invasion of a foreign Army) had long ceased, but by that occasion Cromwell's Conquest was made very easy, and his fomenting that rent in their Church, made their subjection to his authority more lasting than otherwise it would have been.

The King was desirous to compose this disorder, or at least to prevent the dividing so great a force as was under Ker and Strachan from his service; and to that end, the Earl of Caftell and the Lord Broady, and Mr. Robert Douglas the Minister were sent to treat with them; but they were somewhat averse to a compoite, yet they declared against any conjunction with Cromwell, professing equally against Malignants and Sectaries; nevertheless, Ker upon information that Strachan held intelligence with Cromwell, was at length so far induced to comply, that he took Cromwell, whilst he was at Gisborn, had intelligence that the King's Army intended to relieve Edinburgh Castle, which made him return thither, and leave Major General Lambert with a good Brigade to make impression in the Western parts. He after some inquiry discovered a ford over Hamilton River, over which on the 9th of November he marched his Soldiers; but had intelligence of this, and at a Town of that name, he resolutely fell into Lambert's quarters, but the English Horse had to soon the alarm, that they drew together, and to well received his Charge, that a hundred of the Scots were killed, and the rest routed and pursued as far as Ayr, and himself (having his right hand almost cut off) was taken prisoner.

Lambert left Colonel Willy with some Troops at Ayr to command in those Western parts, and returned himself to the garrison of the Army.

In England some attempts were made for the King's service, but without success, and particularly in Norfolk, many Gentlemen & others were drawn together, but before they could be form'd into Troops, they were surpris'd and suppressed by two Troops from Lytham, and some Forces of the Militia of the County joyned with them, and twenty of them being afterward found guilty by an illegal High Court of Justice, were sentenced to death, and executed thereupon.

Edinburgh Castle had been besieged some months with little loss on either side, and Derbyshire Miners were brought out of England to undermine it, who carried on the work fifty feet, but the rock was so hard they could work no further.

The Governor was one Dundas, a Son in Law of old Leven, who was so practis'd on by Cromwell, that he surrendered the Castle on the 24th. of December upon the ensuing conditions.

1. The Castle to be surrendered to Cromwell with all the Ordinance, Arms, Magazine and Furniture of War.

2. The Governor and all the Officers and Soldiers to march out with Colours displayed, Drum beating, Match light'd, and Bells in mouth, and to be conveyed to what place they should desire, and every Soldier to have what Baggage he could carry.

3. The Publick movables, Records, Writs and Evidences, to be removed to Stirling, or to Fife.

4. Proclamation to be made, that all that had Goods in the Castle, to come or send to own and receive them.

5. All sick or wounded Officers and Soldiers to have liberty to lay in Edinburgh.

6. Horses and Wagons or other Carriages to be by the English provided for the Governor and the Officers for their convenient Travell.

7. Hoots to be given mutually for the performance of the Conditions.

The King and the Committee of Efares were much troubled at the news of this loss, and the more, because thereby they perceived, that what the force of their Enemies could not gain from them, their own divisions, and the pernicious treachery of false friends would depriue them of. There were found in the Castle five French Cannons, nine Dutch demi-Cannons, two Culverins, two demi-Culverins, two Minions, two Faulcons, eight and twenty brails Drakes, two Petards, eight thousand Arms, near eighty Barrels of Powder, and a proportionable store of Cannon-shot, with good store of Oatemall, Butter, flesh Water, and Beef and Pork.

The Mafter-gunner reported, that when the Guns were drawing to the Batteries, he had to plant his Pieces, that thofe of the Enemy could not have been planted but with great loss of men in the action; but when he prepared to give fire, he was forbidden so to do by the Governor, on pain of death.

Abernethy, his confident went often out of the Castle, on pretence to get intelligence, but the business was to make a bargain with Cromwell for the Castle, and when it was surrendered, he flaid at Edinburgh, and was ever after a promoter of the designs of the English for the Conquell and enlaying of his native Country.

After the loss of Edinburgh Castle, all the Forts on this fide of Sterlin were taken by the English, fo that thofe of the Scots that were loyal to the King, applied themselves with all diligence to raise what Forces they could to compleat an Army; and that his authority might have the greater strength and reverence of the people, they immediately proceeded to his Coronation, which was on the fift of January, the 17th day of Sooyn, a few miles distant from St. Johnfons (the accustomed place of Coronation of the Kings of Scotland) the King being the forty eighth Monarch of that Kingdom there crowned.

It was celebrated with loud Acclamations, Bonefires, shooting off of Guns, and with as much pom and ceremony as the prefent state of things would permit: The Nobility, Bruis and Burgeois, went from St. Johnfons to Sooyn in their Robes, bringing thither with them the Crown, Sword, and Scepter; (the whole Scotch Army, which flood all the way as a Guard between thofe two places, making a Lane for them as they went along.) In the Prefence Chamber, (where the Lord of Argue attenued as Lord Chamberlain for that day,) was plac'd a Chair of State, where the King fate with all his Lords and Attendants about him: after a low obeviance made to him by all the Company, the Marquefs of Argue made a Speech;

Wherein
King Charles the Second.

1650. Wherein he declared the affection of the Parliament, Assembly and People, to him, and of their hopes of good from him, to make them keep, in bringing England and all their enemies in subjection to him and them: Moreover he added, That the Parliament of Scotland were come to present his Majesty with the Crown, Sword and Scepter.

Then he was attended by all his Train marching in order before him to the Kirk of Scoon, where, in the midst of a large Stage of 24 foot square, a plat-form was erected with an aient of two steps, and on the top thereof a Chair of State was plac'd for the King to sit on; the Canopy of Crimson Velvet, under which the King went, was supported by the Lords Drummond, Carnegie, Ramsay, Johnstone, Brecdin and Yester: his Train by four other Earls Sons, the Lord Erefkin, Montgomerie, Newbottle, Machiel; the Supporters of the Canopy being likewise supported by six others, the sons of Noblemen. On the King's right hand went the Lord Great Constable, on his left, the Lord Great Marshal; the Honours were carried before him by the chiefest of the Nobility, in this order; Immediately before him went the Earl of Argyll carrying the Crown, next before him the Scepter was carried by the Earl of Crauford Linlithgo, the Sword by the Earl of RHAB, the Spurs by the Earl of Egington: As soon as they were entred into the Kirk, and the King seated in his Throne, he took the usual Oath which his Predecessors the Kings of Scotland were wont to take at their Coronation. One of each of the three Estates of Scotland, namely, the Marquess of Argyll (as being of the Nobles) one Baron, and one Bargee holding the Crown among them; then they delivered it to three Ministers of the Assembly of the Kirk of Scotland, who were appointed by the Estates in Parliament to present it unto him. At the presentation of the Crown to the King by the three Ministers, one of them made his Address in this form:

SIR,
I do present unto You, King Charles, the Crown and Dignity of this Realm.

Then turning his face towards the People, he said,

Are you willing to have Him for your King, and to become Subjects to Him?

Whereupon the King turning himself to them, the people cried out with a loud Voice, God save King Charles the Second. Then after he had been anointed by the three Ministers with the Regal Uncion, the Crown was set upon his head by the Marquess of Argyll, the Scepter was also given into his hand by the Earl of Linlithgo, and the Sword carried before him by the Earl of RHAB. As soon as the Crown was put upon his head, he made this short Speech to the people,

I do esteem the affections of my good People more than the Crowns of many Kingdoms; and shall be ready, by God's assistance, to live no longer than I may see Religion and this Kingdom to flourish in all Happy.

Adding many other expressions of his Love and Affection to the people, and afterwards Mr. Robert Douglass made an oratorical Oration or Sermon to his Majesty.

The Ceremonies of the Coronation ended, and a plentiful entertainment prepared, the King sat at one Table, and the Lords at another, there passing many Careless and Testimonies of joy and mirth time between them; after which they all returned to St. Johnstoun, in the same order and pomp they came from thence to Scoon.

After the Coronation, the King intended to march Northwards to visited the Levies there made, by his presence; but the Nobility and Gentry of the Highlands, promising to compleat their numbers with all expedition, He went no farther than after this Act as; in the next time, that those Scots that opposed his Authority might be able to subdue others, Strungalow, Cumnor, Colonel Dundas (the late Governor of Edenthorpe) Major Advocate, Captain Giffen, and Andrews, were on the 14th of January excommunicated for complying with the English.

The King having visited Airdree, Dunfermline, and several other good Towns, returned to St. Johnstoun to be present at the assembling of the Parliament, which met there on the second of March, and the Duke of Hamilton and many of the Lords that were reconciled to the King, were admitted to their seats therein. The Parliament applied themselves with all imaginable care for the raising of Souldiers, and provided and furnished the Persons and Estates of all that held correspondence with the English, and that the Levies might be better made, they adjourned the Parliament to the 17th of April, and marched into the North to raise Forces there, and others of Authority in other parts to employ their interest to draw Souldiers together; and till they should again be convened, a Council of State and Committee of War were appointed of select Persons out of each of the three Estates.

Great care was taken for the fortifying of the Town of Sterlin, the King himself going often to view the Works, and encourage the expediting thereof. In the mean time on the 15th of April a Souldier in a Mist, the Lord Montgomerie Son to the Earl of Egington, and the Lord Cranfon, with five hundred Horse and Dragons, marched from Sterlin, and resolutely fell into Lichbon, whence having taken what Prisoners they could in haste meet with, they retired; yet before they could 1651.

The Earl of Hamilton was sent by the Lord of Montgomerie, Major Stewart the Governor of Libon, with a good party purifed, overtook and charged them, but were so well received by the Scots, that Sisty of the English were slain, and Sydenham himself so wounded, that he died shortly after. This good fortune of the Scotch did not long continue; for a while after the Earl of Egington the Father of this Lord Montgomerie with one of his Brothers, were taken at Dunlartin by one Captain Crock of Colonel Berry.
Cromwell being at Edinburgh, having notice how the Kings Army lay encamped at Stirling, and that abundance of Provisions was brought in daily in order to an intended march into England; and that he might be in readiness to prevent it, he drew all his Forces together and encamped near Edinburgh.

The Parliament of Scotland were about this time again assembled at St. John's, and very busy in consultation about their Militia, and providing for the peace and security of the Kingdom. Middleton Northern Levies amounted to near eight thousand, and it was much controverted, whether those Forces should make a distinct Army, or join with the Southern Army; but lastly a conjunction of all was agreed; but because there was some emulation between Le$ty and Middleton about chief Command of the Army, the King resolved to take it to himself to prevent all discontents therein.

The 29th of May, being the King's Birth-day, was celebrated in Scotland with great solemnity and festivity, and there was a Matter of all the Troops and Companies, and at night all the streets blazed with Bon-fires, and the Cannons were shot off from Stirling, Brunt-Island, and the rest of the Scotch Garrisons; but not any place showed their affection to the King in so particular a manner as the Town of Dunker, from which a large contribution of money was collected towards his affiance, and the Citizens presented to him a rich and costly Tent, and six pieces of Ordnance, and raised a Regiment of Horse at their own charge.

About the beginning of June the Parliament of Scotland ended, having before their dissolution given large Commissions and directions for the preffing of men in all parts of the Kingdom beyond Fife, and in the Western parts for a new Army, which was to consist of fifteen thousand Foot, and three thousand Horse and Dragons.

They concluded in a very calm and admirable temper, having passed an Act of Oblivion for all things done thereto, inviting thereby all parties to join in carrying on the service of the King, and a new Engagement with the Stewarts was taken by all the Nobility and Officers and Soldiers of the Army to adhere to him; whereby all faction and division seemed in a great measure to be obliterated, and a true Union of mankind with him, that were treacherous or dissenters not before summoned, were on the penalty of Excommunication to appear at the Assembly at Stirling by a limited time.

Cromwell was very vigilant all this while, and waited greedily for any opportunity to draw the Scotch Army to Engagement, and for that purpose he marched to Newbridge, and from thence to Linlithgow, where from the Battlements of the Castle he discovered the Tents of the Scotch Army encamped in Tornard about four miles on this side Stirling, having called up a regular and well fortified Line with Balloons and Guns mounted for their defence, and having a River behind them, over which they might at pleasure pass.

The King did not think the force he should raise in Scotland able to fight Cromwell and invade England, without some preparations there for his assistance, to divide the English Forces at home, to which end he kept intelligence with several of his friends in London, Lancashire and other parts.

And it was contrived that the Duke of Buckingham, the Lord Wilmot, and Major General Maffey should with a Body of Horse march into England to join with a Party in Lancashire, who were, by a prefent time to be in Arms; but in the midst of these endeavours all their hopes were blasted by the taking of a Ship at ayr in Scotland, which had been bound to the Earl of Derby in the Isle of Man, and the seizing of Mr. Kerkenhead an Agent in the business, by whose Letters it was all detected, and thereupon were apprehended, Mr. Thomas Cook of Grays-Inn, Mr. Gibbons a Taylor, and Mr. Potter an Apothecary, together with Mr. Love, Mr. Jenkins, and Doctor Mr. Love & where tried for their lives,

Cromwell finding his Provision begin to be scarce, marched on the 3 of July close to the Scotch Trenches, and drew up his Army in Battalions, to provoke them to Battalions; whereupon they in the night planted most of their Cannon on the brow of the Hill, and the next morning saluted the English with fifty great shots, which made Cromwell draw back, and give over a resolution he had to force the Trenches; but since he could not effect anything here, he made it his next work to land some of his Forces on Fife-side, and for that service Col. Overton was sent with 1600 Men to raise it and lands & Cromwell at the same time marched up with his whole Army close to the Scots, with an inten to have fallen upon their rear, in case they should have moved that way to disturb the enterprize. Yet to drive the English out of Fife was a very hazardous business, and the English forces were now marshalled against them, under the Command of Sir John Brown, which was not done so privately, but Cormell had notice of it, and he sent Major General Lamertson and Colonel Okey with two Regiments of Horse and two of Foot, who were transported over the water, and being united with the rest, they engaged Sir John Brown, and gave him an overthrow, and took himself and Colonel Buchanan and fourteen hundred more prisoners, and flew about two thousand, by which Victory the English gained to firm a footing in Fife, that they were not easily to be repelled; and soon after Brunt-Island, and a strong Trench upon the River called Inchgarney were taken by surrender. And now the King and his Army were necessitated to take that course which long since had been designed, to march directly for England. Cromwell that he might make himself master of the Pais at Stirling, resolved first to set upon St. John'sfoot, which after one days Siege was gained. And the King
The King enters England with his Army.

The great opposition that he meets with.

The Earl of Lauderdale, Interceptors, Letters.

Never men (exit he in one of them) were more hearty; for all their toy, and seriously you would not know this Army; a natural purge is wholesome, (speaking of those that withdrew themselves) and I hope ours is so, since the ill humors are gone. The Country is kind, we might have men enough. His Majesty received the Lord Howard Sun gratiously, and Knighted him; he is the first, but I have no reason to believe he will be the last that will return to his duty.

And in another he hath to this effect:

His Majesty is advanced into England as far as Perth with a very good Army, able by the blessing of God to do his business. They are, I dare say, near double the number of those with which the King of Sweden entered Germany; never was any Army so regular as we have been since we were all come into England; I dare say, we have not taken the word of speech, and what you hear of our misfortune in Fife, or what ever our Enemies print or write, craft none; this is the last Scots Army that ever I saw, and I hope shall prove best. All those that were unwilling to hazard all in this case with their King, have upon a special precaution most of them left us. This is a natural purge, and will do us much good.

And the Lord Wentworth in a Letter to my Lord Castlerigg writes thus; By God's Grace we are come as far as Perth in Cumberland, with a good Army of fourteen or fifteen thousand Foot and four thousand Horse, all absolutely at the Kings Commands, as much as any Army that ever I saw under the command of his Father.

But in one of Duke Hamilton's to the same Lord, things appear not so well as those Relations describe; his Letter says thus:

We are now laughing all at the ridiculousness of your present state; it is but quit Scotland being forced to acknowledge itself to have taken the word of speech. I cannot tell you whether our hopes or fears are greatest; but we mean here our present Designs. Depend upon it, we will now neither lightly fight, or die; all the Rogues have left us, I shall not say, whether for fear or folly, but all now with his Majesty are such as will not dispute his Commands.

The King at his first entrance upon English ground was proclaimed King of Great Britain at the head of the Army with great acclamations of his Army, and shooting off the Cannon, he being then at Perth in Cumberland, and so afterwards at every Market-Town through which he marched. He met no considerable resistance till he came to Harrington-Bridge, where Lords endeavored to impede his passage, but his wearied forces could not if it seems hold out a march of that length, so that he came on the 22d of August to Worcester, where after one or two Repulses by the Forces that kept that City, he quickly entered, through the ready assistance of the Inhabitants, who not only opposed, but also helped to bear the Parliament Soldiers out of the Town. Advice came to the King of the distressed condition of those in London, which occasioned a debate in Council there.
The King.

For the Commander in Chief of the Scotch Army
SIR,

By your Trumpet I received two Papers, the one containing a Proposilion, the other a direct Summons for the Rendition of the Town and Castle of Shrewsbury, the Custody whereof I have received by Authority of Parliament; and if you believe me a Gentleman (as you say you do) you may believe I will be faithful to my Trumpet; to the violation whereof neither allarmes can persuade me, nor those forces, especially when you Paper one, come! With what Principles I am judged to be, I know not, but I hope they are as well as ever declare me honest, and I am not differing herein (as I know) from those engaged in the same employment with me, who should try such affairs that cause they are embarked in. I presume to be found, as I am immovable, the faithful servant of the Commonwealth of England.

H. Mackworth.

About two or three days before the Kings arrival at Woresfer, the Earl of Derby having land ed at Weyswater in Lancashire, came to him with two hundred and fifty Foot and sixty Horse, which he brought with him out of the Isle of Man, and immediately returning back into Lancashire to raise a more considerable force, he thought he had about 3000 men, and so much was he believe in those parts, that a little more time had made him formidable; with these he was marching upon a design to take upon Cromwell's own Regiment then quartered at Bower in their march towards him, but news came to him of Colonel Lihburn's approach towards him with ten Troops or Horse (which were ordered out of Yorkshire on purpose to hinder his Leves), and two Regiments of Chefsire Foot: The Earl nothing disturbed at this Force, resolved to engage Lihburn and his party, before the other Troops could come to him, and accordingly he charged them so furiously, that he routed the first Troops, and had made an impression so far into their Body, that they began to be disordered, till the accession of fresh Reaps, both of Horse and foot so overpowered him, that they were totally vanquished; most of the Kings party were Horse, and the fight was in Lanes, where they were much annoyed by the Enemies Musketeers. There were taken prisoners of Quality, the Lord Widdington, Sir Thomas Tidenriff, Colonel Mathew Boynton, Sir Francis Charnel, Major Trollop, Sir William Throgmorton, Colonel Richard Legg, Colonel Rakeiff, Gerard, and some other whole names we know not, and many of these names died of their wounds. The Earl of Derby (having lost his George and Garter) fled with about thirty Horse towards Woresfer, having shrewdly himself one night in his way in a house called Rofode, which Heaven by means of this had prepared for the Kings retreat and preservation.

By this time Cromwel had surrounded Woresfer with his preceding Hoft, inas near a compass as Rivers and Paffes would suffer him, the surrounds Kings Army as yet lying out of the Town a mile in the fields: The Earl has endeavoured to be taking was upon-Bridge on Fleetwood side, which Major General Lambarry attempted with five hundred men to defend Horie and Dragoons, and after a brisk dispute wrested from Colonel Maffey, who in defence thereof received a wound in his hand.

The Scots having thus abandoned the place where they were, it was presently pollied by a strong party of Horie and foot, in order to the present advance of the rest of the Army.

The King's Army were drawn up very near Worcester, and made many excursions, breaking down two or three Bridges over the River Tern, betwixt the Enemy and them, and shewing a well ordered and governed courage, but September the 3d, that ominous day being arrived, Cromwell resolved to venture the event upon its former Answer, and to that purpose having his Boats in readiness, he passed over his men in the afternoon of that day, and drew them all into a fighting posture, and having given the signal to the whole Army to fall on, the fight was begun in this manner.

Cromwell himself in person (about four of the Clock with his Life-Guard and Colonels Hacket's Regiment of Horie, with part of his own Foot Regiment, with the intire Regiments of Colonel Ingoldby and Colonel Fairfax, marched directly towards the City, and after him Lieutenant General Fleetwood advanced with Colonel Gofts and Major General Deasy Regiments; the King's forces encountering them at the hedges betwixt the City and them, and disputing every field with them, in such order and with such gallantry, that those already engaged (left they should be wholly discouraged with the homets of the service,) were relieved by reserves, and they by others, no considerable progress was yet made, the Highlanders proving excellent fire-men, and coming to the butt-end of Musquet, till wearied with continual action, and their Ammunition spent, the King (being then upon the place) commanded them in some haste into the City, and hastened himself to the other side, where Colonel Haym's his Regiment with Collet's stood about Poleick-Bridge, and were entertained with no less man-hood and slaughter, than those on the other side; and though one Colonel Matthews was the Referee to these two Regiments, yet did the Scotch foot fairly drive them from their ground, till at last being harassed out, and no seconds or supplies to be expected, in a careless regard of the Enemy, as if they feared not to make which way they pleased, they drew likewise into the Town, and did another Brigade which opposed the Regiments of the Lord Gray, and Colonel Gibbons joined with two others on an other part. The King's Army was drawn very close together, and sent out several Bodies, who charged very briskly on the Generals side, where the fight was hottest. (He having brought on the Militia forces to relieve his other Troops.) In the head of one of these Bodies the King himself charged with marvellous gallantry and conduct, and pres'd to hard upon Cromwell's Life-Guard, that the Troop was very much disordered, and the Captain very dangerously wounded; and in another Charge Duke Hamilton, (who behaved himself with undaunted courage and resolution,) received a shot on his thigh, whereof presently after he died.

The Militia Regiments of Essex, Surrey, and Suffolk were much annoyed by the Scots, and many of their men slain, but Cromwell drew on fresh and entire Brigades and Regiments, which were in reserve, of the Veteran bands, by which the Royalists were so overpowered, that they were forced to retreat into the City, which they could not do with such order, but many of the Cromwellians got in with them; Left with 2000 Horse (upon what account not known) not flaming out of the Town to relieve his party, when the enemy entered. The King retired to his Quarters for a while, and danger at night the Enemy gained the Fort Royal, at which time his Majesty left the City, putting out at St. Martin's Gate, accompanied with about sixty Horse of the chiefest and most confident of his Retinue, (though many more prefided to bear him company) and it was reported that Collet very narrowly miss of him as he left his lodging.

The Enemies foot was now got into the Town, and according to their order fell a plundering the Inhabitants in a most barbarous manner, giving no Quarter to any that they found in the streets: and though this their greediness of spoil, they kept the Gates shut, and the Horie out, left they should have shared the better part; and thereby favour'd (as God would have it) the Kings escape: some Scots who had got into one of the Churches held out till next morning, when they obtained Quarter for life; by which time there was not an Inhabitant in Worcester, friend or foe, left worth a fhill of what they had in the Town; but the Royal Inhabitants lost least by the ravage (being supplied with fresh Waters to their desires by the honest Citizens of London without any scruple of credit or payment, and their debts were forborn till such time as God should enable them to pay, which the Gentry and Inhabitants round about them endeavoured to bring to pass, by their more than ordinary resort to that Market for all necessitides and upon all occasions. The Mayor (who was Knighted by the King) and all the Aldermen were committed to prison, and the wife of one Gyses (whole husband for betraying the design of the King in that Garrison, was hanged) was rewarded by the Parliament with 200 lib. per annum, and 200 lib. in money.

There were rail in the field in the Town, and in pursuit some 2000, and about 8000 were taken prisoners in several places; most of the English Common-men escaping by their Shipboard; but at Newport in the pursuit there were taken, Earl of Alnwick, Earl of Rutland, Earl of Carlavon, Earl of Kelly, Earl of Devol, Earl of Cleveland, the new Earl of Shrewsberry, Sir John Pakington, Lord Smythe, Sir Ralph Clare, Sir Charles Cunningham, Colonel Graves, Master Richard Fanfoul, Secretary to the King, many also whole names we have not. (viz.) 6 Colonels of Horse, 13 of Foot, 9 Lieutenant Colonels of Horse, 8 Lieutenant Colonels of Foot, 6 Majors of Horse, 13 Majors of Foot, 57 Captains of Horse, 72 Captains of Foot, 55 Quarter-Masters, 89 Lieutenants; there were taken also some General Officers, with 76 Cornets of Horse, 99 Ensigns of Foot, 90 Quartermasters, 80 of the King's Servants, with the Kings Kings Standard, which he had set up when he summoned the Countrie, the Kings Coach and Horses, and Collar of SS, but the Kings Ponets they had no power to touch, which recompened all the other Lots.

He (as was said before) departed in the dusk, leaving Colonel Careles in his Rear, to keep the Enemy in dispaire, while he was something forward on his way, & the approaching night might favour his escape. To which end, all persons about him were commanded to speak French, and a present Confultation was held which course they should fcer, and it was resolved by my Lord of Derby, that they should make what speed they could, and recover a place called Whitleadies before morning, which was some 25 miles from Worcesl; and thenceon one Mafter Gifford then in the company, was called for his guidance thither; and one Walker (that had been formerly a Scout-mater in the Kings Army) was his affiftant, yet the way was mistaken as they paffed a Heath, but by good providence soon recovered.

Betwixt three and four a clock the King reached this place, and Mafter Gifford (after some knocking at the door,) called up one George Penderill, a Servant in the Houte, who hearing and knowing his voice, ran down in his shirt and opened the door, and the King and his Retinue entred, where after a little debate about the security of his person, the said Earl having called thither William Penderill the House-keeper of Bofcobel, and dispatch'd another towards Tung to see if the Coast was yet clear; His Majefly in the mean while had his hair cut off, and his Bub- doublet and Lumen-breeces buried, and he was diliguent in Countrie habit, with adjuration of the fidelity of the Pendrills (who were now with their brother in Low George Times in number five) committed & entrusted to the Earl of Derby to their fidelity, which they were fully and dutifully promied. Then the Earl and the rest of the Lords, viz. the Duke of Buckingham and that Train, with tears took their leave (Derby would have flaid, but there was no probability of efficere for two) and my Lord Wilmot with John Penderill withdrew himfelf from that company to another retreat; the rest (except the Duke who lay conceale in other friends houses about that Countrie) were taken as aforefaid at Newport by Lilburne Hoxie, the fame who had defeated the Earl of Derby, who now rendred himself a Prisoner to one Captain Edge of Lancashire, on promife of quarter for life.

As soon as the King was thus left by his Company, with a Wood-bill in his hand, he was conduite into a Wood or Coppice near adjoining, taking the name of William Jones a Wood-cutter, newly come thither for work, and was accor Địnhly influfued in his Tongue and Behavior. That day proved very wet, so that Trams his Wife brought him a blanket to cover him, and a dibb of Milk and Apples for his refreshment, and at night against his coming home (where the Mother of the Pendrills at her Son Richard's house, most joyfully welcom'd him) and provided an ordinary Countrie Supper, which ended, the King with Richard his guide resolved for Wales, 1651, and went to the Matter Wolfe of Maddedy, where for fear of search, he was fain to take up his Quarters in the Barn, where Mafter Wolfe and his Wife attended on him. Here his Majefly understood that the piffles over the Water, and the River Wye, were foor guarded, that it was un-feafonable for him to adventur into Wales, & that on Friday night he retried in his woolen accoutrements about his legs (in which he had lain in that hard lodging in great pain and fore-fees) to Bofcobel, where he found Colonel Carele (who had also betaken himself thither for shelter; & by his direction, that Saturday the King went into the Wood, (from the pleafante of whereof the houte took its name,) and by Ladders ascended into the top of that most celebrated Oak, which being thick with branches stretch- ing and floowing fore-right, was altogether imprvdous to the fight; and here the Colonel bore him company while he laid his head, and flet upon a pillow in his lap. At night they both defcended, and came into the houte and room themfelves, and the King perceiving the fecrecy of the place, was not willing to keep longer a-broad. He fah away the Sunday in a kind of Arbour or Banquetting-houfe at the end of the Garden, and there John Penderill came to him from my Lord Wilmot, to conduct him to Mr. White- graves houte at Mofley; whether with much difficulty and danger he himfelf had arrived, but the safety there anfwered all. The King approved of my Lord Wilmot advice, and on Monday night (with the guard of the five brethren) and the help of the Millers horte, he came to Mr. Whitegraves, where he was gladly received by my Lord and that Gentleman, and conveyed into a secret place; and there it was confidered what confe to take for a further progrefion in the Kings escape & to this purpose one Colonel Lane of Bemty was made acquainted with it, and by them it was agreed, that Miftris Jane Lons-jon, Mift and Mrs. Jana Lanc underway to Miftris to Mift and Mrs. Lons-jon, to ferve ride to Brifol, and the King as her convey to Mr. Leefelt and his Wife behind him, and a Pafs for their more fecurity in travel was procured.

On their way thither, my Lord Wilmot (as of chance) met with them, having a Hawk on his flit, and fo they journeyed together to Bridgegraves, where the Kings Horte lofit a flooee, He was for'd to carry his Horte to a Parrier, who inquiring of News of the King, and being anfwered by his Majefly, that he believ'd the King was escaped to Scotland, he replyed, that no doubt the King was secretly somewhere in England, and wife'd he knew where, for that he could get a 1000 l. by taking of him. The King departing from thence, comes to Evesham, where advising how to avoid Troopers then gaz'ng their Horte in the Mfters Adjoyning, they lighted upon them in a near Village as they rode, but they civilly let them pafs on their way to Cirenefer to the Crown, where they lodged that night, and went the next day towards Bridge within three Miles of the City, to the houte of Mr. Norton of Leigh, the designed journeys end. Here the King feign'd himfelf fick, and took his Chamber by the order and care of Mrs. Lang. but the next morning sleeping into the Cellar, he was taken notice of by the Butler, one John Pope, a Soldier formerly in the late King's Army, who upon an instant look discermed him, and in all dutiful manner discovered himself to him, with such assurance of fidelity, that he gained his Majesties belief to fast, as to be employed by him in getting a Ship for his transportation: thence the King was conducted by my Lord Wilmot to one Colonel Windham's House at Treat in Dorset-shire, where he continued almost three weeks in expectation of a passage from Lyme. Soon after his arrival here, Mrs. Jane Lane with Mr. Laffels parted, being openly entertained as kinsfolk, and came in safety back again to Staffordshire.

The occurrences that happened here, we cannot certainly relate, only the King was disappointed of a passage which a Merchant had procured for him at Lyme, (by my Lord Wilmot and Colonel Windham's means;) and though the fault was in the Merchant, and he the dejected spirit of the Master of the Bark; yet this disappointment had like to have proved the Kings name, by the flowering of my Lord Wilmot's House, (there was one Mr. Ben. Peters that attended him for his Guide.) The Hollifter and the Smith discovered by the fowlers, that they were come somewhere from the Northern parts by their manner of nailing, and presently railed a rumour of the Kings being thereabouts; and whilst the Smith went to advise with a Minifter of the matter, my Lord was got a way by providence, and the King came to Bridport, where as its since reported, he had like to have been known by an Hollifter, as he was setting up the Horfes, who welcom'd him as having formerly seen him at Exeter, but did not distinguish who he was, and the King with a professor of drinking with him when he was more at leisure, withdrew himself from any further discovery. That night they boarded the Brad-Windham again the King met with some disturbance by Souldiers then filling those places, in order to their shipping for Jersey. But after all these surprising adventures, he got again to Colonel Windham, with the Lord Wilmot, who had overtaken them, and passed by them at Bridport as was agreed, and thence (for it could not be safe to continue longer in that place) he was sent to Salisbury to look out for another Sanctuary, and to confer with that purpose with Major Courtenay, who agreed to bring him to Mrs. Holfes house at a Village called Heal. The King in his way to Salisbury came to a Town called Merse to the George, an acquaintance of the Colonels, where drinking in the Cellar, the Host seeing the King stand off as a servant, said, This looks like an honest fellow, Here's an Heath to the King; who unrelishly answering it, made the main explication with the Colonel what Fellow he had brought him. The King from Merse went to the House of Mrs. Holfes, and was joyfully there received, and introduced to a secret place in the House, and here Colonel Robert Phillips came to him, and Colonel Windham took his leave of his Majestie, and returned; and Dr. Hincks. after made Bishop of London, had the honour to be made acquainted with his condition; and Phillips was present.

London, and was met about Allen with the Spea-kker and the Members of Parliament, and the Lord Mayor of London and Recorder Steele, who in a recent Speech congratulated his great successes, and like a false Prophet, by a mistaken Prophesy applied them to word of the Psalmist, to bind their Kings in Chains; and those Nikes in Peters of iron, in an arrogant exaltation of his Achievement; next day the Common prisoners (being driven like a herd of Swine) were brought through Westminster into Tachil fields; (a sudden spectacle was never seen, except the miserable place of their defeat) and there sold to several Merchants, and sent to the Barbadoes; the Co-loours taken were likewise hanged up in Westminster-Hall, with those taken before at Preston and Danbar.

We have hitherto without any digression related the fortune of the King from the time of his quitting Scotland to his safe arrival in France; but shall now briefly describe the transactions that passed in the Scotch quarters. When he at last left the King constituted (as is hinted) General Cromwell Commander in Chief of the English Army there; which was an Action that carried great envy with it from those of his own party, because Monk had but lately engaged with them; and it was objected, that he had been heard to say, he would never draw a Sword in England against the King or his Interest, and therefore they could not expect faithful service from him in Scotland against the same party; but it is said, he gave such assurance to Cromwell of his fidelity in that station against that people, (who were the first raiders of those unhappy Terrors that overpread our Nation with the miseries of War and fedicion) that he would not be persuaded to alter his choice.

The English Army left with the General ex-cceeded not in trusty men, and many of these were of the Scotch long marches, but they had by several successful encounters gained the great reputation, and the Scots were much dispirited thereby, so that whilst the part of his forces was in good heart & his enemies dejected, he immediately marched to Sterling, and came thither
by that time Cromwell got into England.

Sterling was at that time governed by Colonel Cunningham, who was so surprized at the sudden approach of the English Army, (believing them to be of much greater numbers than they really were) that after a short siege he surrendered the Town and Castle upon Articles on the 14th of August; where the Kings Royal Robes, the cloth of State, and all the Scotch Records were found & seized, together with five hundred Arms and forty piece of Ordnance, and great store of Ammunition; but all the goods of the private persons there deposited, were delivered to such as would own his black and weak band of friends; over the door of the Chappel that belongs to the Church of Sterling, the King's name was written, J. C. R. Nobis hic inscri-vitula inmensa Cremn fax Pretii 1617, which shews that that place had remained unconquered during the Reigns of an hundred and five Kings, and so continued all his time and his Sons.

The next place to which the General marched after the taking of Sterling was Dunbar; to which Town the chief of the Inhabitants of Edinburgh and many other Towns and places had conveyed the bell part of their Moveables, as a secure depotitory, so that there was great riches in it.

Major Lumfclia was Governor of the Town, who had therein eight hundred Soldiers, besides some Companies of armed Habitants, whereby he thought himself in so good a condition, that when the General drew near the place, and sent a summons to him, he returned a very flattering answer, hereupon he environed the Town with his Army; but at his first coming thither, hearing that old General Lefty and several of the Lords of Scotland were met at Elliot (about fourteen miles from Dunbar) to raise Soldiers, he sent Colonel Alfred and Colonel Morgan with a thousand horse and Dragonets to disturb the Leives, leaving privately the chief conduct and care of the design to his confident Colonel Morgan, the other (though the elder Colonel) being not very competent for such a service. These, as soon as they had their Orders marched in the night and took possession of the Town, and by the help of some few Scotch Soldiers who had revolted to the English, they disembled their march, that the Country took them for their own forces going to Elliot, so that they were got undiscovered beyond the Town about three of the Clock in the morning, and then they marched into it with little or no resistance, and took 300 Noblemen, Gentlemen, and Ministers, with about 70 of their Servants, the chief of which were General Lefty (who was found hid in a close Cubbard-bed) the Earl's Majesty's Crawford Lindsay, and Keith, the Lords Ogilby, Burgony, Hume, & Lee with many other Knights, and Gentlemen of note: these were all flipt for London, but Lefty putting in at Newcastle was by the favour of Sir Arthur Hazlerig (then Governour thereof) permitted to fly in Northumland with one De la Poel his Son-in-law upon parole to be of true and faithful mind.

The General by this means had prevented all possibility of disturbance in his Siege, and seeing he could not by fair means prevail with the Governour to yield up the Town, though he knew by the purchase of Elliot all hope of relief failed, on the first of September he took it by storm, put-ing all to the Sword that were found in Arms.
The Governour with some few for a while faved themseves in a Steepel, but were smothered out by the burning of wet straw, and then they yealded on mercy to one Captain Kelly of Colonel Morgan's Regiment, who was carrying him to the General with purpose to intercede for his life, because of the gallantry of his behaviour in deference of the Town; but as he was going with him.
one Major Butier barbarously shot him dead. The Soldiers had very rich Boots in this Girition, for it was at this time the richest Town in Scotland, and there were fifty Store of Ships in the harbour of Dunbar, besides the taking of Dunbar. St.
Andrews, Aberdeen, with other Towns, Castles, and strong places either voluntary submitted or rendered upon Sammons.

These successe did not mitigate the severity of the Rulers at Westminster, who about the end of September appointed a Court-Marshall to sit at Chefters, for the Tryal of the Earl of Derby and Nunn several
The Earl upon his Tryal pleaded the Quarter given him by Captain Edge that took him prisoner, which was over-ruled by the Court, and he was sentenced to be beheaded, and on the 15th of October, that rigorous Sentence was executed on him at Bolton in Lancashire; and for the same cause of Loyalty to their Sovereign, and by the same Court, Sir Timothy Festrondenough, Capta nin Bowbow, and Captain Symkins were sentenced to death, and executed.

This sad occasion obliges us to a further account of those English Royalists who were taken in, and after the same Battel of Worcester, amongst whom were (besides others mentioned)
the Lord Grandison, Sir John Packington, Colonel Egene, Colonel Edward Broughton, and Major General Maffey; these were all except Maffey presently imprisoned in the Tower; but he being much wounded and tired with riding as he effortively to escape, delivered himself up to the Countefs of Stafford, who securred him in her house till he was cured of his wounds, upon his engagement to be a true Prisoner; and when he was recovered, he was also sent to the Tower, from whence by a difguise not long after he made his escape. Colonel Hogan was much fought after by the purfues, but he got safe to the High-lends in Scotland, being resolved to prosecute the Kings Quartel where Nature had fixt her Non Rura.

There remained nothing in England of the ancient Dominions and Territories thereof unlibdated to the Power of the Parliament, except the Isle of Man, and the Island of Jersey, and Cafilet Cornet in the Isle of Guernfey; which were all about this time surrendered to the Authority of the English Commonwealth, and not only these adjacent Islands, but what was in America appertaining to the Crown of England came quickly in to their Jurisdiction, as did the Island of Barbadoes (whereof the Lord Willoughby of Parham was Governor for the King) which was yielded up upon Articles to Sir George Asfough about the beginning of January, The Articles were very favourable both to the Government and Inhabitants, the first having liberty of returning to England,
with freedom to his perfon and estate, and the later being indemnified for what ever they had done inoffently against the Parliament. It is said, the gaining of this Island was much facilitated by one Colonel Muddifford then in difference with the Government, whom Sir George had drawn to his party, and by whose power and influence in the Island it was easily obtained. Hereupon the Islands of Mevis and St. Christopher thought it in vain to stand out, but both submitted to Sir George Asfough.

Towards the end of this year two eminent Commanders of the English Commonwealth were taken away by death, viz. General Edward Popham, one of the Generals at Sea; and Ireton, Son-in-law to Cromwell, and Deputy of Ireland, who died of a contagious feaver contracted at the Siege of the City of Limerick in Ireland; which after an obituate refillance he had newly gained. His Corps was transported to England, and brought to London, and interred in Henry the Sevenths Chappel in Westminster with a magni-cificent funeral pom and state. He was no doubt a man of much dispatch, of dextrons and able parts, had they been employed in a设计edignes; and was thought to have been a great contriver and prompter in the chiefest of his Father-ins Laws Thraatems. For a time after his decease, Lieutenant General Edward Lydon, executed his Office, till Colonel Charles Fletwood who had succeded him in his wifhe, was thereby preferred to succeed him in the DepatmtH of Irl-land.

The English Commonwealth having in some wise quieted things at home, and thinking themselves in a fair way to a calm of Peace and Tranquility, took upon them now to give Laws to their subjedted Dominions, as also to make Acts of Grace to encourage their Subjects quietly to submit to them: The first related to Scotland, which being in a short time totally brought under,
(for besides the gaining of Dunbarre Castle, which was delivered up by Sir Charles Eveskin, and Dunbarre Castle which was taken by Colonel M'Pigen, and the Isles of Orkney, the Hhbrides, and even Schetl Land, which is thought by some to be the fame that the Ancients called Alba Thule, could not escape their Conquest, which was the work of Colonel Overton) they take into con-ideration a project, which however it being attempted in former times, could be brought to no effect, they resolved to go through with; name-y, an Union of England and Scotland, and Incorporating of both Nations into one Commonwealth: This was mainly opposed and remonstrated against by the Scotch Kirk, though in vain;
for the Parliament of England (as they called themselves) had resolved upon an All for the Uninion of Scotland, and the Abolishing of Kingly Government in that Nation; intending that the Shires or Burghs should choice their Deputies to represent them in Parliament, in such a proportional number as the Parliament should think fit.
And Commissioners were sent from hence in behalf of the Commonwealth of England, to treat concerning this Union with the Natives, whom they found but very cold entertainers of their Proffer, besides the tough opposition of the Clergy. These Commissioners were Oliver St. John, Sir Henry Vane, Major General Deane, Major Sal-
may, Colonel Pentrich, and Alderman Lichborn:
And not long after were sent down as Irregular Judges to hear, determine, and make inspection into all things belonging to the Government of that Nation, Mr. George Smith, Mr. John March, Mr. Edward Maffey, and Mr. William Lockart, a Scotchman: But these Judges were several times altered at pleasure. But to the Commissi-mcnt of Scotland.

The next Act of Grace was to England, and was an Act of Oblivion, wherein they published it to be their intention to forget all injuries, and pardon all hostilities hitherto committed against them, upon condition of taking an engagement, which they imposed upon all people, wherein they were to promise To be true and faithful to the Commonwealth of England as soon established without King or House of Lords; out of which nevertheless they excepted the Lord Goring and his Sons, Sir John Wilmot of Amsterdam, the Executors of the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the llers of Dordans and Arnhem.

Scarce were these and some other little transactions finished at home, when there began to be in preparation new matters for the exercise of their Arms abroad, in respect of a secret design which had lain a pretty while mothering between them and their Brother States of Holland, which was probably in a great part occasioned through the flight and indifferent reckoning of Dordans, whose Affiliation they thought perhaps, not sufficiently invaded into; and afterwards of their Embassadors Oliver St. John, and Walter Strickland, who being affronted by the common people in Holland, thought themselves not sufficiently vindicated by the States, nor respected according to the Dignity of their Matters, and therefore came away in discontent; and though the States sent forth afterwards as their Agent, My Lord Jercham with several Complements and excuses, with Commission to treat about a fair Correspondence and Commerce with England; yet our States at Westминster were now resolved they should not have their friendship on such easy terms as before they offered by their Embassadors, since they then made no more account of it: so that they dismiss Jercham after a pretext time, beyond which he was not to stay, & then proceeded to make an Act, For the Encouragement of Navigation; wherein they prohibited the importation of any Foreign Commodities except upon English Bottoms, or such as were of the Country whence the Commodities came; beginning withal to stand high upon claims of Duties and Reparations for the prejudice done us in our Trading: upon which occasion was taken oftentimes to search the Dutch Ships, and sometimes to make prize of them. To complain of these damages, but more especially, if it were possible, to obtain a suppression of the said Act; so prejudicial to their Trade, they sent over into England their Embassadors, My Lord Heren Caza, Van de Peere, Sharp, and Newport; these men however commonly most zealous Advocates for a speedy Pacification, & relying much upon the favourable reception they should meet with here, were nevertheless at their very first Audience accosted with such high demands about the Herring-fishing, the business of Amberoy, and a free Trade in the Schelde, from Middelburgh to Antwerp, that they were able to give but a cold answer to their Matters in the Affair they came about: and though some Mediations for a while past to and fro for the Vindication of each others actions, (the Dutch all the while making great Protestations of their sincere and real intentions towards this Commonwealth) yet full preparations for War were privately made on both sides.

This year ended with an Act for the Banishment of John Lilburn, who being a performer of a milde, turbulent nature, had with retetlie inquisition pro- pounded all Government, in to much that it was said merry of him, and all the World were desperate to him alone John would be against Lilburn, and Lilburn against John. It was provided in this Act, that if ever he returned without leave from the State, he should suffer as a felon. That which caused this severity against him at this time was his violent opposition of Sir Arthur Hazelrig, a leading Member of the Parliament about a Coal- pit in his possession, claimed by one Primatt, wherein he did not only lay many oppreessions and scandals to the charge of Hazelrig, but in the publication thereof arrayed the Justice of the whole Commonwealth.

The States of Holland set out a very great Fleet for the security of their Trade for this year, and in their instructions to Martin Harper, therefor a great Terror, their Admiral, they directed him not to Fleet, unlike his Flag to the English Admiral, and the same Orders were given to every of the Ships of War, if occasionally they met any single Ships of England or others, that were not too numerous for their opposition.

The English on the other side they knew would not easily lose the Dominion of the Sea, which in all ages they exercised without control: so that Van Trump coming into Dover-Road on the 17th. of May with two and fourty Sail, lay there at Anchor, as to dare them to opposition; and notice thereof being given to Blake the English Admiral, he made haste to ply up towards him with about 12 Ships and Frigates, but when Trump deferred the English Fleet, he and his weighed Anchor, and stood away by a wind Easteaftward, intending (as Blake suspected) to leave them to avoid the dispute of the Flags: but about two hours after they altered their Course, and bore directly with the English Fleet, and Van Trump was headmost, whereupon the English lay by, and put themselves into a fighting Posture, judging the Dutch had a resolution to engage. Being come within Munquet-shot, Blake gave Order to fire at his Flag, which was done twice, and after the third shot, Trump let fly a broad-side, and it was well returned by the English Admiral; and after the exchange of Broad-sides Major Bourn came in to Blake's assistance with eight good Ships, and then both the Fleets engaged from four in the afternoon till it was dark, and though there were not less than two thousand Shot of Cannon exchanged on one side and the other, the lots of men was not great, and the greatest was of the Hollanders, of whom one Ship was sunk, and another taken, and shot an hundred and fifty men slain: the English had not any Ship disabled, and very few men killed. Van Trump drew his Fleet in the night to the back of Godwins Sands, and the next morning sailed away for Zealand.

The Holland Embassadors at London by their Memorials endeavoured all they could to per-1652.

The States apprehended this businels might cause a Rupture betwixt them and the English, and therefore they dispatched the Heer-Paa to England in the Quality of an Embassador Extraordinary, who was so very well received at his arrival at London, that he believed he should not only extinguishe the flame already kindled, but perfect that Negotiation formerly treated on by the other Embassadors. But in this he was much deceived, for when he and the other Embassadors had joyntly presented a paper to the Parliament to excite the late entrance of Trump, they returned an answer that did not at all content them for they peremptorily required, To be paid and satisfied for all the Charges and damages they had been put to and sustained by the preparations of the States General, and other attempts this Summer, before they would treat on any other Proposition. The States of the United Provinces being advertised of this proceeding immediately recalled their Embassadors, and, thereupon the War was vigorously prosecuted on both parts; and in a very little time Van Trump was again at Sea with an hundred and twenty four men of War; but he got not out soon enough to prevent General Blake's falling Northward with seventy Sail of Ships of War to interrupt the Dutch Fishing-Trade, and took five Dutch East-India Ships which were about that time expected to return home that way.

In the meantime about the 6th. of June Sir George Asse was arrived in the Downs with the Barbadoes fleet, consisting of 15 Men of Wars, having taken in his way ten Dutch Merchant-ships and four men of War, one whereof was a Ship of Advice, to give notice to their Merchant-ships of the present differences.

The Parliament upon his arrival sent Orders to him to stay there till a fleet then providing in the Thames should be made ready to join with him. Trump having intelligence thereof, about the beginning of July clapt in with part of his Fleet between Sir George and the River, and sent the other part Westward to prevent his going that way, relieving either to forposite those coming out of the Thames, or to sink and disable those with Sir George Asse: but the Governor of Dover gave speedy advice of the posture of the Enemy, that the Navy in the River moved not, and then Trump on the eighth of July made towards Sir George to assist that fleet, but the wind failing, they came to an Anchors League off, and before the next ebb, the Militia of that Country was ready upon the Coast, and Sir George his ships well reinforced with men, and a Platform was call'd up betwixt the Castles of Deal and Sandwich, whereon good store of Cannon were planted to receive them, but at the next ebb whilst they were under sail the wind came about South-West, and blew so directly in their teeth, that they could not possibly make in to them.

Trump upon this disappointment, returned to Holland, to convey several Merchant-men for the Northern and Eastern Trade, that lay ready for him; with which he failed towards the Sound, and in his way he received advice, that Blake had spoiled and dispersed their Herring-Fishing, and taken twelve Men of War that guarded them, and was with his fleet in Harbour about the Isles of Orkney, wherefore he sent part of his Ships to guard the Merchant-men on their Voyage, and with the rest he failed to find out Blake, having met in his way the five East-India Ships, but when he came near those Northern Islands, such a storm arose, that he was forced to put to Sea, and his fleet was so scattered, that he came home but with two and forty sail, and three of the East-India ships, but shortly the other two East-India ships, and the rest of the fleet came home in safety, and Blake came safe to Texamouth with all his fleet and fix of Trump Frigots, which he had met with and nine hundred Prisoners.

In this time Sir George Aste had got a fleet together of about forty sail, with which he failed to Plymouth to secure our Merchant-ships homeward bound, where there safely arrived five ships from the East-India's, and two from the Straights. Whilst Sir George lay there, De Ruyter was passing that way with a fleet of fifty men of War to convey about the like number of Merchant-ships that way: about two in the afternoon of the 16th. of August the English fleet got sight of the Enemy, and De Ruyter sent away his Merchant ships, and made ready for the fight, and about four Sir George with nine of his headmost ships charged through the Dutch fleet, and got the weather-gage of them, and charged them again, but the rest of his and all the rest being Merchant-men, and not coming up, and the night being already entered, both fleets drew off from each other, the Dutch into one of the French Ports, and Sir George to Plymouth to mend and repair the damages of the fleet; Captain Duck his Rear Admiral left his Leg and soon after died, and several other Captains were wounded, but not one ship lost; what loss of men the Dutch sustained was not known, but none of their ships were disabled.

Van Trump was at this time very much discontented upon some rumors spread of his failure of conduct in the last expedition, so that he defied the States that he might leave his charge and retire; the States seemed very unwilling to comply with his request, but at last they consented to it, and the Plassen was appointed in his place, to whom De Ruyter was joined in Commission. These two Commanders made what speed they could to get their fleet to Sea, and in October they made their flatons on the side of the North Foreland; Blake as soon as he had notice thereof hifhened with his fleet towards them, having been on the Wester Coast to Convey some Merchant ships homeward, and taken in his way five Dutch East-India ships of great value, and fix Streights men, valued at two hundred thousand pounds.
He divided his fleet into three Squadrons, one commanded by himself, the other by the Vice-Admiral, and the third by Rear-Admiral Bourn, and the 28th of October the fight was begun by Bourn, and (continued immediately) by the whole fleet, wherein great courage was shown on both sides, the Rear-Admiral of the Dutch was boarded and taken, and two more of their ships were sunk, and one blown up, so that Vice-Admiral was glad to give over the contest, and to ply his Sails to get off, being pursued by the English fleet within twelve Leagues East South-East of the Downs, and he with the remainder of his ton and much shattered ships came into Gote. The English preferred all their ships, though many of them were much battered, and Blake came in triumph into the Downs.

The Dutch were much troubled at the loss of this Combat, which was by Witenus intended to the cowardice of some of his Commanders, and the disadvantage of the English Ships over them in number and strength.

But nevertheless the States thought it not convenient to hazard another Combat till they had a more sufficient fleet than before, both in the goodneß and strength of their ships and the number also.

Both they and the English in the first beginning of the War had sent to the Swedes and Danes to invite them to their party, because the materials for shipping came from the Seas where these Princes had the chief Dominions; and the Swedes were very favourable to us, and at least would be Neuters, if not partakers with us, and the Queen sent hither Monsieur Spiering her Embassador who died shortly after his arrival at London, and after his death Monsieur Apple-boum succeeded: but the Danes declared for the States of the United Provinces against us; and about this time their King sent a Message to them that he was ready to succour them with twenty good ships of War; provided they would re-establish Trump in his late employment as Admiral; The States were very willing to comply with this proposition and Trump was again prevailed with to re-affix his former charge.

In the Levant Captain Badly with four or five English Frigots was set upon by Van Gales, who commanded a Fleet of fifteen Sails of Dutchmen of War in those Seas, in which encounter the Phoenix was taken by the Dutch, and the rest of our Ships were forc'd to retire under the protection of the Port of Longjus but Van Gales bought this Victory with the loss of his life, and the Phoenix was on the 20th of November regained by the valor of Captain Cox, a former Lieutenant to the same Ship.

Van Trump being restored to the office of Admiral was very indispensible to give a proof of his courage in some valiant enterprise; and to that purpose having got together eighty men of War, and ten Fire-ships, he sailed directly to the backside of the Goodwin near the place where the former Battle was fought; Blake was in the Demo with few more than forty Sails, but was nevertheless resolved not to refuse an engagement, and for that purpose he huyed his fleet to find out Trump, and sent out seven Ships to discover his Fleet, which were met with nine of the Dutch Ships sent out on the same errand. These began the Fight with their Cannon, and immediately the two Generals advanced at the head of their Squadrons, and the Fight was very furious, and lasted from two in the morning on the 29th of November, till fix in the evening. The Dutch, wherein Blake himself was with the Victcry, and Vanguard bore most of the fire, being engaged at one time with twenty of the best Dutch Ships, and though it was long doubted on which side the fortune of the day would turn, yet at last the numbers of the Dutch drew it to that side with the loss of the Garland and Bonaventure which were taken, and of one that was burnt, and three sunk; and indeed if the night had not been favourable to our retreat, the whole Fleet might have been in much danger. But the Dutch could not much boast of this Victory, for they lost many men, and one of their Flag-ships was blown up, and all the Mariners and Soldiers therein lost, except two; and the Ships of Van Trump and de Reyter were much damaged.

Blake after this defeat drew his shattered Fleet into the River of Thames to be repaired, and it is said, Trump triumphantly sail'd though the Channel with a Broom on his main Topmast, preparing to renew the Channel of all English ships, and having sent home all his disabled Ships, after some little stay about Guernsey and the Western parts, he arrived at the Isle of Ely to lay there for a Fleet of Merchants Ships which were to be convey'd homewards. In the mean time all possible care was used by the English States to equippe a Fleet to meet him as he return'd, and General Monk was added to the number of the Generals at Sea, and General Deane being newly arrived from Scotland, was ordered to go to Sea with Blake and Monk; so that under the joint command and conduct of these three Generals, the War at Sea was to be managed.

The expence of this War made this Parliament contrive all ways they could to husband their treasure, and because they thought the entertainment of the Duke of Gineyler (whom since the murder of the late King they had kept at the Isle of Wight) too great an expence, they resolved to tend him abroad, and about the beginning of February they sent him with two Ser- vants to Dunkirk, promising to allow him a small exhibition for his maintenance, if he would not come near his Brother, nor any of his relations.

But as soon as he came on that side of the wa- ter, he was received according to his Birth and Quality, and from Brussels he was attended to the Princes of Avranches at Brede, where he safely ar- rived to the great joy of her, and all the Royal Family, who had been in continual fear, that his life would be taken away by those that spared not the life of his Royal Father.

After he had been a while at Brede, he was from where he was conducted to Paris to the King his Brother, to whom as the son of the King his Mother,
The English Fleet made what sail they could towards the Enemy, and * vain Trump* having recollected his ships of War prepared to receive them, and about eight in the morning, the Triumph wherein Black and Dean were, with twelve ships more (for the rest of the fleet could not get up) engaged board and board with the guns of the Dutch fleet, and the Trump was hardly put to it, having received seven hundred Canon-non-flot in her hull, but was gallantly relieved by the Leifon Commander of the Fairfax.

The Ship wherein General Mofk commanded being a good fayler, could not perform too much as he defired, but lost many men, and had as great a fhare in the fight as any of her condition. The Trump and Fairfax being enclosed by the greateft of the Holland ships, had in each an hundred killed and wounded, and Black received a hurt in his thigh, with a piece of iron which a shot had driven out, and Captain thereof was flain, together with Sparres the Secretary; the Professor, a ship of fenty and forty Guns, was boarded by the Dutch, but recovered by the Merlia Frigt, Captain Midland of the Vanguard was flain. The English loft not a ship in this fight, but had many disabled; but fome of Men of War of the Dutch were taken and funk, whereof one was a Flagg-ship, and it is faid, that moft of the Officers in Trump ship were killed or wounded, and many of the Mariners. Such of the English fleet as were disabled got into Porfgmouth, and the wounded men were fent on Shore, and on Saturday morning the Dutch fleet was again difcovered seven Leagues off Weymouth, and over again Doughtnelf whither the English pled; and in the afternoon both fleets engaged with too much fury that they were quickly environed with flame & smoke. Trump had put his Merchant men before him, and after the first fhook, he did atrand fought retreating towards Bulboug, and in his way thither the English Frigots at large took many of his Merchant ships, and Leifon boarded a Dutch man of War and brought her off; the next day, early in the morning the fight was renewed, which continued very fierce till four in the afternoon; but the wind being crofs to the English at North North-East, Trump got to Calice Sands, and there anchored, and thence tided it home.

The Dutch lost in these three days fight eleven Men of War, and thirty Merchants fhips, and by the calculation of their own Prisoners, they had not lefs than fifteen hundred men killed; but of the English though many fhips were shattered, there was but one funk named the Samson, but Captain Button the Commander thereof (though much wounded) and moft of the men were faved. The number of the English flain is not reported, but by the brief conjecture that could be made, they were not much lefs than thofe of their enemies.
This Year died the Lady Eleanor Davys, whose Prediction concerning the late Duke of Bucking-ham's death, was thought remarkable enough to be commemorated by several Writers of the History of those times, amongst the Prelates that threatened the untimely end of that Great Man: And this coming from a Person of her Quality, was so much the more a subject of critical discourse and cenure among the Witts of those times; and whence perhaps, some late Observers have taken aim; but since common Fame in these cafes is ever apt to take things un-ontrut, and for want of due examination, to fix reproach as soon upon the belt as the world, it may much conduce to the rectifying of mis-informed judgments, & the vindicating of the memory of so Vertuous a Lady from the injurious reflections of unruly Writers, to give this faithful account of her; She was the 5th Daughter of Lord George Audley Earl of Devonshire, and was married to Sir John Davys, the King's first Serjeant at Law in England, and sometime Attorney General in Ireland (whole Worth his own Learned Writings, and the known Credit he had with his Prince, sufficiently speak) by whom she was the Mother of one only Daughter, Lucy, married to Ferdinando late Earl of Huntingdon, (by her) Grandmother to the present Earl; as for her Character, there needs little more to be said (for nothing can be more advantageously) than to repeat what hath been delivered of her by the Elegant Pen of the Learned Doctor Peter Du Moulin; She was, faith he, Erudita supra fexum, Mitis infra Sorren; Learned above her Sex, Humble below her Fortunes, having as a Mind so Great and Noble, that Prosperity could not make it remiss, nor her deep adversity cause to shrink, or discover the least palliament or de-fcription of Spirit; for being full of the love of God, to that fullest, the limiting World could not add, nor the pronouncing from it deterre. Hence, as from a living Spring, flowed a full stream of Christian Graces, redounding to the benefit of many as well as to her own Comfort. She had a fineness of Wit, but so temper'd with Prudence & Conflagitation, that the early addicted her self to serious speculation, and the study of Divine Truths: Wherefore, since our Savour bids us examine (especially in these cafes) the tree by the fruit, we recommend it to the consideration of the judicious, whether a Person so qualified and so addicted, might not with most equity be judged on this occasion, to have been favoured with some beam of divine knowledge of future things. Certain it is, that not only in the above-mentioned, but in divers other Events both of private and publick Concernments, her Predictions proved undoubtedly true. In the most flourishing condition of the Nation, she foretold its unparal-lel'd troubles, and in the depth of those troubles, the foretold that happy Restoration to Peace and Settlement which we at this day (through the Mercy of God) enjoy under our Most Gracious Sovereign, and in every one the long before prefix'd the time of their accomplish-ment.

This boscic year ended with the safe arrival of Prince Rupert with the Swallow, and a prize laden with Tobacco, and a little Frigate at Nanise in Britanny, from the Caribbe Islands. He had been sometime in those Seas with seven or eight ships and his Brother Prince Maurice with him, endeavouring to give what annoyance he could to the Enemies of the Crown of England in those parts, till some serviceable occasion might render him more favourable elsewhere; but the said Frigate of adverse Fortune, which yet eclips'd the Royal Throne of England did even in those distant parts purifie this Illustrious pair of Princes, and by the violence of a Hurricane, the life of one of them (the Valiant Prince Maurice) was taken away, a person who in our unhappy Civil Wars gave eminent proof of so much courage and ge-nerously as any one man, could be master of, than whom death has left few worthier behinde, to dig-nifie the World with actions of Glory and Renown. Prince Rupert at his first arrival fell sick, but upon his recovery he was invited to Paris and complimented by the King of France, and cordially welcom'd by the King our Sovereign, where now almost the whole Royal Family were met to-gether.

It is commonly observed, that it is easier much to obtain a Conquest then secure it; and in nothing was this more visible than in the present posture of Affairs in England, where the new Commonwealth now advanced to as great pro-perty and security as their ambitious hopes could aim at, having together with the death of the late King, as much as in them lay even buried and eradicated Monarchy by itself, began to sink under its own weight, and by intestine divisions at home, to meet that ruin, which all the strength and power of her enemies abroad and their Confederates could not reach to.

The Officers of the Army who effected this change, had met in Council some months before in meditation of altering the Government, and these being of two parties and of different interests, it was scarce believed they could agree in the design. Harrison who was one of the heads of that party at this time known by the name of the Sect of the Fifth Monarchy, had gained a great part of the Interior Officers, and those were so much intoxicated with that Notion, that they never could approve of any Government, but where (as they said) Christ was to Rule, which as they explained (was a Domination to be exercised by Saints under him, men of such holy and sanctified lives, that nothing but plenty and happiness could be expected from their Go vernment, and to such, all Officers of Truth and Power, Military and Civil were to be committed, and of this sort they resolved to chuse by nomination a new Representative. Cromwe mingled with these zealots in this projection, knowing the inconfistency of their intentions, and that the reins of Power would be by them managed (as the Poets feigned Phoenix conduct of the Chariot of the Sun) to fet the World in a flame, and introduce such confusion as would nece-sitate his taking to himself the Government to rescue his party from destruction.

The
The Parliament were very sensible of these actions, but knew not how to prevent their progress, yet that they might not be wanting to their own security, they had many conferences with these Officers, wherein they represented to them the inconveniences of their proceedings, telling them as the temper of the Nation now stood, no safety could be administered to the Government, but by filling up the House with Elections by the Coun-trees, of persons qualified, and when they were by that method arrived to a full Representative of the Nation, their Acts would be received with greater Authority, and by the concurrent advice of so great a Body of interested persons, their cause would be strengthened, and the good they would do in reforming the Law and all disorder, and administering Ju-sice impartially, and setting a due liberty to the people in Civil and Spiritual things, would make the Government in a few years so acceptable, that there would be no need of an Army to support it.

To this answer was made by the Officers, That they could not extend any good fruits to the people of God from this Parliament, wherein there was so great a party of Carnal men of corrupt Principles, that the persons by their Ambition to be chosen would be of the like temper and spirit as they are, and join with them in perpetuating themselves in the Supreme Government; concluding, That the people of the Land, who were distinguisable from the people of God were not yet to be drafted with the choice of their own Representatives; But they ( they said) would take care to devote the Supreme Authority upon known persons, fearing God, and of approved integrity. This reasoning on both sides tended to make the breach wider, but the Parliament in the mean time went on according to their own purpose, and prepared an Act for the setting of Qualifications of Members to fill up their House, wherein such speed was made, that on the 20th of April the Question was ready to be put to pass it into a Law, when Cromwell, Lambert, Harrison, and some eight Officers more of the Army, by intelligence with some of the Members, entred the House, and after a short Speech spoken by Cromwell, shewing some reasons for the necessity of their dissolution, he declared them dissolved, and required them to depart, but the Speaker would not leave the Chair, till by Harrison taken out the Arm, and Cromwell commanded the Mace to be taken away, and not any more to be carried before him, and then they called the Doors of the Parliament House to be locked, and placed a good Guard thereon to prevent the assembling of the Members.

This Revolution could not but be very pleasing to the King, for now the Stone was rolling, in all probability it would stand firm; nor could it ever appear that that Government should be attained under which this Kingdom had enjoyed as much happiness for many Centuries of years as any Nation in the world.

The first thing done by these Officers after this change, was to constitute a Council of State constituting of the Chief Officers of the Army, and such of the late Parliament as were their Conderates, in whom the Supreme Authority was placed, and till a Representative should be chosen, all obedience was required thereunto as fully as when the Parliament was sitting, and all Judges, Sheriffs, Justices of Peace, Mayors, Bailiffs, and other Civil Officers and publick Ministers whatever so in the requisite Offices and places, and Laws were to run in the style of the Keepers of the Liberty of England as before.

The Dutch thought to profit themselves of this alteration, and made all possible haste to get out their fleet, but our new Governors omitted noting that might advance their Maritime preparations; and the first thing they did after their etablishment, was to make an Ordinance for the raising of six months Affirmation from the 24th of June ensuing, which was readily obeyed, because it exacted not so great a sum, as the last Acts of Parliament for Affirmations.

Whilst these things were in action, all Officers and Soldiers in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and all the Officers in the Fleet were pretended to approve of the Armies proceedings, and did comply therewith, to that no Controversion followed in any part upon this mutation of Government.

The next considerable matter that occurred was a Naval Combat betwixt the Dutch fleet under Trump affighted with De Ruyter, with the two Eversons consisting of 104, Men of War and 12 Galliots and 9 Fire-ships, and the English Fleet under the Command of General Monck and General Dean (who were both in one Ship) affighted by Pen the Vice-Admiral, and

Lawson Rear-Admiral, consisting of an hundred ships of all sorts. It was about eleven of the clock at noon on the second of June that both the fleets engaged, and to fatal was the beginning of the fight, at the first Broad-side of the Enemy, Dean was almost in the middle by a Cannon-Bullet, as he stood by General Monck, but he,
without any disturbance was so prompt to himself,
that he caused him to be removed, and prosecuted the Battle with great resolution, without any further notice of the accident. The noise and thunder of the Cannon was very great, & had been very deplorable to both parties, if a sudden calm had not abated the fury of the fight for some time after it began; but after two hours such a fresh

Gale of wind rote, that the fight was renewed in the most violent manner, that it continued with very little intermission whilst there was any light;

Lawson press'd to hard upon De Ruyter with his Squadron that he had carried him if Trump had not come in to his relief, but he could not prevent Lawson sinking a ship of Hmsble of two and forty Guns that had in her a hundred and forty men;
the General with his Squadron was in the thic-keff of them, and greater execution had been done but that the wind blew fresh to the English, and so favoured their enemies, that they bore away before it. The next morning early General Monck found himself near them, but the wind was to flock, he could not come up till noon to engage their fleet, but then the Combat was begun with greater vigour than at any time before, and continued till ten at night; ninety of Trumps fleet in the heat of the engagement were so great confusion, and so unwilling to stand to the fight, that he fired upon them, and sent his boat to Command them to come up to him, but nothing he could
could do or say, could persuade more than twenty of them to return, the rest fled clear away East and by South, but the wind being fresh Westwardly, the General pres'd to hard upon them, that he fink fix of their best Ships, and two were blown up amongst their own Fleet, and eleven Ships and two Hoyes were taken, and thirteen hundred and fifty Prisoners, whereof fix were Captains of very good note, and of the Ships one was a Vice-Admiral, and two were Rear-Admirals.

At the end of this dailies Fight, General Blake came in with eighteen fresh Ships, and if the Dutch had not been upon the Flats of Dunkirk and Caier, where their great Ships could not get up to them, most of their Fleet had been ru'd or taken. The English had not one Ship left of disabled, and except General Dean, but one Captain lain.

Van Trump imputed this overthrow to the ignorance and unskillfulness of his Captains, but his Masters were so humbled by it, that a resolution for Peace was immediately taken up, and a Vessel with a white Flag, and a Messenger to prepare a way for two Embassadors, was sent into England.

The Council of Officers had now agreed upon the several persons all over England (who were the most distinguished creatures they could nominate) to form a representative, and a summons was sent to every one of them in the name of Oliver Cromwell Captain General of all the Forces, to the meeting which they were summoned, and to meet at White-Hall to that purpose on the 5th of July then next coming.

These according to the respective summons assembled at the time appointed, and went to Westminster to the Parliament House; and chose one Rowe a Cornish man (made by the late Parliament Provost of Exon) to be their Speaker, and appointed several Committees in the manner as other Parliaments used to do, to make their business easy to them.

The Dutch in this juncture had under hand made Overtures of a Peace to Cromwell, which were not ill received, but that they might make it on better terms, they were resolved once more to try their fortunes at Sea, to regain their lost reputation; and in order thereunto, they prepared a Fleet to the number of 135 Sail, with so much confidence of success, that they posted Van Trump out with 95 Ships before the rest were ready, which were to be brought to him by Witt Wittens from the Texel.

It was upon the 29th of July in the morning when the English Fleet of about 160 Ships de- ferred the Dutch, they had time to draw together, and divided their Fleet into 4 Squadrons, viz. the first under Trump, the second under Vice-Admiral Everson, and the third under Rear-Admiral Floris, and the fourth under Wittens for a refuge.

The English Fleet was commanded by General Monk in Chief, having Pen for his Vice-Admiral, and Lenfon Rear-Admiral; Blake was discompos'd in his health, and not with the Fleet, the English were all a stern, and could not get up till fix of the clock to come to any engagement, and then it was begun with a few of the nimblest Frigots, which were afterwards re-in- for'd to the number of thirty, who continued the Battle till the night parted them, though the rest of the Fleet could not get up to join with them.

The Dutch by the darkness of the night sent away many of their main'd disabled Ships, and got by the English Fleet to join with their 25 Ships that written brought to them, which much encouraged the rest to renew the Fight, in hopes to be reveng'd of their late affront; and now both Fleets met in the most fierce and cruel Fight that ever was fought, (General Monk observing this War to be very burdensome to the Nation, thought the best way of ending it to be in the sharpest of it, and therefore gave orders to all his Captains, neither to give nor take Quarter; for he had found by experience, that the taking of Ships Oblig'd him always to send other Ships off with them, and so the Fleet became weakened,) The Air was quickly fill'd with streak'd Limbs of men blown up; The Sea was died with the Blood that flowed from the Veins of the slain and wounded; Wit Wittens and Everson did behir themselves, and often attempt'd to board the Ship in which the General himself was; Cornelius Everson Ship was funk, and he taken, and the famous Van Trump himself standing upon the Poop of his Ship with his drawn sword encourageing his men, was slain with a Mufquet-bullet, whereby the rest of the Fleet was discouraged, that they hoyed out all the Sail they could to haste away towards the Texel: The English pur- sued little, (having bought the Victory at a dear rate) but tack'd about to Nether-Say, there to re- pair the shattered Ships, and dispofe of their Prisoners, whereof five were Captains, viz. Ever- son, Zanger, Cossier, Sceten and D'Hayet, and about 1300 common men, by the mercy and commifion of the English taken out of Boats, and swimming in the Sea; 33 sail of Ships, out of which they were sav'd, were funk to the bottom of the Ocean, and in regard that these Prisoners were belonging to so many lost Ships, by this means the number of them was known; but it is suppos'd some were sunk, out of which no men were sav'd. The English lost 400 common men, and eight Captains, Gravenor, Peacock, Harrington, Crisfe, Newman, Cox, Owen, and Chapman men, of great resolution; and had about 700 wounded, whereof five were Commanders, but they left but one Ship, which was called the Oake. Van Trump was a man of so great Courage and Experience in Maritime affairs, that he justly merited the fame of being the most Renowned Sea-Captain of this Age, and perhaps there were few better at any time before. He was a Perfon of much Ver- tue, Honour and Fidelity, and a great lover of his Country, which made him bear a grateful re- spect to the House of Orange, by whom the foun- dation was laid of that (High and Mighty) great- ness they now aflume and enjoy; and by whole
The War was not only prosecuted in those great fights, but in all parts of the world where the trade of the two Nations was suffered, the ships of each engaged one the other, and many more conflicts were made in several places, but because the particular description of these encounters would swell this Treatise to too large a bulk, we do omit the doing thereof.

This new Parliament (for, so for distinction we must call it) began to be so troublesome in their consultations, that the whole Nation, and the moit of those Army Officers that named them, grew wearis of them than those that were before removed; for they were so Seraphical and Notional in their debates, that the whole Magistracy and Ministry was to be so modelled, as would make the Government ridiculous; but the Ministry and the maintenance thereof by Tythes was that they most arraigned as an Antichristian Conftitution; so that now all things succeeded to Crowsets expectation, and their dissolution was earnestly prefixed to have a threatened conflagration in Government, if they continued in Authority; and of this some amongst themselves were so sensible, that Row the Speaker on the 12th of December acquainted the House, that their sitting was no longer necessary, and being seconded by some others privy to the intention, he rose from the Chair, and went out of the House with the Mace before him, and with as many as would follow him (being the Major part of the Members) he came to Whitehall, and there resigned to Crowsel the Infirmity by him formerly delivered to them at their first sitting, Harrison and some few laid in the House after the went, but were quickly dispersed by a party of Souldiers sent to dissolve them.

About four days after, the Officers of the Army had prepared an Instrument or Syllable of Government, on which the foundation of a new Dominion was to be erected, and they entered Oliver Cromwell to accept of the Government under the Title of Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland: He at first seemingely refused the Dignity; but when the exigence of time and necessity of Affairs were laid open to him, he did accept of it; and was that day at one in the afternoon installed at Westminster in manner following:

He came from White-Hall to the Canopie Court in Westminster-Hall attended by the Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal, the Barons of the Exchequer and Judges in their Robes, and after them the Council leamed of the Commonwealth, and the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Re-
The first Act of these Councils after their establishment was a Proclamation notifying the Government with a direction therein, That all Judges, Sheriffs, Justices of the Peace, Mayors, Burgesses, and all other publick Officers, and Ministers who ever were within this Commonwealth or any part thereof, do proceed in their respective places and offices until further Order to the contrary.

The States of the United Provinces were brought into follow condition by the two last fights, and their people so much dispirited, that a general Revolt was feared in the Provinces, nevertheless they put as good a Countenance as they could on their condition, and chose the Heer Opdam to be Admiral of their Fleet in the place of Trump, but thought it more advisable to provide overtures of peace than venture another Battel; and certainly if the War had been continued, their Mariners were to baffle, they would very hardly have procured men to furnish a fleet, and one Battel more might have brought us a Blank paper for our own conditions; but Cromwell was not so well fitted in his Thrice to hazard any thing, and therefore the Dutch Embassadors, Newport, Poncelet, and Bremering, and Van der Pears were well received by him; and in the beginning of this year they were so diligent in their Negotiation, that on the 5th of April the Articles of Peace were signed in London, and on the 16th of the same month they were proclaimed in London and Amsterdam, and in this Peace the King of Denmark was included.

For the King of Denmark espousing the interest of the States of Holland, he had arrested two and twenty English Ships which were in his Ports, and at their insistence confiscated the Merchandizes therein; so that they were obliged to complicate that difference, and this was that which had more difficulty than any other matter in the Treaty.

The Articles of Peace we think not very essential to our History to be inserted at large, but the two which were of most importance, were these (viz.)

The Men of War and other Ships of Holland meeting the English ships in the Narrow Seas shall lower their sails to them.

The States shall cause restitution to be made by the King of Denmark of all the ships and goods of the English by him seized which are not disposed of, and a full compensation in value for such of them as had been sold, to be ascertain'd in a time prefixed by the English Merchants, and the Dutch who should meet for that purpose.

And the Spanish Embassador was as early as any to congratulate the Proctors Authority; and peace was made with the Queen of Sweden, and the Conde del Sa, Lord Chamberlain of the Kingdom of Portugal came in a splendid embassage to live for a Peace of him; nor were the French backward to own his power, having given to Monsieur Bourdeaux their Refidant here the Quality of Embassador to qualify him the better for his Negotiation, and added to him the Baron of Bassa for a Colleague, Cromwell being now owned by 1654, many of the Neighbour Princes and States a-broad, and by most of those of his own party at home, thought himself secure from none but the Prince of Cred Royalitics, and to give them some terror, he had his agents hanged at Amsterdam to draw in some false credulous persons of that party to their destruction; and in prosecution hereof in the month of May Colonel John Gerard, and his Brother Master Charles Gerard, Mr. Philip Porter, Mr. Peter Foezi, and Mr. Summerst Fox were apprehended for a pretended intention to assassinate the Protecor, and brought before a High Court of Justice erected for that purpose, proclaimed on the 13th of June following, and fitting on the 31st before whom they were tried for their lives, and three of them (viz.) Colonels John Gerard, Mr. Foezi, and Summerst Fox were condemned. The last of these was reprieved and pardoned upon his confession of the fact and craving mercy, but the other two were executed. Mr. Foezi was hanged at Charing Cross, where with an undaunted spirit tempered with a Christian constancy and patience he gave up his life. Colonel Gerard was beheaded on Tower-hill, and died with great courage and Magnanimity. With him upon the same Scaffold followed the Portuguese Embassadors Brother Don Antionio who had a while before made a riot in the new Exchange upon concert of some afront offered to him, and killed one Greenside a Gentleman standing quietly at a shop, no opposition being made but by this Colonel Gerard, who was vastly joy'd with him in death. The Murder was committed by a Knight of Malta, who escaped, but this Gentleman and four more of the Embassadors Servants being taken (one whereof was an Irish youth.) They were arraigned in Westminster-Hall before Judge Rolfe, and others by special Commission of Oyer and Terminer thereunto appointed; and the Portuguese were tried by a Jury of half English and half strangers, and the Irish Boy by a Jury of English; they were all found guilty, but none suffered but the above mentioned Don Antionio and the Irish youth, who both were hanged at Newgate.

Our King had remained in the Court of France between two and three years, with an expensiveness sometimes flowing, and sometimes ebbing, of gaining at length some opportunity to recover his Kingdoms; some hopes he had of assistance from several other Princes of the Empire, as the Duke of Brandenburg, Luneburg, Braunschvicg, &c., as also the Emperor himself, to whom was sent in a decent and Honourable equipage the Lord Viscount Creald Earl of Rochester, and his Advocate received with much civility and respect. Moreover, the Dutch seemed very inclinable to the owning and adopting his Interest in their War with England, and Prince Rupert was design'd to have had the Command in his Majesties Name, of a Squadron of their Ships; yet little speed was made in putting this Overture into act; and so suddenly was the Peace made up between this Nation and France which they hoped for and expected from them, very vainly and came to nothing: His next and more probable expension was from the Success of those earnest endeavours that were made by the Pope and...

King CHARLES the Second.

The King follows a Peace between France and Spain.

He departs out of France for Germany.

The King removeth to the Spaw. Thence to Colen.

From the time we left Ireland in so declining a condition, and so almost lost to his Majesties hopes, and the Lord Lieutenant endeavours, the most considerable Force that was left, was in Ulster, under the leading of Emer Mac Mahon Bishop of Cloghony, who (Own’d not Oneal being dead) succeeded him as General in those Parts, besides the united forces of Clanrickard, Muckenny, and Castlehaven, and some few parties that now and then fallied from their Palatines, these for a while gave check to the Republicans and Cromwell’s Tabellies; till in the end the said Pre-late being overthrown (even to the taking of his person mortal wounded in the right) by Colonel Cog and Colonel Fenwick, the Lord Mulraverty by the Lord Broghil, the Marquis of Clanrickard, soon after a defeat he received at Finaghy, forced to lay down his Arms in the Isle of Caricott; the remnant of the Ulster forces Commanded by the Lord Jenkitten, Colonel O’Reilly, and the Mac-Mahon, Relations of the great B. Bay, yielding upon Articles, as likewise did Marlborough Britain, having all of them float it out to the last extremity: the remaining Towns, Castles, and Forts which held out, as Athlone, Galway, Ballinasheen, Baltimore, the Isles of Arran and Enniskillen, and other places, were all constrained to surrender themselves to the Conquering power; the Marquises of Ormond, and the Lord Inchiquin, having in time provided for their safety, (when they saw things in a desperate condition, and still growing worse and worse) by engaging for France, nothing was left but to despair, and extirpate the vanquished, and take possession in their room: Some they removed out of the world by an Itinerant High-Court of Justice, which went in Circuit from one place to another, the President whereof was one Justice Dunfahan an Irishman; and Cook (notorious by his officiating in another High-Court) his assistant: Others were sent out of the Landby the Articles of Transportation, which the Marquises of Clanrickard and others upon their laying down arms at the said Court, were called by that name, to serve the King of Spain; or some Force in his Wars: those Inhabitants that remained and escaped the High-Court, were transplanted to the Province of Connought, so that there was a large extent of Territory left for the Adventurers and Purchasers of Irish Lands: the main pretence of this foresaid Court which sat at Kilconn, and thence removed to Kinsford, Dalhvin, Riffer, and other places, was for the Trial of those that judged guilty of the Irish Rebellion in 1641. The chief of Quality that suffered, (for there were a number of Leet’s note) were Colonel Mac Hugh, Colonel Tol, and Colonel Walter Bagnal, and who of all the most eminent as in Quality so in Crime (had he been judged by a Lawful Authority) as having been one of the principal leading Men in that Insurrection, and likewise one of the chief Upholders of the Union, endeavoured by the Lord Lieutenant to the advantage of the Majesties Service, Sir Philip Onsale, who being taken near Charlemont, tried, and condemned, was hanged and Quartered near my L. Castlereagh, House, at the place where he had caused his father to be murdered: thus Ireland became subjugated to the English Hufpertime. And so likewise was Scotland thought to have been at this time, when on the sudden a new Hoplity springs up in the Highlands, headed by divers of the Scotch Nobility, who had the most powerful influence in those parts, the Earls of Glicarn, Aboy, Seaforth, Kinmont, the Lord Kenmore, the Laids Mac-Redeal; and Mac-Cland, Colonel Montgomeroy, Sir Alamy Murry, and Sir Arthur Forset; thet having each of them got together their several parties, were endeavouring to unite into a Body, and so toiled to have been able with a force not altogether contemptible to have taken the chief obd of the main part of the Island that were then in Scotland: and ‘tis like enough they had speedily effected what they intended, had not the chief Body of them, amounting in all to about 4000 under Glencarn, and Kenmore been encountered on the sudden, all armed, all provided, Glencarn &c.

Glicarn’s Army in this conflict, being very much laden, put put to the rout and dispersed, and himself mending but little of being taken, the rest in little strag- ling parties were many times met with to their last refug in which they were not for all this so out of heart, but that they again made a shift in some fort to re- imbody, & that so much the more confidently upon expectation of Middletons coming over with Sup- plies out of Holland: though upon his arrival not long after with Commission to be General, Sir G. Monro, (who together with the Lord Nepier, and Major General Dolger, landed with Middleton at Honey Ferry) having also Commission to be Lieu- tenant General; The Highland Levies instead of being re-inforced by these additional forces and supplies were rather weakened and overthrown by the animosities of some of the Scotch Nobility, especially Glencarn Romaching the prefer- ence of Middleton and Monro to the Command of the Army above him, thereupon departed in different lines, and laid down his Arms, Upon the neck of which breaches and defections among them. General Monk (the Dutch War being ended, having no more Work to do at Sea) is sent Commander in Chief into Scotland, and remaining upon Middleton & Largenbergh, on the west side of July gave him an utter defeat, and thereby put a period to these Highland Agitations: an all fur- ther attempts in Scotland, to the disturbance of the then regnant Authority in England.

The King of Scotland also her self at this time had the wings of her Religious Empire very much clipped, if not quite taken away by the disap- pletion of her General Assembly, which was done by Colonel Morgan, the fore-going year at A- berdeen, where they were assembled, Mr. Andrew Cau & the rest of them in vain protesting against the action, the like disturbance they had afterwards at Edinburgh from Lieutenant Colonel Catterall.

The Marquess of Argyll in Register for the Liberty of the Church of Scotland,

The Marques of Argyll to keep up his Reputa- tion with the Church of Scotland, seemed much troubled in his present situation as a Member of the Assemblies, and interceded with the Protec- tor for the liberty of the Church, wherein he had very good success: For Oliver considering that his declining the Kings interest, facilitated the total subjection of Scotland to his Authority, was willing enough to oblige him, by seeming to do that at his request, determined to do before for the quieting of the minds of the people; the Church of Scotland was therefore indulged with the exercise of Religion, and a great part of their Jurisdiction and Discipline; they were restrained in little more than the power of keeping general Assemblies (their Presbyteries being permitted to convene) and the rigour of Communication: For, whereas before persons excommunic- ated were not excluded from the Communion of the Kirk, but had all their estates confiscated till their Reconciliation, This later part was not now to be executed; but to please the Ministers for the restraint of their power, the maintenance of Scholars in Universities of Scotland was increased, and many Privileges granted to them.

The Government and security of the Kingdom of Ireland, was the next care of the Protector. Major Gen. Lambert was formerly appointed for

The Government and security of the Kingdom of Ireland, was the next care of the Protector. Major Gen. Lambert was formerly appointed for he could name. And the truth is, there was a foundation laid (by a Combination of the most courageously affected towards their Princes Service throughout the Kingdom, authorized by Commission from his Majesty) of a general rising for him in every County; which had not so quickly and to easily been suppress'd, had his Spies spared for no colt to maintain his Instruments of decree, for he had his Spies ready hired, not only here in all corners, but as counterfeiting themselves zealous Royalists, infiltrated into their Councils, and betrayed them, (of which number Sir Richard Wills at last became fairly suppessed to be one) but even about the Kings person, as appeared by the defection of one Manning, preferred in consideration of his fathers merts (his father was Colonel Manning, slain in his late Majesties Service) to be one of the Kings Secretaries Clerk, whom Colonel Samuell Taylors, forcing open his Chamber-door, took in the very act of holding Correspondence with Arthur, Oliver,' Secretary, from whom having newly received a Packet, and setting him self briskly to the returning of Answers, to prevent discovery, he was heartily writing Papers in his mouth just as the Colonel entred. Thus for a long time had he made it his weekly practice to send Intelligence unto the Ulurper, of all that was transacted in the Kings Court, and had a large Pension punctually affixed for him: and at length that fortunately found out, he had the reward of his treachery paid him in a more developed manner, being by the Kings command the whole Court befeech-ing his Majesty to make a publick example of him, that to death in one of the Duke of New-rnburghs Castles. This Combination, though it were probably to the very bottom discovered, before the apprehending of the above-named persons; yet to far the design, being generally laid, had taken effect, in that several Counties some small armed parties began to gather into a Body;

in Shropshire and Wales some endeavoured to have taken Shrewsbury and Chirk Castle by surprise, but were both prevented; and of those that attempted Shrewsbury, Sir Thomas Harris, who was the chief, was taken prisoner, and sent up to London.

Upon Sunday the 11th. of March, a party for the King of about 500 entered Salisbury about Midnight, and having seised upon Horpes, and taken away the Commissions of the Judges that were upon their Circuit, bended their course towards Corun, as of which Captain Mason Crook having timely intelligence, pursued them with his own Troop, and at a place called Southmouton in Devondire overtook them; and after four hours
sharp Conflict, tired as they were, and diswove, and faint for want of sustenance, drove them to a necessity of yielding; yet Penruddock bravely flood it out, till Articles were granted for the Imninity of him and his Company, which Crook is said to have afterwards perditionely denied, and left them wholly over to the Courtship of their Judges: besides 50 common prisoners, there were taken of the chief Leaders 3 Captains, Penruddock, Jones, and Groves, only Sir Joseph Vp-staff made a shift to escape away. Other Ringleners were in Northumberland, and at the Fossil of Skerward in Yorkshire, where 500 Horse being met, and not finding the Country to come in as they expected, dispaft themselves, and returned to their Habitations, Aliso at Hexham-Moor in Yorkshire, there was a great Rendeveouz of the Genery of the Country, of whom Sir Henry Stingly was taken, and Sir Richard Malwurger with much ado escaped.

At Salisbury, Exeter and Chard in Somm-entire many of the Weft Riders were tried by a Commission of Oyer and Terminer, and executed, and particularly at Exeter, Penruddock and Groves were beheaded, Captain Jones was proived; besides those who were put to death of the chief Leaders, many Prisoners in the Weft were filled with a number of the common sort of prisoners, till within a little while after that they emptied themselves into Forein Plantations.

And there hapned about this time an Adventure which very opportune for the riding of Prisoners of their chuching numbers, and the employing of a multitude of force and vagrant people, there having been ever since the peace with the Dutch, preparations made for the acquiring of a great and powerful Fleet,
upon an Expedition which was kept very secrct,
and not made known even to those that went upon it, unles to the Supreme Commanders, till the very last; only it was given out, that the Voyage would be very profitable, and to a place where there was much Gold and Store of Riches: In this Service we may well think there would not be wanting enough that would greedily engage them-theselves; hither all sorts of people flock'd, especially those of low and Bankrupt Fortunes, and upon hopes of enriching themselves, run headlongmost of them to their mine ; A Fate that commonly attends precipitate Ambition and Co-ventions. This Navy setting Sail from Portsmouth on the 27th. of December put in at the Barbadoes on the 29th. of January, Embarks command ing the Land-Forces, andPen being General at Sea.

This Year had been sufficiently memorable, if for nothing else, yet for the death of that famous and Lerner Antiquary Mr. John Stedent, whose Works are a Monument in more worthy his Me-\ehor, than that in the Inner-Temple Church.

The King of Spain was not ignorant that this great preparation was designed to make some impression on his Dominions in the West-Indies, and after having dispatched express to those parts to give them warning therefor, he sent the Marques of Leda (a person of great reputation in Arms) in a splendid Embasy to the Protector, to divert, or prevent the prosecution of the buffnels: he arrived at London the 22d. of May,
but had no cold reception and was so much disconoured in his Negotiation, that he quickly returned.

In the mean time the English Fleet set sail from the Barbadoes the 30th. of March, and visit its course towards Hispaniola, one of the foremost and richest Islands belonging to the American Dominions of the King of Spain; so that it was by this time apparent enough which way this expedition tended, and whereas it was admitted
1654. mitted by many, that at that time when no Hope- ility was declared between this Nation and the Kingdom of Spain, or any defiance bid either side, we should carry War into his Territories, without any provocation by him first offer'd: it was alledged, That the Conditions of Peace extended not beyond the Line. This, though it serv'd to stop the mouths of some, yet it could not satisfy the Spaniards, who look'd upon it as an absolute breach: However it was, whether this Expedition were just or not; whether it were undertaken to a point end, as was pretended, to curb the excessive pride, and ambitious usurpation of the Spaniards, and to bring freedom and purity of Religion to those Indians under his Yoke; or, as many are apt to believe, to partake with the Spaniards of some of his Indian Gold, (thinking it too much for one Potentate to ingross so much Treasure to himself,) I shall not undertake to determine. This is most certain, That at the beginning of this Enterprise, it met with a very remarkable Check, (however the Spaniards proved afterwards successful enough) for General Venables, when as he might have landed his men within a very little of Santo Domingo, (the principal Town and Fortress of the Island, and which was in a manner defeated by the Garrison Souldiers,) upon fight of the English Fleet; nevertheless, led by I know not what Policy and Interest of his own, and (it is more than superfluous) over-rul'd by the Counsils of his Wife, set them forth ten Leagues Westward of Domingo; whereupon the Spaniards gather'd fresh Courage, and betook themselves again to the defence of Santo Domingo which they had abandon'd: The English landing without opposition, and seeing no Enemy near them; thought themselves safe enough, and were in their minds absolute Lords of the Indies, sharing the Golden Mines among them; when contrary to their expectation, the General caus'd it to be publish'd in the Head of the Army, That none should upon pain of death, should plunder any Gold, Plate, or Jewels, or kill any Cattle. This sudden Frustration of their hopes, and the Climate's ex- ceptive heat, proofed the one such a damping to their Spirits, the other such a weakening to their Bodies, that by that time they had match'd a mo- tacious and disconsolate March through thick Woods, in deep scalding Sands, ready to perish with miserable Drought and Thirst for want of Water, (of which they met not with a drop in many miles,) they were brought to such a condition, that they needed not an Enemy to kill them, being already almost dead with faintness and weakness; so that the Spaniards, Negro's, and Maloata's falling upon them, kill'd, with little or no resistance, till they were weary of killing; and those that could make a flight to fly away, found it a sufficient Achievement for that time, to bring themselves back again safe unto their Ships.

In this Conflict Major General Haines, acted the part of a very valiant Souldier, who being shamefully defecled by his own men, and over- powered by his Enemies, was slain stoutly fighting: there fell above 600 in the Fight, besides what were cut off in straggling parties near as many more; & all this Execution was done by not above forty of the Enemy. The Remnant of this Naval Army, that they might not be thought to have undertaken to long a Voyage, and of such expectation altogether in vain, perfec themselves with little or no opposition of another Island called Jamaica, which however not so plentiful and rich a place as that which they at first aimed at, yet with much Industry, and the Supplies that were sent them out of England, they made a shift to make a Habitation of it tolerable enough to abide in, planting themselves at Orifans, the chief if not only Town thereof, and have kept it ever since.

The first Adviser to this Undertaking, was one Gage & Minster (formerly a Romish Priest) who also undertook to be the chief Guide in this Expedition, as one who by his long time of Travel in those parts (of which there is a handome Relation of his extant) was well acquainted with them; and there he ended his days not long after his arrival, reaping little fruit of his Pro- ject.

Whilaf the proceedings in the West Indies Gen. Bick's were unproperous, General Blake had better fortune in the Streights, who coming with his Fleet before Tunis, and sending to the Governor thereof to demand satisfaction for the depredations committed by his people on the English, and to require the English Captives to be delivered to him, had a contemptuous answer return'd, (viz.) Here are our Calibers of Gulletto and Porta Ferrina well mann'd and furnish'd with Ordnance, do what you can, we fear you not; and at the same time they man'n'd a line all along the shore, and planted Guns thereon: Whereupon (after a short consultation with his Officers) Blake with his great Ships and their second's, came into the Bay of Porta Ferrina within Malequet's fort of the Ca- tile and their line, and fired with such fury upon them (notwithstanding the frequent discharges of sixty great Guns upon his Ships, that in two hours, the Castle was made defenceless, and all their Guns dismounted, and the flantes clattered about their ears; and finding nine of their Ships in the road, he caus'd them all to be fired with his long Boats, and in five hours they were con- sumed. After this brisk action he failed to Algiers and Tripoli, with both which places he made very advantageous terms, and then came again to Tunis which he found (by this time) willing to submit to what he proposed.

Notwithstanding the Ill success of the several late endeavours for the King for so many years suffered, it was not much above a Moneth e're the Earl of Lindsey, the Lords Willoughby of Parham, Newport, Maynard, Pankland, Lucas, committed to the Tower; Peter, Sir Frederick Cornwalil, Sir John Palmer, Sir Richard Wingfield, with divers others, committed to the Tower, upon suspicion of pretended High Treason against Cranmer, which yet, went no further than hire suspicion, for they were never brought to a publick Tryal.

About the beginning of July, Major Sedge- nick went with a Squadron of twelve Ships, a-
of some high displeasure taken against them, and of the Souldiers left to their own unbridled Licence, having committed many cruel Outrages and Maffaces upon the poor miserable People; Crou-well taking this opportunity to ingratiate himself with the Protestant abroad, (affecting to be thought the chief Patron and Protector of those of the Reformation in all Parts,) concern'd and bitter'd himself very vigorously for their Relief;
he appointed a solemn Day of Humiliation to be kept, and caused a large Contribution to be ge-there for them throughout the Nation, and sent his Agents abroad to mediate for them, Mr. Pell to the Protestants Cantone of the Sweizers; Mr.
Samuel Mooreland, and Mr. George Downing to Thurin to the Duke of Savoy, but his Message being flighted by him, he took another course to deal with him, namely, by the Mediation of the King of France, this new great allie; by whose Power and Authority with that Duke, a Pacification was shortly concluded; Though of the large Collection that was made, so scanty a share came to them, (for some they had) that it may be very well suspected, whether self-Carity for the geting of Money, were not as well aim'd at, as Charity ad extra for the beftowing it.

However it fai'd with the Protestant abroad, thefe at home, viz. the Royallift, because they would not become Oliver's obedient Subjects, are not only not fav'd from Persecution, but persecuted themselves; while, besides other dif-pleasures both toward the Clergie who were probhibited from teaching School, and from having any Benefices, or officiating as Chaplains, and toward the Gentry, who were by Proclamation confined (such as had ever been in Arms) not to come within twenty miles of London, and disabled from electing or being elected in Parliament, there comes out a two-handed Invention of Crowwell, which serv'd him at the same time to acquire money to his own Coeffs, and to bring them low in their eftates and power; this was an Order for the Decimation, or tenth part of the Eftates of all fhich as had ever been in Arms either for his late or present Majority: For the better executing this Project of Decimation, (under colour of concerning the Peace of the Commonwealth,) for which Orders were fet forth toward the latter end of Oliver, by Oliver and his Council, he fet up the Office of Major Generals Civil,
in the nature of Prefuits or Governors of Provinces,
to curb, watch, and keep in awe the Royallifts,
and if it were possible to pull down their high Stomachs, they were Eleven in number, namely, kesey, Goff, Delfborough, Fleetwood, Skippin, Whalley, Butler, Berry, Paffes, Lamberts, and Baxter, which laft was alsio Lieutenant of the Tower; each of them having his several Counties allotted to his Government in the nature of Provinces: In which their Principalties, they reg'd like to fo many petty Kings, domineering over the Gentry and Nobility, till Crowell either thinking to do a fpecial fetic of Grace by taking off his Misfives, or jealous of what their power in the time might come to, easily gives way to his next Parliament to undo his thole whom he himfelf did le fettly moorned.
Upon the tendering of certain Proposals to the Protector by Monsieur de France, a Jewish Merchant, in the behalf of his Hebrew Nation, for their free admission to Trade, and exercising their Religion in England, a Conference was held about it several days at White-Hall, by the Members of the Council, and certain Divines of the most eminent then in esteem: and many Arguments being urged, some for, others against their admission; those against it far prevailed, that the Proposals too effect.

The Spanish King thinking it in vain to hope for a Concorination on the League on this side the Line, from thence whom he judged to have so apparently broken it on the other side, by invading his Island of Hispaniola, began not obscurely to make Preparations for War; and to the effect that he had entertained thoughts of Hostility, a general Embargo was made in Spain of all English Merchants Goods, and many of their persons secured; hereupon the like was done in England, and there suddenly followed on both sides a denunciation of open War, which by the Spanish was not long after solemnly proclaimed at Dunkirk.

The dissolution of the Peace with Spain, was the product of a peace with France; for there having been long force an addrest made to that end from France to the State of England, no sooner did the breach begin between England and Spain, but the French King lends to Monfieur Bourdon, his Ambassador here to press his Embassage; which he did with good success, that in a short while after the Articles of Peace between us and France were concluded, ratified by both Parties, and on the twenty eighth of November the Peace was proclaimed at London, and at Paris much about the same time.

Whereupon soon after Cromwell not to be behind hand in State, and to provide for the diligent management of all matters concluded in this Treaty, sends over in the Quality of his Embassador extraordinary to the French King, Colonel Lockhart, sometime one of the Ingenious Judges in Scotland, and now advanced to this Dignity by the Marriage of a Niece of his pretended Highness: And at the same time there was a fixed League of Amity between him and Cardinal Guflavus, the then King of Sweden, and Embassadors of friendly Correspondence were on each side interchanged; from hence went Mr. Rollos, one of Oliver's Bed-Chamber (as Envoy) and from thence arrived here the Lord Cornish, who was entertained with more than ordinary respect; for of all Amities that were between Cromwell and Foreign Princes and States, his most particular and intimate seems to have been with the Swedish King, whom a while after he under-hand aided with men in his War against the Danes, while at the same time he made them of endevouring an accommodation between those two Kings.

One principal Condition of the Treaty with France, was the exclusion of the King and all his Relations and Adherents out of the King of France his Dominions; but he upon foresight of what this Treaty would come to, had long since betaken himself to Germany; and there remained (for the most part at Colen, as hath been already mentioned) until such time as the Spaniard invited him into Flanders: his Brother the Duke of York, notwithstanding the great Command he had in the King of France his Army (the nearest Ties and Relations little avail, when Self-Interested comes in place) was by the fame reason of the State, advertised to depart that Kingdom with all his retinue by a prefixed time, not without some Complements and Apologies for this intimation: also his departure was required for some space, in which he was visited, and honourably treated by the Marshal, and others of the French Grandees, as likewise by innumerable Moderns (who at that time was come into France about some important affair,) at length he took his leave of the King and Court of France, and attended by the Lords St. Albans, and other English Lords, took his Journey toward Flanders, where at that time the King his Brother refused at the invitation of Don John of Austria, who then Governor of the Low-Countries for the King of Spain, sent the Count of Eonfaldagne, to offer him in the Name of the Spanish King all possible Service and Assistance.

The Cloze of this Year puts on Mourning in like manner as the last; the last Year ended with the Learned Selden, this, with that most Pious and Reverend Prelate, James Uffier Archbishop of Armagh, and once Primate of Ireland, whose Judicious Writings are sufficiently famous in the Common-wealth of Learning throughout Christendom; his Baisal, though he died on the 29th of March, was deferred till the 17th of April, and then performed with all decent Pomp, and by most of the Nobility in London, attended to in a Manner almost professional, where his Funeral Oration was delivered by the Almoner to Cromwell (for to Dr. Bernard, once Preacher to the Society of Gray-Inns, was then entitled;) Moreover, Cromwell himself defrayed all things befitting his In- ment, bestowing 200 l. toward the solenniz- ing thereof. Yet were his Coferers not to feel himself as he desired. And therefore notwithstanding his no success in his last Parliament, he finds a neces- sity of calling one again, whereupon he sends forth Writs in July for the summoning of another Parliament on the seventeenth of September.

In the mean while, a part of the English Navy, namely, the Rear-Admiral and fix other Ships under Captain Richard Stainer, set upon a Fleet of eight Spaniards, within four Leagues of the Bay of Cadiz, the Admiral Ship in which was General Don Marco del Porto, with fix hundred thousand pieces of Eight, run ashore in the Bay, the Vice-Admiral a Gallion, Commanded by Don Francisco de Eirresnall, and having in her 120000 pieces of Eight, and another Ship Commanded by Don Rodriguez Calderon were taken, and afterwards freed (one wilfully by the Spaniards in it, the other by accident;) Two others were taken and kept in possession, the Rear-Ad- miral a Gallion, Commanded by Don Francisco del Hoyo, and having in her two Millions of Plate, and another Ship commanded by John de la Torre, very richly laden; another man of War of some value, with a Peerage Prize, and a small Vesel of Advice from the Vice-Roy of Mexico, eloped to Gibralter. In the Vice-Admiral which was set on fire by the Spaniards themselves, to prevent being taken prisoners, was the Marques of Baydext with his whole family: there perished in this Combution (besides a number of lies Note) the Marque's himself, with his wife and his eldest Daughter, who was going into Spain to be married to the Duke of Medina Celis; there were saved from this fire, the Marques his eldest Son Don Francisco de Lopez, a younger Son Don Joseph de Sonega, and two Daughters Donna Josefa, and Catalina, with about ninety others. In the Rear-Admiral was also taken prisoner Don Diego de Villa Alta, Governor of the Havana. It was related by the young Marques Francisco de Lopez, who with his Brother and Sisters was brought up to London, and there for a while detained Prisoners, that the Cities of Lima and Callao in Peru, were about five Months before destroyed by an Earthquake and fire raining from Heaven, in which Ruine there perished above 10000 Spaniards, but of Indians not above 100; also that the Mountains of Potosi being laid level, the Gold and Silver Mines were thereby utterly destroyed. This enterprise near Cadiz purchased no less profit than honour to the performers thereof, and to the chief in Power. As for the Spanish young Nobles that were taken, the Protector, to give him his due, dealt very nobly by them; and after no very long time of detention, dismiss them home without any Rancion.

The Parliament assembled.

On the 17th, of September (the time appointed) a Parliament assembled at Westminster, and chose for their Speaker Sir Tho. Widdington, none were to be admitted in this Convention, by the Instrument of Government, but such as after their elections should be approved of, & allowed by the Council; & there were many discontented persons chosen of those that were dismissed at the last dissolution of what remained of the Long Parliament, and others of the Fifth Monarchy Principle, that the Protector thought it not safe to admit into the House, till some Laws should be passed for the better strengthening of his Authority, so that till the 26th of June the proceeding went on smoothly enough, and on that day the Parliament adjourned it fell to the 20th of January following, and passed some Acts, the principal whereof were:

An Act for Renouncing and Dissolving the Title of Charles Stuart unto the Nation of England, Scotland and Ireland.

An Act for the securing of his Highness the Lord Protector's Person, and the continuance of the Nation in Safety and Peace.

An Act to afford his Highness in his war against the Spaniards, which they declare to have been under taken upon just ground.

An Act for preventing the multiplicity of buildings within 10 miles of London; the Subsistence of which was that for every House built from such a time within that Compass, upon a new Foundation there should be paid a Years Rent to the Protector.

The Humble Petition and Advice, was a Model of Government, with which they several times waited upon the Protector at his House, to de fire him to take the Chief Government of the Nation upon hims, with the Title of KING; of which the Power he already had, the Name only what he wanted: This Office was brought to an open Conference, but it was first for a long time together gently and tenderly touch'd upon, as springing from a Motion suddenly start'd by some of the Protectors friends. When as fire enough they did but work after the Copy secretly prescribed to them, and as they had private encouragement and influences from the person they seem'd to court. As oft as the Members made their Addresses to him with this Humble Petition and Advice, he still defined further of deliberation, before he could positively determine in a matter of so great weight and concernment; till at length being requested to give his final Answer, he returned after he had several times fitted his Officers, to see how they stood affected, and found them so sattisfied (the most part of them) that he thought it not safe to venture That he could not, take upon him the Government with that Title: Thus openly refusalg (in regard matters were not brought to sufficient maturity) what it was generally more than believed, he had mainly purplish,

It must needs be thought high time for Cromer Sindercombe to make Acts for the security of his Body, since there was now more noise than ever of a most desperate plot against it; the Criminals laid to be of this plot, were Miles Sindercome, a Cathder and disencated Army man, Toop, one of Crownetts Life-Guard, Cecil and Buss, the left of whom a Priest belonging to Don Alons of de Cardenas, and to Lieger Embassador here from Spain) and by him instructed, as it was given out, to hire and set those other his Agents a work, comes off himself with a Non Avenus: Cecil and Toop pleaded they were drawn by Sindercome: he on the other side, that he was trapped by them: Of the several Ambushes in this plot, thus runs the Story; At Hammer smith a House is hired on purpose, placing of an Engine called a Blunderbus, to shoot him as he goes to Hampton-court; at Hyde-Park Corner also he is waited for, as he goes to take the Air; as likewise at another house in Westminster, by which he was to go to the Parliament House. Lastly when these took no effect, the next design was to set white-Hall on fire, by placing a Basket of combustible matter in the Chappel, with a Train laid to have taken fire at a prefixed time; which also some way or other happens to be discovered and prevented. In conclusion, he of the Life-Guard discovers all, and both he and Cecil have their pardons, he for his Discover, and Cecil for his free Confession, and the favor he expected: Sindercombe boldly and freely standing it out, and denying all at the Court commonly called the Upper-Bench, before Crownets Attorney-General, was nevertheless sent by the Witness of his two fellow Conspirators who left him in the lurch, and was sentenced to be hanged, drawn and quartered at Tyburn; in the mean time being kept close prisoner in the Tower, that very morning he was to have been executed, he was found dead in the Chamber, being reported to have suffocated in his head a certain poynitious pow-der to avert the flame and misery of the execu-
Memorable also was the Trial (happening a little before this discovery) of one James Naybour, the great Champion and Ring-leader of the Sect called Quakers, who having spread his Doctrine, and gained many Profytes to it in divers Parts of the Nation, was more especially taken notice of at Bridewell, and from thence was brought up to London, attended by several Men and Women of his Opinion, who all the way they came (the Women especially) are said to have sung Hymns, and to have used the same kind of expresions toward him, as antiently the people of the Jews did to our Saviour, when he rode triumphant into Jerusalem: The Parliament took it upon them to judge him themselves, before whom being convened, he was charged of Blasphemy, for assuming to himself Divine Honours, and such Attributes as were due only to Christ; and after he had used many cunning Sophisms and evasions to clear himself, such as argued him not altogether ignorant of humane Letters, he was nevertheless sententiously by the House to be (first at London) publicly whipt, pilloried, and stigmatized as a Blasphemer, then to be conveyed to Bridewell, there to be ancl whipt; lastly, to be brought back to London, to remain in Bridewell during pleasure; which Sentence was punctually inflicted upon him.

The King now in Flanders, having his residence for the most part at Brussels, had upon hopes of the good success of those his Subjects of England, who now began again to put to sea in numbers greater than the Nation, embodied several Regiments, consisting of such Englifh, Scots, and Irish, as he called out of the Service of the French King, and those that came in to him from other parts, whose Colonels were the Duke of Ormond, the Earl of Rochester, the Lords Bentworth and Gerard, and Lieutenant General Middleton; these Forces he kept quartered upon the sea-coast, to have been in readiness, if occasion were, to have seconded those in England, Monsieur Marfhe, an expert Souldier, formerly Lieutenant General to the Prince of Condé, being designed to have conducted this Army; but the Counells of his friends that acted for him in England, being from time to time betray'd, and his Majesty not being in a capacity to keep his men in continual pay, he took the opportunity, since he could not make use of them himself, to gratifie a power that had obliged him, and which was kept in need of recompense; and thereupon convened them to the Service of the King of Spain.

In vain did Cromwel think to be acknowledged the Protector of the three Nations, since all the several Interests therein, how contrary soever among themselves, attempted at one time or other, to shake off the Yoke of his Protection; yet as much in vain did both, all that already, and those that at present attempted to drive Oliver out, yet not too cunning and too quick for them all; for on the 17th or 18th April 1657, at a certain House in Shoreditch, they were apprehended a disconcerted party formerly in the Army, that went under the Name of Fifth Monarchy-men, such as taking upon them to be the Champions of Christ's Monarchy on Earth, renounced all Monarchy besides the chief of whom were Thomas Venner, a Wine-cooper-practisant (whom we shall have occasion to take more notice of hereafter) and others, who had appointed to Redoevenouz that night at Mile-End-Green, and thence to have marched into fome other Counties to join with others of their party, that were ready to throw themselves upon the first opportunity; there was taken with them, besides a great quantity of Arms, and certain printed Papers (that were to be dispersed) a Standard with a Lion encechant, gules, in a fain argent, and having this Morning, he had found with him; they were also taken into custody Major General Harri-ffon, Captain Lawman, late Vice-Admiral, Colonel Rich, and Major Donear; whereof the first was committed to the Sergeant at Arms, and the rest to other prisons.

The Spaniards were very much distressed in all parts by the War with the Protector, and on the 20th of April 1657 an Action was performed by General Blake in part of their Dominion, that the like hath scarce been mentioned in Story.

The General lying with some Ships near Cadiz, sent to watch for the return of the Spanish Plate-Fleet, which had intelligence that they had put into the Bay of the Santa Cruz, in the Island of Tereroff, whereupon he weighed anchor on the 13th of April, and on the 20th rode with his Ships off the offing at Santa Cruz; when he had found that they had come to the number of fifteen, barricaded in the Bay in a semicircular manner. Near to the mouth of the Haven a Castle was placed, which was then well fortified with great Ordnance, and besides that, there were seven Forts round about the Bay, with fixing, four, and three great Guns on each, all united by a Line of communication from Fort to Fort, and well lined with Musquetters, and Don Diego Dignas the Spanish General of the Fleet upon fight of Blake's fleet caufed all the smaller Ships to be moored close to the shore, and fix great Gallions well manned farther out in anchor, with their broad-sides at Sea.

Blake having well considered this posture of the enemy, sent Captain Staguer Commander of the Speaker Frigate with a Squadron into the Bay, who, by eight the next morning, fell pell-mell on the Spanish Ships, but Blake would have his share of the toil and glory of to brave an enterprize immediately recorded Staguer, and placed some Ships to pour their broad-sides into the Castles and Forts, whilst he with Staguer fought the Spanish Fleet (which was not inferior in number to the English, and much better manned) and by two in the afternoon they gained an intire Victory, but the General perceiving he could not bring off the Ships let them all on fire, but one that was sunk, and when this Service was performed, the 1656. Wind even to wonder, which before blew strong into the Bay suddenly veer'd about to South-Welt (whch brought our Ships safe out to Sea.)

The news of this success of Blake was so grateful for the Protector and the Parliament that they ordered him a Jewel of five hundred pound, and an hundred pound was given to the Musfanger that brought the Letters, and proportionable gratu-ties, and thanks to most of the Officers and Mariners.

According to the Conditions of Agreement between England and France, the French King demanded Auxiliary forces from England to help him in his War against the Spaniard in Flanders, which was readily granted by the Protector, & 6000 Foot forthwith ordered to be sent over,
Commanded in Chief by Sir John Reynolds, one of Cromwell's Knights, a man of good Courage and Resolution, once Commoditary General in Ireland: No sooner were these Forces arrived in France, but the French by their help took two towns without the gates of her Majeity, and with St. Pre-

nent nor was it long after ere they took the strong Fort of Marbild, being of notable confitence toward the speedy gaining of Dunkirk:
This Fort was immediately after it was taken consigned by the French into the sole possession of Major General Morgan and the English, who presently fell to fortifying of it, and in a short while made it to impregnable, that when the Spaniard sensible how much it imported to the keeping of Dunkirk, to regain this fort, sent a strong force of men (among whom were two thousand Scotch and Irish Reformadoes, affigued by our King to that Service, and commanded by his Brother the Duke of York) to set upon its recoverv by a desperate storm, they were after a very gallant and resolute effort upon the place, which continued for the space of six hours, repelled in the end with the loss of many men.

After Cromwell had given his final Answer to his Parliament, that he could not take upon him the Government with the Title of King, it was resolved on, that the Title of Lord Protector should be continued and intersed in the Hamble Petition and Advice, by which Title he was solemnly Invested (with much more Ceremony than before) on the 26th of June, before a great Assembly of people in Westminster Hall, where a fabric was erected for that purpose, and a Chair of State placed for the Lord Protector, whole In-(aliament wanted but little of a Regal manner, and though he attained not the Crown, yet he had the Sceptre, for there were four Emblems of Government presented unto him by Sir Thomas Wid-drington the Speaker (who at the delivery of them made an Oration to him, in which he amply delicated upon each of them) a purple Velvet Robe lined with Ermine, wherein he was vested by the Earl of Warwick; Communion Plate presented a large Bible with Boles & Clamps richly Gill'd, a Scepter of Gold, and a Sword, which the Speaker girt about him: Thus attired, while he sat in his Chair under a Canopy of State holding the Scepter in his hand, the herald flanding aflott, made a signal to the Trumpet to sound three times, after which he was proclaimed Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and then returned to White-Hall in State, having the Sword before him by the Earl of Har-ri-vick. He was likewise proclaimed not only in London, and other parts of England, but also in the chief Cities of Scotland and Ireland. And now he began to take the King upon him in his manner of living, and to Govern after a more Monarchical manner, and to model his Family according to the fashion of a Kings Court; to which end he had his Yeomen of the Guard in their Livery of Gray-cloth, with Welts of Black Velvet, of whom walter Strickland was Captain;

his Lord Chamberlain was Sir Gilbert Pickering,
the Lord Keeper of the Seal Nathaniel Eustace; Lawton was Warden of the Cinque-Ports, Gyne Lord Chief Justice of England, and Steel (formerly Recorder of London) Lord Chief Baron: Moreover, being this continued Protector by Authority of his Parliament, and having fortified himself by Alliances abroad (for besides the League of France, Sweden, the United States, and a fair Correspondence with Portugal, he had

Scars the Mirth of the Solemnities over, when, to ally the Triumphs for the several Successes of the English in Flanders, there arrived the News of the los of Sir John Reynolds General of the Forces in those parts, who with Colonel white and some others, Imbravour for England, by the way of Goodwin Sands, in a small Vessel, at a tempestuous season, contrary to the perversions of many (it is unsafe to venture against ill preges) was cast away with his whole Company. But here was something more than ordinary in this bitterly coming over of Reynolds and white, both seeming to prevent the arrival of other; for whether Reynolds was sent for by Crome-well, or suspected the intention of white to be some Impeachment against him; his business probably was to defend himself, in reference to an Imputation of holding Correspondence with the Royalty, because he was prevailed with by the Duke of York,

Colonel Sackey one that was a Prisoner in the Tower upon some design against Cromwell on a Commonwealth account, died about this time, and his death was not without suspicion of poison: he was a virulent enemy to the late King, and all the Royal Line, and suspected to have acted the horrid murder on him by cutting of his head, or silting therein with a vapor, for upon that action he was promoted from a private Trooper to the Command of a Regiment.

York, who always loved stout men, to give him a meeting between Drummond and Marliage, at which Parley, Reynolds was indeed not backward to render his Highness those Honors and Civilities which were due to a person of his Illustrious Quality. Not many months before, there died at Sea as he was entering into the Sound of Plymouth, that valiant and expert Sea-man General Robert Blake, not long surviving his notable Exploit at Santa Cruz; the best Elogium that can be given of him, is the true rehearsal of his Actions; than which, it appearing that it was his misfortune to serve an Illegal Power, never were any performed at Sea more conducing to the Glory of our English Nation. Also Vice-Adm. Radzi ended his Life on Land, whether he was come for the recovery of his Health; and at Jamaica there died Lieutenant General Train, Commander in Chief of the Forces there.

Colonel Sackey one that was a Prisoner in the Tower upon some design against Cromwell on a Commonwealth account, died about this time, and his death was not without suspicion of poison: he was a virulent enemy to the late King, and all the Royal Line, and suspected to have acted the horrid murder on him by cutting of his head, or silting therein with a vapor, for upon that action he was promoted from a private Trooper to the Command of a Regiment.

The last Convention having adjourned on the 26th of Jan., me again on the 20th of January following; and in this Session, which differed from the other as much as one distinct Parliament could possibly have done from another, two very observable things are to be taken notice of, which gave more durability to Cromwell's Ambition and Safety, than with all his Policie and foresight was aware of: the first was the admission of those Members which in the last Session were kept out with a high hand, whom since the Injustice of the Act did not refrain from excluding the time before, the consideration of his Interest urged him no longer, but rather the more to have excluded them this time also; but he was obliged to the contrary by his Friends (at least they were his friends) of the last Convention, who made it one of the Articles in their Humble Petition and Advice, That those persons who are legally chosen by a free Election of the People to serve in Parliament, may not be excluded from doing their Duties, but by consent of that House where they are Members. The other was, the erection of a new Convention, intended in imitation of the Old Constitution, from the House Lords, but they would not venture first to call it by any other name than that of the other House; it consisted partly of such as he took for his especial Favorites, Officers of the Army and others; many of which were picked out of the House of Commons to be constellated in the Other House, partly of several of the late excluded Common Wealth-men, and such likewise of the Army whom he thought hereby to draw off to his own Party, and about half a score of the old Nobility were nominated, but reduced to come. Now in this Conivenance of his, whatever his expectation of it was, he found himself very much deceived, since by this strong inundation of the late excluded, and the transmigration of several of his Friends of the Commons into his other House, his Interest there was so weakened, that his translating sitt of a few of his Opponents (if he thought to make a counterpoise that way) vailed him little; for Sir Arthur Haslerig, and the rest of the Hucksters both disdaining to accept of Cromwell's offered Baronage, and that by the addition of their own presence they might strength then their own Party the more, took their places in the House of Commons, by which means the Commonwealth faction grew to poont, and flew so high, that the other House was not so much as taken notice of, except in way of derision and contempt, so far were they from being concerned with or owned in any of their Messages. Moreover, they began to call in question what was done in the last Session, as being invalid without their assent: So that the Humble Petition and Advice, which but lately made such a noise, was like in a moment to come to nothing. This fo incensed the Protector, that in a great heat and passion he goes from his Council, and notwithstanding the earnest diffusion of some of the chief of them, takes a Hackney-Coach for haste, and being into his other (or Lords) House, sends for the House of Commons up to him, and for a preamble to their dissolution, standing under a Canopy of State, unfolds his mind to them in this following Speech; which we have thought remarkable enough to let down at large, in regard it plainly discovers (as averse as he seemed from accepting the Kingly Title) his strange perturbation of spirit, and how nestled to the quick he was to see himself clothed and curbed in the tendencie and progress he made thereof, though by a way a little feets about, and under the shew of settlement and flourishing estate of the Nation.

I had very comfortable expectations that God divers would make the Meeting of the Parliament a Bieft speech at the Diffolution of his last, and I hope the Lords and Commons will act accordingly. I am not a man living can say I fought it, no not a Man nor Woman residing upon English ground; but I contemplating the sad condition of these Nations, relieved from an Infitute Terrible no ere to a pie or seven years Peace, I think the Nations happy in having an House so acutely informed, and Advised by you to undertake such a Government, a Burden too heavy for any Creature, and this to be done by the House, that then had the Legislative Capacity, I did look that the same Men that made the Frame, should make it good unto me; I can say in the presence of God, in Comparison of whom we are but like poor creeping Anns upon the Earth, I would have been glad to have lived under my Wool side, to keep a flock of sheep, rather than undertook such a Place of Government as this is, in a little taking it by the Advice and Petition of Two, I did look that you that bad offered unto me, should make it good.
King Charles the Second.

I did tell you at a Conference concerning it, That I would not undertake it, unless there might be some other Persons that might interpose between Me and the House of Commons, who then had the Power to prevent insinuatory and popular Speech; and it was granted I should name any other House; and I named it of Men that shall men you wherever you go, and shake hands with you, and tell you it is not Titles, nor Lords, nor a Party that they stand in, but an English Interest. Men of your own Rank, and Quality, who will not only be a Balance unto you, but to themselves; while you love England and Religion.

Having proceeded upon the Terms, and finding such a Spirit as is too much predominant, every thing being too high or too low, when Virtue, Honesty, Piety, and Justice are omitted; I thought I had been doing that which was my Duty, and thought it would have satisfied You; but if every thing must be too high or too low, you are not to be satisfied. Again, I would not have accepted of the Government, unless I knew there would be a just Accord between the Governor and the Governors, unless they would take an Oath to make good what the Parliament's Petition and Advice advised me unto; upon that I took my Oath; and they took another Oath upon their part answerable to mine; and did not every one known upon what Condition they swore? God knows, I think it upon condition expressed in the Government; and I did think we had been upon a Foundation, and upon a Bottom, and therefore I thought my self bound to take it, and to be Advised by the Two Houses of Parliament, the Founding unsettled till we were arrived at that; the Conferences would necessarily have been Confusion, if that had not been settled: Yet there are not Conscripted Hereditary Lords, nor Hereditary Kings; the Power confiding in the Two Houses and my self: I do not say, that the meaning of your Oath mistake You. That were to go against my own Principles; to enter upon another man's Conference; God will Judge between Me and You; If there had been in you any intention of Settlement, you would have insisted upon this Bais, and have offered your Judgment and Opinion. God is my Witness, I speak it, it is evident to all the World, and every living, that a new Business hath been seeking in the Army against this Actual Settlement by your Consent; I do not speak to the Gentlemen or Lords (pointing to his right hand) whatever you will call them; I speak not this to them, but to you; you advis'd me to run in to this Place, to be in a capacity by your Advice; yet instead of owning a thing taken for granted, some must have I know not what; and you have not only disjuncted your selves, but the whole Nation, which is in likelihood of running into more Confusions, in this fifteen or sixteen days that you have sat, than it hath been from the risings of the last Seffion to this day, through the Intention of raising a Common-wealth again, that some of the People might be the Men that might rule all, and they are endeavouring to engage the Army contrary to that thing; and both that men have been true to this Nation, whereas he be, especially that hath taken an Oath that to prevaricate: These Things have been upon the Army, to break and disunite us; I speak this in the presence of some of the Army, that these things have not been according to God, nor according to Truth (pretend what you will); I left things tend to nothing else, but the playing of the King of Scots his Game, if I may so call him; and I think my self bound before God to do what I mean to prevent it. That which I told you in the Banquetting-House was true; That there were preparations of Forces to invade us; God is my Witness, it hath been construed to me since within a day, that the King of Scots hath an Army ready to put forth for England; I have it from those who have been eye-witnesses of it; and while it is doing, there are endeavors from some who are not far from this place, to stir up the people of this Town into a mutiny, what if I laid into Rebellion; and I hope I shall make it appear to be no better, if God affi aye; it hath been not only your endeavour to prevent the Army while you have been sitting, and to draw them to state the Question about a Common-wealth, but some of you have been lifting of persons by Commission from Charles Stuart, to join with any Infidels that may be made: And what is like to come upon this (the Enemy being ready to invade us) but even present Blood and Confusion. And if this be so, as I do assign to this Cause, your not affenting to what you did invite me to by the Petition and Advice, as that might be the Settlement of the Nation, and if this be the end of your sitting, and theft be your Carriages; I think it high time that an end be put upon your sitting; And I do declare to you, I do dissolve this Parliament; and its God Judge between Me and You. At which many of the Commons cried, Amen. And so the Parliament was Dissolved.

Thus was he driven from one Inconvenience to another, from the Inconvenience of a Parliament that croft him, to the inconvenience of no Parliament at all, whereby he was much frightned for want of those supplies of Money which he expected.

Toward the later end of this year died the Protectors Son-in-law Mr. Robert Rich, and was but little above two Moneths survived by his Grandfather the Earl of Marlboch himself.

The following year, 1658, begins with the News of a Victory at Jamaica (which came by an Express from the Governor on the 8th of April) obtained by a Party of the English there, commanded by Major Richard Stevens, against 800 Spaniards, who under Don Christopher Arnaudo Saffier, having lately landed in that Island, and begun to fortifie themselves at a place called St. Anna's, were fiercely set upon by the English, and forced to flye into the Woods and Mountains; and another Body of Spaniards, consisting of 300, who had fortified themselves at Chane-rose, in the North of the Island, were, by the Governor himself Colonel Dolley, driven quite out of their Hold, Don Francisco de Fransca, the Master of the Campos, with others, taken, many kild, and the rest utterly dispers'd.

Cromwell had no sooner freed himself of the said danger threatened him from his Parliament, but he is presently alarm'd again by his old Enemy the Royalist, whom yet he had still the Fortune to prevent by his Intelligencie; however, he took all Advantages to provide still more and more for his 1658. his Security, by making the most of all Plots and Designs whatsoever; and to this purpose he sends in all haste for the Lord Mayor. (Jickborn was then the man.) And Aldermen of the City, acquiescing with what he had discovered, of the base seditious against the Peace of the Commonwealth, aggravates the danger, recommends to them thefieldset of the Militia in trusty hands, canthet the Guards to be doubled, and strict Watch to be kept in all parts of the City, when as most of the principal suspected persons were already secured, as Sir William Compton, Brother to the Earl of Northampton, Sir William Clayton, Mr. John Raffel, Brother to the Earl of Bedford, and many more, the whole Design being before-hand betrayed, by a Person formerly mentioned upon the same Account, and one Corcoran, a M.

In Flanders Successes came on with a swift Career; presently after the taking of Mardig Fort, Dunkirk was straightforwardly begirt by the joynt Forces of the French and English, the French commanded by the Marshal of Turin, the English by the Lord Lockhart, Ambassador from the Protector to the French King, who was constituted General in the room of Sir John Reynolds deceased. The Relief of this important a place (it being the chief Sea-Port, and as it were the Key of all Flanders) the Spaniards resolved to Affay, though with the hazard of a Pitch'd-field; and to that purpose they assembled together all the Forces they could make, amounting to about thirteen thousand Foot, and one thousand Horse, commanded by Don John, and other Spanish Forces, so a great part of them) up a Sand-Hill, against the whole power of the Spaniards, were the main Instrumens in gaining a clear and eminent Victory over the Spanish Army, most of the Infantry being either slain or taken, and among the taken were divers Officers of the Spanish Nobility, and Persons of high Quality, seventeen Colours, six great Guns, with the whole Baggage of the Field; the Prince of Conde was unhorsed in the Fight, and Mounted again by his Compani Bontorile, who was thereby taken Prisoner in the Prisoner the three hundred wounded, and some mortally, among whom, Lieutenant Colonel Roger Fenwick, who

Her Charity.

The Sixth of Augst. Elizabeth the Protector's second Daughter died at Hampton-Court of an Apotheke in some of the inward parts, which afflicted him very much, because he loved her above all his Children; and that sorrow was increased by the length of her Sickness, and the grievous torments she endured: A little before the expired (which was in much pain) the Dehlium of her Sickness prompted her to utter many things, (which though formerly the thought, she yet durst not express,) against the Injustice of many of her Fathers Actions. She was married to one Cleypon, the Son of a private Gentleman of Lincolnshire, of a moderate Fortune; but she could not be confind to it, being of a Spirit as high, as if she had been born to that Greatness to which her Fathers Ambition had advanced her. She was of a very generous and obliging Disposition, and very much troubled at her Fathers Authority, and opprobrium of the Royal Party, to several of whom she did many good offices. The Grief which the Protector had contrased for her death, was very much augmented by his Trouble, to discern, that the Discontents sprung up amongst many of the Inferior Officers of the Army, were fomented by Fleetwood and Desborens; the first of whom married his Daughter, and the other his Sifer, who with Berry and Cooper Colonels, and Sydenham and Pickering, two of the Privy-Councillors, were in a Confederacy against the present Government, in favour of a Common-wealth: And a while after he fell sick himself of a Tertian Fever, which at first seem'd not to signify much danger, but by degrees it grew upon him: Yet his Imagination was soon transported with Enthusiastick Raving, that insensible of his own Dinger, he affirm'd, That GOD had rehired him to greater Attempts, then ever yet had been performed by him; and that he was affaid he should not dye of this Sickness. In which Estate, he was much heightened by Goodwine one of his Chaplains, who openly declair'd, GOD had heard the Prayers of his Servants for him, and given them his Life, and therefore he perswaded some of his Friends, to keep a kind of private Thanksgiving before hand for his undoubted recovery. This Confidence amused his Physicians so much, that they were less regardful of his Condition. But nevertheless, it was advis'd he should be brought to White-Hall, where with more convenience than at Hampton-Court, a respect might be had to his Health, and the Publick Affairs of the Nation, where he had not been many daies, e're it visibly appeared he had but a few more to live. He had some time before his Sickness appointed a Judic Committee of Nine, with whom he privately confabulated in the most urgent Affairs of the Government. Throse were, Fleetwood, Fenners, Desborens, Whalley, Thomas, Lawrence, Berry, Cooper, and Goff, which were mixed of both Parties, that is, of that of a Single Person, and that of a Common-wealth, that he might displease neither, and that he might by that Confidence divert the later from Denys upon his Power.

Upon Tuesday the 31st of Augst, finding the Transits himself in danger, he commanded his Servants to attend him, and all other Persons, except M. Thomas, and Dr. Thomas Godynay, out of the Room, and declared to them, That in regard he found his Sickness and Torments increasing, he was resolved to declare his Successor, according to the power given him by the last Petition, and Advice; And therefore he desired they take notice, that he had Named and Declared his Son to succeed him according. They asked him, which Son? He replied, My Son Richard, my Eldest Son. Immediately thereupon, there came some Persons into the Room, whereby it happen'd, that nothing further was said at that present. But Mr. Tborl, and Dr. Goodwyne immediately concerning togeth'r, did conceive that the Bafinets was too great and weighty for them alone to bear the Burthen of the Attestation of it; and therefore Resolved to take the first Opportunity they could, to move him again therein, and to defire him, for that Reason, to call some others, to whom he might communicate his Mind in that matter; But in regard that Relations and others (who perhaps would take it ill to be put out of the Room) were conversant there, they could not all that day, nor the next, gain any opportunity.

But on Thursday, perceiving his Distemper very much to increase, and hourly gain upon him, They resolvd not to defer it longer: And thereupon they asked him, Whether he remembered what he had said unto them the Tuesday before? Which he said, he did. They asked him, Whether he continued of the same mind or not, touching the succession of his Son Richard? He answered, That he did. They then told him, it would be requisite he should communicate his Pleasure to some others, and that the Declaration of the Bafinets, was of too great Concernment and Confidenz, for them alone to undertake, if there should be Opposition; and therefore defired him to fend forthwith for some others. He asked them for whom he should send? They replied, whom he pleas'd. Then send, said he, for the Committee.
mitre of Nune: Whereupon they sent a Melfender forthwith to happen them thither of whom three came immediately, Fitzwilliam Whalley, and Goff; and these five that were then present, perceiving him still to decline, went to the Bedside, and asked one of them him, touching what he had declared to Dr. Goodwyn, and Mr. Troughton. He thereupon said, that he would have his Son, his Son Richard to succeed him: and, so without any more Discourse, they withdrew from the Bed, and left him to his rest. But within few Minutes came in Fleetwood and Debororo, upon the Summons that had been sent them; to whom the aforesaid five declared what had passed, and offered somewhat familiar to move Oliver to the Declaration of his mind again, which they as faintly refuted; but were not much urged to it, they having at first their coming declared themselves satisfied with the Attestation of five Persons, so well known and efeemed of them.

Upon Friday the 26th of September, the famous Memorial Day of the Year, in 1659, he overcome the Scots at Dunbar, and the Year following at Worcester, at three of the Clock in the afternoon he departed this Life.

Thus after so many hazards in the Field, so many ambits and thoughts to have been laid against him at home, notwithstanding the Multitude of Enemies, that, from all Parties and Interests whom his violent pursuit of Greatness had exasperated, confpired against his Safety; contrary to the real belief of many men, the ill-bodings of some, and the earnest of others, he died not of a violent, but in his Bed a natural Death. The day of his death was ushered in by a Night as tempestuous as had been seen in this Age, as if the Elements had been in Convulsions at the flight of a Spirit, which had made so great a Conconciliation in the Affairs of the World.

He was born in the Town of Huntingdon; and was the Son of Sir Henry Steward of that Name, a Person of Eminence; Note in the late King's time, his Mother was the Daughter of Sir Richard Steward of the Isle of Ely, and his Wife Elizabeth the Daughter of Sir James Borrower, by whom he had three Sons (whereof one died young) and four Daughters.

His Family is said to have originally derived the Name of Cromwell, from that Great Cromwell, who was Henry the Eighth's Vicar-General over the Spiritualities; their Lineal Descent was from one William of Glanmorgan, who living Contemorary with this Lord Cromwell, and marrying his Daughter, in gratitude for the Favours he had done him, took his Name upon him, and transferred it to his own Posity. As for his Qualities, there is no doubt, though his Diligence, his Ambition, and his many other Vices obscured what was truly noble in him; yet there was something of Generosity in his Nature, as may be exemplified, in the particular care and regard he had for the Relations of some that had served him faithfully, and died in his Service; which one that with his Life, parallels with the Gratitude of the fore-mentioned Lord Thomas Cromwell, toward Stignor Frisold's an Italian Merchant, from whom he had received Civilities.
654. King CHARLES the Second.

Richard Cromwell proclaimed Protector by the City and Chief Officers of the Army, went at once to congratulate Richard, and conclude his Father's Death.

After the Congratulation, Strickland, Skippon, and some others of the Council were sent to the City, who appeared very well satisfied with what was done, and the next morning a Proclamation was divulged, subscribed by Clergyman Lord Mayor of London, and as many of the Chief Officers of the Army, and Councillors of State as could be got together; wherein Richard Cromwell was at White-Hall, Charing-Cross, and several other publick places in London, proclaimed Protector of the Common-wealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland; about four of the Clock in the Afternoon, after the Proclamation, the Lord Mayor presented his Sword to him, which he presently returned; and after some Ceremonies pas\f/ed (the Council, and many Officers of State, and of the Army being present) Nathaniel Fiennes, one of the Commissions of the Great Seal of England administered an Oath to him in these words:

I do in the presence and by the Name of God Almighty promise and swear, That to the utmost of my Power, I will uphold and maintain the true Reformed Protestant Christian Religion in the purity thereof, as it is contained in the Holy Scripture of the Old and New Testament, to the utmost of my Power and Understanding, and encourage the Profession and Professors of the same. And that to the utmost of my Power, I will endeavour, as Chief Magistrate of these Nations, the maintenance and preservation of the Peace and Safety of the full Rights and Privileges of the People thereof. And that in all things, according to my best Knowledge and Power, I will Govern the people of these Nations according to Law.

Thus far matters succeeded well; his Brother Henry Cromwell was Chief Governor of Ireland, and a Gentleman was sent to acquaint him with the present posture of Affairs. Of Scotland they had some doubt; but to endeavour to rectify all things there, Richard sent that evening to Mr. Thomas Clarges (Brother-in-law to General Monk) to prevail with him, to go immediately into Scotland, with his Letters to Monk, to know how he stood affected to the Army's Advancement: This Clarges was pitched upon as one who had great Interest in the General, and had been lately chosen by his procurement, upon the death of one Rowe, to be Agent for the Armies and Council of Scotland and Ireland, an Employment of good value, whereby he became interested in the Knowledge and Affections of the Officers of all the Armies in England, Scotland, and Ireland; for the Regiments of that of Scotland, especially of the Horse were often changed, whereas the Irish Army continued still unchanged. And although at first he being in the late King's Service at Oxford, made them at White-Hall unwilling to employ him; yet he was esteemed of a moderate Behaviour, and had so demeaned himself in the pretended Parliament in the Year 1656, by his being against the Kingship of Cromwell, that they would not then disoblige him, lest it should seem to be for that Reason: Besides, all of the contrary faction (of which were the Chief of the Army) professed a great esteem of him, not so much in respect of himself, but because it was believed Monk engaged him in those Councils; and the opinion of that contributed more than any thing to divert Oliver from accepting the Crown. Clarges willingly accepted of this occasion to go to General Monk, to be able to inform him particularly of his inclinations: For although he had a Relation to him by Marriage, the Generals so far distant Residence, gave him little opportunity of other Converses with him than by Letters. The City of London, and the generality of the people in England (having been wearied and tired with the Mistrust of War, and their Spirits subdued by the oppressions and Tyranny of Oliver Cromwell) seemed outwardly to comply with the necessity of the Time, and submit to an approbation of that which they could not remedy. By humble Conversations, Congratulatory Addresses in all, or most Cities & Counties were framed, subscribed & presented to him. In Scotland, by private Advice to some of the Officers of the Army, things were so prepared, that when Mr. Clarges came thither, he found them all prepared, not doubting one the other; they liked, as seemed not to dislike all that was done at London. But the General himself and he had many secret Converses, and the General then declared himself weary of the uncertain condition, wherein he found both himself and the Nation intt:\led by the over-ruling Tyranny of the Souldiers (who made themselves a divided Interest from the rest of the people, so that they confulted of a paper to be drawn up to be presented to the new Protector, the heads whereof were to advise him to suppress the division in the Church, by countenancing a Abbot & Orthodox Miniftory, to permit no Councils of Officers, and to model and put the Army into the hands of the * qualified Nobility, and Gentry of the Nations, as such whom the people might not use in trade: From this Confequence which was ma\a/gered both, with much referredness; Clarges began to prepare the General was in his Principles well fixed to restore his Country to an Aristocratical kind, Government, when ever a fair occasion should present it to the. This paper, with a Letter of approbation of the choice of the Protector, Clarges returned to London to him; the Letter he delivered publicly, but the paper was privately communicated, and well liked of by him; and the precipitation of the advice thereof in his attempts to model the Armies, was the main cause of all the divisions which happened in them, and the happy consequences thereof.

By the same Arts, as those from the Cities and Counties in England, Addressses were promoted, and subscribed by all the Regiments in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the Dominions and Territories thereunto belonging. Lockhart Governor of Dunkirk, who had married his Confin- Germain, was as forward as any to promote Addressses, both from that Garrison and the rest of the English under Major General Morgan, who was then General in the French Army, Commanding the British Marthall Turin, and had gained a great fame and reputation to their Country, by many signal Services in that Campaigne, for by their valour chiefy

* such as never had been against the Parliament to preside in the Jealousy of the action. Mr. Clarges return from Scotland to the Protector. Addressses to the young Protector, from all the Regiments of the Army both in England and other parts.
Chiefly a great Victory had been obtained, as before mentioned, over the Spanish Army near Dunkirk, which was followed by the taking of that Town, and the Fort of Mardike, and the Towns and Forts of Bergen, Dismunde, Ermes, Oudecaerde, Mervin, Grawelin, and Tyme, which last place, taken about the beginning of October, old Style, was the first Military Success that the English had abroad under Richard Government. Marshal Turenne had not hoped to late in the year, to gain a place so considerable; but having beaten a party of five thousand men under the Prince of Louis that was sent to join with some other forces, and to visit that Garrison in their march, he supposed that the Town missing the succour they expected, might quickly be surrendered; there were in it about 2,500 old Soldiers, besides whom, all the Town were affidied that were able to bear Arms, being in all about 4,000; and it was taken in a forcible Siege. After the Army had been two or three days before it, Turenne sent for Major General Morgan, who commanded the English to order him to keep double Guards, for that he had certain Intelligence that the Prince of Condé intended with all the force he could get together, to put Relief into the place. Morgan informed him, his men were so exposed, that he commonly left five or six every time they mounted the Guards, and therefore he proposed, that rather than weary them out with so much continual duty the Town might be assaulted. Turenne who was a wary Captain, was unwilling to hazard the Reputation of that Army, which had been victorious by many propperous Successes that summer, and therefore at first rejected the advice; but Morgan pressing more upon him, and offering himself with 600 English, to go on upon the strongest part of the Town, he at last consented. He was seconded by two Sergeant Majors, who each of them Commanded 600 French, and were to attack two other places, at the same time that Morgan made his assault; but he with his English entered and gained most of the out-works, and turned the Cannon of the besieged upon the Town, before his French Succours came in, and immediately after the Town was surrendered upon easy terms, the Prince of Louis, Barbacane, and Armes, marched out with the Garrison. Turenne imbraced Morgan after this Service; and though he had long before esteemed him a very expert and valiant Captain, he ever after valued him as one of the bravest Commanders of his time, and in the Report of this Action, to the most Christian King he attributed the merit of it wholly to him; which occasioned an Invitation of Morgan to Paris, where it was proposed to him, a good present of Plate was providing to grace his Service, but he wholly modestly made him ever prefer the virtue of generous actions, before the the Reward of them, chose rather to return into England, to his Family and Relations, after his long and hazardous absence.

Some were willing to believe the new Protector had a good affection towards his Majesty, and would use his power to his advantage, as soon as he should be confirmed in it, and had the Army in his absolute obedience, to which they were induced by the obligation of his former demeanour; for in his private Condition he demeaned himself with civility and respect to the Gentlemen of the County where he lived, and was always ready to do Offices of kindness to persons in distress, apparently disliking the severity of his father, and not averse to overtures for his Majesty's Restitution; but it was afterwards evident, that he did but formalize in the doubtful time of his Authority; for when he saw himself owned and acknowledged by the Army and people, he was very much referred to all that wished well to his Majesty, and either really declined his Service, or had not virtue enough to refit the temptation of great- nesses, or courage enough toward the declension of his power, to use that little which remained to attempt to tree his Country from tumult and opprobrium.

In the first place, after his advancement to the Supreme Degree, public care was taken by him and his Council, for the Intermitt of his Father, with all the State and Solemnity accustomed at Kings and Princes Funerals; and therefore search is said to have been made into the Records, to see what had been expended upon the Burial of King James, and the same Cost, if not greater, was to be bestowed on this: The Corps of his late Highness being embalmed and written in Lead, was removed from Whitehall to Somerset-House, there to lie in Regal Pomp and State, a Spectacle to all comers: the order and manner whereof was briefly thus:

Four Rooms one within another were completely hung with black: the first with Cloths, the fourth with Velvet, each Room was adorned with Scutcheons of his Arms, Crowned with the Imperial Crown, and at the upper-end of each Room, was placed a Chair of State, and over that, a Cloth of State, and over the Cloth, a large Majestical coronet, painted and gilt upon Taffata: In the fourth Room where the Corps were, there lay upon a Bed of State, raised by two gradual Ascents, and covered with a large Pall of black Velvet, his Effigies vested with a rich Suit, Kirtle, and a large Robe of Purple Velvet, Laced with Gold, and Furred with Ermes, to the kirtle was girt an embroder'd belt, by which hung a Sword richly hatched with gold, in the right hand was a golden Sceptre, in the left a Globe, on the head a purple velvet Cap, fur'd with Ermes: behind was placed a Crown Imperial, set with precious Stones, upon a Chair and Cushion of tithed Gold; on each side a rich Suite of compleat Armour, and at his feet his Crest: the Bed of State was inclosed with Rails and Ballisters covered with Velvet, at each corner whereof, were Pillars adorned with Trophies of Military Honors, curved and gilt: on the tops of the Pillars were Rayled Streamers Crown'd, at the Pedestals were Shields and Crowns gilt: within the Rayls stood eight silver Candlesticks, or Standards five foot high, with long Tapers of Virgin Wax burning in them, and next them four great Standards of his Arms set upright in Socketts, with the Guidions, great Banners, and Barrels of Taffata richly painted and gilt. The Effigies having for some time been seen in this posture, was afterwards shewn in another room, veiled after the same manner, and attended with the same Ornaments: as is already described, and this continued until the day of conducting the funeral pomp to the Church, which was on the twenty third of November: fortill then all things could not be prepared and made ready: and then the Coffins placed in a hastily provided Funeral Chariot, covered with black Velvet and drawn with six Horses in like manner man- led, and adorned with black plumes of Feathers, was attended from sommerer-House to Westmin- ster by all the Officers of his Houſhold, the chief Officers of the Army and Navy, the Magistrates of the City, the Judges at Law, the Embassadors and publick Ministers of Foreign States and Prin- ces, the Members of the late Upper-House, and of the Privy Council, all in mourning; each Company being distinguished by Drums, Trumpets, a Banner born by one of the Chiet Ones, and a Horse of State muffled with black Velvet, led also by some one of Eminence. Lastly, the Honour of Honour trapped with Embroidery upon Crimson Velvet, and adorned with white, red, and yellow Plumes, was led by the Master of the Honour, with such other like Formalities used at the Obsequies of great Persons. At the west-end of the Abbey-Church, the Coffins being taken out of the Chariot, was carried through the Church un- til a Canopy of State, borne by six of his Gentlemen, up to the east-end where it was placed in a magnificent Chappel, or Monument of Wood framed for the purpose, with Pilasters and other adornments of Architecture, carved, painted, and guilt, to remain for a certain time exhibited to public view; a sort of temporary Monument much used in foreign parts, at the death of great Princes: the Corps had been privately embalmed many days before the Solemnity in Henry the Sevemth Chappel.

As soon as the Ceremonious Rites of this great Burial were past, the Preparations for which had for a time very much put a stop to preceding both domestic and foreign, immediately other matters of publick concemment began seriously to be taken into consideration, by the new Pro- tektor and his Council. The first thing was the sending of a Naval Supply to the King of Sweden, between whom and the old Protector there had been contrived a very firm and inviolable Alliance, and Forces had been sent to this Kings Aid out of this Nation, both for Land and Sea-service; for the latter whereof, he now more than ever had occasion to make up a good stout fleet for after that by his Success against the King of Denmark, he had won him to a Concession of a great part of his Territories, and of half the Dominion of the Sound, and had at length withdrew his Army, the King of Denmark judging the Conditions too hard on his side, and alluding them not to have been punctually observed by the Swede, began presently after the departure of the Swedish Army, to flie to Arms, for the recovery of what was lost, being especially encouraged thereto, by a certain assurance of Aid from the Hollanders, besides his entries into Confederacie with the Emperor, the King of Poland, and the Mar- quees of Brandenburgh, against the Swedish King, who having quick Intelligence of the King of Denmark's Design, speeded back with his Forces, and was set down before Copenhagen; ere the Danes were well aware of his coming, but the Danish King had before-hand (providing against the worst that might happen) so well fortified and stored the City, that it was unable to endure a long Siege, and now the Sovereignty of this famous Bay of the Baltic Sea, called the Sound, being thus disputed between these two Kings, the Dutch thought it a matter of no small advantage to them, that the Sound should continue in the power of the Dane their constant Ally, left the Swede gain- ing too much sway therein, they might be deprive- ned of the benefit thereof, which was of high Concernment to them, and therefore made all possible haste to set forth a Fleet; for the Relief and Supply of Copenhagen; the English on the other side, thought it no less importent to them to help the Swede, though it were against the Dane and the Dutch, both of them our friends in outward appearance, left their joint Interest and prevailed against the Swede, whose other Po- tenates was the most firmly united in League to this State, might have proved prejudicial to us likewise in relation to the Sound, which also concerned us no less weightily than the Dutch, therefore a Squadron of Julii Friggs was sent forth by this State under the Command of Sir G. Adhips, toward the Sound, which having for some time been detained upon the Coast by contrary winds, and afterwards steering their course toward the Northern Seas, which the extremity of the Winter had made inaccessible, they were forced for that time to return not without some damage to the Ships, by reason of the Ice, and the loss of some men, through the bitterness of the Weather in those parts, so that this Enterprise was sus- pend till the coming on of the Spring, and then a more powerful Fleet was set out under the Com- mand of General Montgomery, Sir George Adips, being invited by the King of Sweden to take up- on him a chief Command in his Navy.

In the mean time, the Hollanders fleet led by General Opdam, and Wiete Witsen for moving at the Sound with relief for Copenhagen, were af- sisted by the Swedifh Rix-Admiral Charles Ga- leeche Vranghe, in which Battel the Dutch are said to have received a notable Overthrow, seven of their Ships being lost, and Wiete Witsen one of their Admirals, with many other persons of Qua- lity slain: nevertheless during the Fights, sever- al Dutch Physts and Merchant-men paffed by with provision to Copenhagen, which so strengthened the Befeged, that they thereby became enabled for the faltaining of a long Siege, as hath since appeared, and not long after, the Swede in a re- folute effort against the City, were repelled with the loss of a great many men, and some of Eimi- nence.

And now in England want of Money, and oth- er pressing occasions of the State, required the sudden calling of a Parliament; the young Pro- tektor illiceth out his Wits, summoning the Mem- bers to meet at Westminster the 37th of January. Elections are made by the Counties, not with- out some Canfving of Patts.

Moreover, according to the Confulution of the Government, Members were elected to the Commons House for Ireland and Scotland, as well as England. The Elections were fo dispofed in England, that many honest Gentlemen in all parts were chosen, but the Upper (for it did not yet as- pire to the Nome of Lords) House, was filled with with the chief Officers of the Army, whereas most were of such contemptible extragard, and education, that the Commons were unwillingly brought in any capacity whatsoever to own them.

From the time of Summons of this Parliament, to their convening, Richard was frequently entered with the fore-mentioned Adreces, which much heightened the confidence he had entertained of his future prosperity, and made him think of modelling the Council conformable to designs he had of subduing the Army to his intire Command, for the Council, as the Government then stood, had a great co-ordination with him in the administration of it, and the major part consisted of such as counterbalanced in all their extravagances the Officers of the Army, who were many of them Anabaptists and of other Sects.

He pretended not to remove any of the Counsellors, but to add so many of his friends to them as might make the greater number firm to him, he proposed the Lord Brogiol, and Fanconibridge, who had married his Sister, but they were not approved of; and instead of these, it was offered by those opposed to them, that four Colonels of the Army might be admitted, (viz. White, Giff, Berry, and Cooper;) the first two had been of the late Kings judges, but were affected to the Protector and his Family; the other two were fableous and seditious. These Transitions were not agitated in open Council, but privately treated of by particular persons; but it is rumoured, that the Army began to be jealousy of the Protector, and murmured at hisisons, sometimes they would complain of the Company and Conversation he used, and at other times censure his Religion, explaining that Godliness was discouraged by him, and that he rather favoured those of loose Principles, than the zealous Protectors of the Gospel. But in this he was injuried, for it his private Condition represented him a kind of Libertine, he assumed together with the publicke Person a more grave and circumplexed behaviour, commended himself to the constant observation of all Religious Duties, and was in appearance at least, it not really so, of a blameless Life and Conversation.

The Grandees of the Army, doubtful of the temper of the approaching Parliament, moved the Protector to call together some of the Officers of the Army to London, (as his Father was accustomed to do on the like occasions:) to advice with him to obviate anything that might happen in the beginning of his Power, if the Parliament should attempt Innovations: He was a little surprized at this advice, but thought it not time to refuse it, and thereupon Letters were sent to as many of them as could be spared from their Charges, to repair to London, to be there at the opening of the Parliament. The Names of his Fathers Privy Counsellors which went and were continued under him, were Richard Lawrence President, Nathaniel Fines, one of the Keepers of the Great Seal; John Thurloe, Secretary of State; General Montagu, Sir Charles Woodley, Colonel Philip Jones, Philip Lord Liffe, Son to the Earl of Lisefdie; Lieutenant General Fleetwood, Colonel Desbours; Sir Gilbert Pickering, Colonel Sydenham, Walter Strickland.

Colonel Philip Skipson; of which the six last named, were favourers and abettors of the Army; Lawrence the President was an Anabaptist, but somewhat moderate in his Opinion; the Lord Life was very able and uncertain, endeavouring as much as he could to appear a Neuter. There was another whom I should have named, which was Mr. Mayor, the Protectors Wife Father, but his indisposition of health rendered him incapable of action; Fleetwood and Desbours had frequent Meetings at Desbours house, who with the factious part of this Council, and some of the Colonels of the Army that favoured them, were Berry, Hemton, Cooper, and Lilburn, consulted to wrest the Power of the Army out of the Protectors hands; and in order thereunto, Desbours was sent to tell him, That the Army was filled with many jealousyes and fears of Dangers against it, which would put them into Mutiny, and inevitably hazard the subversion of the Government, unless some speedy remedy were taken for prevention, and that no better way could be thought on, than putting the Command of the Army into the hands of some person that had served with them, and of whose Courage, and Integrity to their Cause, might have confidence and assurance; and immediately named Fleetwood to be the man; adding, That this would not only satisfy the Army, but give great content to the Godly party, (which was a name much used by all these Wielders,) and free him from much of the trouble which then stood, and now lets intense in the more necessary parts of Government. To which he replied, That as to the fears and jealousyes of the Army, when he knew their Grounds, he would give them what redresse could be defined, not doubting but the Parliament now ready to sit down, would take care both for his and their security, and the peace and quiet of the Nations; But as to the Command of the Army, he freely told them, he should not think himself able to protect himself or them, if he should part with it, which his Fathers example confirmed him in. And with this answer dismissed him. His father, as was before mentioned, was much perplexed before he died, with many seditious Anabaptist Officers of the Army, who were impatient of his Government, but the fear and danger of a division, and respect to his person, kept them in some degree of Obedience; he displaced many of them before he died, and had reduced the rest, and wholly modified the Army to depend on him, if he had lived a few months longer; he had introduced his Son my Lord Fanconibridge, and many others into Chief Commands, who were allied to him in blood, or by their advancement wholly depending on him: all this while matters were carried without much heat, and not out of possibility of accommodation when the Parliament came down.

At the prefixed time, the Parliament meets, consisting as the left Parliament had done in his Fathers time, of two Houses, the Commons, and the Other (which now began to be called the Upper-House,) for the first was chosen Speaker, Colonel Chute, a Lawyer, who within a short while fell sick unto death; as also Sir Lifebone Long.
Long Recorder of London, who was chosen pro tempore in his seat; for the latter was chosen,

Nathaniel Fennes Lord Keeper of the Seal; The Act of Recognition of the Protector to be chief

Governor of the Common-wealth of England,

Scotland, and Ireland, and the Dominions and Territories thereunto belonging: Which was many days debated in parts, and at last part of it resolved in these words; viz. That it be part of this Bill to recognize and declare his Highness

Richard Lord Protector and Chief Magistrate of the Common-wealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the Dominions and Territories theraunto belonging. And it was added, That neither this nor any other Act that is or shall be passed in order to this Bill, shall be of force or binding to the People until the whole be passed. The Protector liked well these proceedings, and thought himself to a good settlement; but of those that were zealous for a Common-wealth, there was in this Parliament such a considerable number,

who had so powerful influence on publick Transactions, that to procrastinate the time, they cast

in several previous Debates, in which, nevertheless, the Affairs of the Protectors Interest being more in number, carried things to their own

Advantage by the Major Vote, as particularly in the business of the Scotch and Irish Members to be continued in among them, and the owning of the Upper-House, and holding an Entercourse

with them, after a long Confinement in question of their Authority. However, the Factions Counsellors which abetted Discontents in the Army,

continued their Meetings to purifie their purpose of wresting the Command of the Army out of his hands, and putting it under Fletwood.

Several Designs had been in vain undertaken for his Majesties Restauration during the Illumination of Oliver Cromwell, which were chiefly managed by the Earl of Oxford, the Lord John

Belas, Sir John Greenville, Sir William Compton,

Colonel John Raffell, and Sir Richard Willis, who

for their suppos'd coverted, and by the privy of their

Councils, were commonly called, The seall

Knots: But, though nothing was more prudently

and firmly continued, all their Confinations were from time to time imparted to Thurloe by Sir Richard Willis, which was not yet known.

Nevertheless, his Majesty about this time thought fit to appoint new Commissioners, and sent over into England a blank Commission dated at Brux-elles the 11th day of March, in the 11th year of his Reign, which was filled up with the Names of Arthur Anfley, Son to the Vicount Valentia;

John Mordant, Brother to the Earl of Peterson;

Sir John Greenville, Sir Thomas Peyton, and

William Legg, which was as followeth:

The form of the Commission.

Charles by the Grace of God

King of England, Scotland, France

& Ireland, Defender of the Faith,

&c. 700th Year, Right Truly and Well-beloved, &c. And to every of them, Greeting. We do by these

Pretexts Constitute and Appoint you Our Commissioners, giving you or any one or more of you Power to Treat with any our Subjects of Our Kingdom of England, and Dominion of Wales, that are or have been in Arms against us or Our Father of Blefled Memory, or that have contributed to the present

Rebellion in England (Excepting such as actually fale in Judgement for the taking away the life of Our said Fathers or pleaded as Counsel Learned againft his life,) or attended as Minifters to that odious pretended Court, or laid hands on his person in the execution of that horrid Murther) And to asfume them in Our Name, That if they shall forfake the present Rebellion, and joyn heartily and efficually for the suppressing of the same, and for Our Restauration to the Rights due to us by the Laws of God, and of that Our Kingdome; That then We will not only freely pardon their former oppofing us and Our dear

Father, and all other their Crimes and Offenses in affing, adhering to or complying with the said Rebellion; But that We will Recom-

pence and Reward such of them as shall by a-remarkable Service merit of his, either by reducing or rendering any Town, Fort, or Garrison of the Rebels into Our hands, or into the poiffion and power of you or of any other

Trustees, employed by us or you for Our Service: And what you or any one or more of you shall by virtue of this Our Commission in writing under your hands, or the bands of any one or more of you, promise in Our Name in this kind, We shall Ratife and Confirm, and perform. Given at Our Court at Brux-elles this 11th day of March, 1659, in the Eleventh Year of Our Reign.

These Gentlemen proceeded with much Wa-tiness and Diligence in the execution of this

Commission, the Effects whereof shall be made known hereafter; But in the mean time, we shall return to what paffed between the Parliament and

Army. Besides the private Meetings of some fecret Officers at Dafford Houfe, the General

Council of Officers, (as they called themselves)

mer in Fletwood Houfe, where they acted with as much formallity, as if they had been the Supreme Legislators of the three Kingdoms.

It was a little before Cromwell's Death, that great preparation was begun for the fettling forth of a Fleet to the help of the Swedes against the Danes, and that under the Command of Gene-eral Montague; nor did his death put a stop there-unto, Sir George Ayscough being sent with a Squadron of Ships, though hindered from coming up to yoin them, by reason of the freezing of those Seas, as hath been already mentioned; whereupon, for the better managing of the Charge, it was thought expedient that the House of Common should be engaged in it, and a Narrative Report was made to us by Secretary Thurloe appointed the latter end of February this year, concerning the State of the War between the Crown of Sweden and Denmark, in relation to the Baltic

Sea, and the Command of the Sound: This took
The Upper House, as it now began to be called in a strain [somewhat nearer Lords House] favoured the Military Council of Officers, but the Commons took much disaffection at it, as if it portended a kind of Force upon their Counsellors, The Protector in the mean time advised with his Friends, how to free himself from the Embarrassments of the Officers of the Army; My Lord Fauconbridge, Colonel Ingoldsby, Col. Bridges, Col. Charles Howard, Major Knights, all Officers in the Army, and some others, counselled him to send a party to Desborough's house, to Leisure those that met there, which were Eight or Nine of the chief Confederates, and immediately to give their Commands to the next Officers to them, till he could have a fair opportunity to make them into better hands, and to fend for all the rest of the Officers to come to him, and to Command all of them to repair to their respective Commands, that were not obliged by Service in Parliament to attend that duty. These Counsellors were very agreeable to his Inclination, but the Secretary of State and some others to whom he brake the busines, diverted him from the first, but to the latter, of dismissed the Officers, he readily consented; and the next day he sent for them, and dismissed them accordingly; And the same day that this was by him done, the Commons openly debated against this Assembly of Officers, and Voted, That during the Siting of the Parliament, there should be no General Council or meeting of the Officers of the Army, without direction, leave and authority of the Protector and both Houses of Parliament. He endeavoured to be reconciled to these officers, but many that favoured the Army, had cunningly cast out some minatory Expressions, intimating, That this way of proceeding might make them think themselves suspected, and provoke them to break forth into some act of opposition and disturbance, they passed another Resolve, That no person should have or continue Command in any of the Armies in England, Scotland, or Ireland, or of any of the Dominions or Territories belonging, who shall refuse to subserve, That he will not disturb or interrupt the free meeting in Parliament in any of the Members of either House of Parliament, or their freedom in their Debates and Councils. These were transmitted to the Upper House, to be confirmed there; but they made a flow of progress in them upon divers late contrived Jealousies, not the least of which was from a late Vote of the Commons, wherein they declaimed at the acknowledgment of their Confinement in their acknowledgment of what had the other House of Parliament, should not prejudice the Peace of the Land, or their Privileges; as also believing, that the Protector confined with the Commons to weaken and divide, or subdue the Power of the Army, in which they were somewhat confirmed, for that these matters were Debated and voted the same day he had dissolved the Council of Officers, and dismissed them. The Protector had many of the chief Officers of the Army fixed to him, but the inferior lot who were of phanatick Opinions in Religion, and were more numerous, and had most influence upon the Souldiers, were for Everwood and Desborough; For it was artificially fill'd into their heads, That the Protector did intend to cast them out of their Places, and put the Army into the hands of the Nobility and Gentility of the Nation, thereby to bring in the King, and destroy that Liberty of the Gospel they had so long contended for. The Debate against the Army in the Houfe of Commons, was on the 19th day of April, from which time the meetings of the Officers were more frequent than before, and upon the 23d day, the Protector was informed, that they would either themselves dissolve the Parliament, or compel him to do it. He called his Confidets about him, and made preparations against all accidents that might happen, and in the evening many of his Friends encouraged him to take Horse, and appear in the Heads of some Troops that were ready to receive him. While this was doing, the other party had drawn up some men in the several Avenues to White-Hall, and in St. James's Field, yet it was believed, if he had appeared with vigour and courage amongst them, respect of his Person would have prevailed much with the common Souldiers; but he was fearful, and unmoved, of a Spirit incombing the quality he assumed, and many of those about him were as insolent as he, some advised one thing, some another, waiting their time in contradiction; and as it happens in the Confidets of commit- people, they debated many things fit to be done, till the time was past to put them into execution. Desborough, his Uncle came to him from the discontented Officers, and prestied him much to sign a Commission to Fined, to dissolve the Parliament, which he a great while obstinately refused, till Desborough told him, if he did it not, it should be done without him, and so urged by threats and importunities, he at length consented to do it.

The next morning, the House of Commons ha Desborough sign a Commission to Fined to dissolve the Parliament, which he a great while obstinately refused, till Desborough told him, if he did it not, it should be done without him, and so urged by threats and importunities, he at length consented to do it. Proclamation for the Dissolution of the Parliament.

Whereas We, summoned Our High Court of Parliament to Assemble and Meet together at Our City of Westminster the 27th day of January last, which hath continued until this present day; And whereas We did by Our Commission under Our Great Seal of England bear date at Westminster this present 22d day of April Firstwood and Deborow having (to get the power of the Army to them, and their Party) made this Breach upon the Parliament, and in it shaken the Protector's Government, intended of themselves, as it should seem, nothing less than to dethrone him, though by reason of what they had already done, they quickly found it was not in their power to prevent what they little intended, they came to him together, and spirit several times that day after it was done, and protested to him, That his Power in all things, but the immediate Command of the Army, should be preserved intact; and even in that, nothing should be done, but in his Name, and by his Priuity, telling him, They had not taken this course, but upon certain Assurance of the Chiefs of the King, Party, and others, to differ from Colonel Lambert, which nothing could prevent, but the breaking up of that Parliament.

He received not much Conciliation from these discourtesies, and gave little credit to them; well knowing, that it was far easier to draw the Officers of the Army into Seditions courses, than to moderate them. He told them, he doubted not of their intentions, and that they had been practised upon to do that in behalf, which they might have leisure enough to repent of; and that they would now find they had made a Concession of his power, it would be a Province too hard for them to recollect, and to profit in effect; for at the first Meeting of the Officers at Wallingford House, after the emission of the afore-mentioned Proclamation, they would neither of any thing in behalf of the Protector, and were lost from that of his continuance of his power; that anything was moved, tending that way, it was obstructed, or diverted, by the Proprietors of the Government. Yet at length, when they had determined, that the Chief Command of the Army should be in Fleetwood, with a power to dispose of all vacant Offices till further Order, they were persuaded to allow the Protector a kind of Limited Supremacie (somewhat like that of a Duke of Venice.) But the next day, while many of the Superior Officers met at Wallingford-House, in further consideration of a Model of Government, the inferior Officers being the most numerous, assembled in the Chippel at St. James's, having Dr. Owen, and other Independent Ministers with them to assist at their Devotions, where the matter was so artificially contrived, that the prosperity they enjoyed under the latter part of the Commons House of the Long Parliament, was much magnified; with some intimations of Advice to return to that Government, with which the Auditors were very much affected, but nothing more was done at that time. This was promoted by Lambert and his Friends where, in he appeared not openly himself, but let Colonel Library to manage the Business, at whose Chamber his friends had private Audience.

The next day Fleetwood and Deborow were alarmed with this Countermove against their Designs; for the inferior Officers came now to open Declaration of their forwardness to restore the latter part of the Government, the Long Parliament, and to restore to them their Commands, which the Officers who had been displaced by Oliver Cromwell for disaffection to him, yet with so much respect to the Protector, and his Family, that they would have an Honorable provision made for them. Fleetwood endeavored to oppose this Torrent, instigating Lambert's ambition would quickly supplant him; if he got power; but when he perceived it was already too great to be resettled, the Consideration thereof obliged both him and Deborow to comply, for the preservation of their Authority. However, to retard their proceedings, they propose, first, to have the Army settled and modelled in a Way of Unity before they determined upon the Government, which was thought rational; and at a Meeting of a General Council of Officers, in order thereunto, they removed the Protector from his Regiment, and the Colonels Invidiously, Hamburgh, the Lord Chamberlain, and Colonel-Brigade from thence; Colonel North was displaced from the Lieutenant-Generalship of Province, which carried, by Colonel Asstden, and made Colonel Edward Smith Governor of Hull, in the room of Colonel Smith, who, by the recommendation of Fleetwood, had the Command of that Garrison given him by Oliver Cromwell. To Colonel Sanders they gave the Protector's Regiment of Horse, to Colonel Rivo, that of Humber's; to Sir Arthur Hasliger, Colonel Howard's Regiment of Foot, with the Government of Barwick, Carlisle, and Tynemouth; To Lambert, they gave the Lord Kilsby's Regiment; and to Oetz, that which was his own before, which was lately commanded by Colonel Bridge, Major Pickard, and Captain Audubon; Andappoint several Officers, who had been by Oliver Cromwell displaced were restored to their Commands: The Inferior Officers, in all these respective Regiments, were faithfully modelled according to the Opinion of the Commanding Officer. This Lieutenant was brought into the Army, wherein he quickly recovered much of his former power. After this, the Council of Officers was reduced to a smaller Number.

The 29th, of April there met at Fleetwood, Houlie, Lambert, Deborow, Sydenham, Cooper, John Jones, Berry, Hackers, Liburn, Altheald, Sale, son, Zanby, Oly, Sanders, Clark, all Colonels, and and Major General Keiley, and Barkstead the Lieutenant of the Tower, where they Debated the Election of a Council, which should have a Negative upon the Remnant Parliament, when it should be restored: But after much Debate, that was thought fitter for the Debate of the Parliament than them.

They next confult about some Articles, for the security of themselves and their Friends, and for a Foundation, on which they would oblige their Parliament, to establish the Common-wealth Government.

These Articles being digested into form, and agreed to by the General Council a certain number of the Officers were deputed to meet with Sir Henry Vane, Sir Arthur Haverleg, Mr. Soc. and Major Saltonway, the prime leading men in this Parliament, to consider how they might be disposed to content to them. Vane and those with him had been Treated with Spark; but when they came to publique discourse, they were very deferred in their Answers; yet they gave them hopes of their contents, and of their endeavours to prevail upon others; but said, they could not undertake any previous Agreement, to oblige the Parliament, without their Authority and content, at such time as they were met together.

This caution of theirs was disliked and suspectd by Flettwood, Derbom, and Lamert, but the Inferior Officers were far persuaded in favour of them, that it was not time to contend. They therefore deferred them to use means, to draw as many of the Members as they could together with all convenient haste, because the Government was a kind of Inter-regnum; and the Officers in the mean time drew up a Declaration to invite them to fit, which upon the fith of May was presented to the Speaker by Lamert, with about 13 or 14 Officers of the Army in his Company. The Declaration it selfe we have thought fit to insert, to shew the incontinence of these new Polititians, that so soon altered from what they solemnly declared: The Title was,

A Declaration of the Officers of the Army, inviting the Members of the Long Parliament, who continued fitting till the 20th of April, 1653, to return to the Exercise and Discharge of their Trust.

The Publique Concerns of this Common-wealth, being through a wisdome of Dangers, Deliverances, and Backslidings of many, brought into that state and posture wherein they now stand, and our felvets also contributing thereunto, by wandering divers times from Righteous and equal parts; And although there have been many Effays to abate the Dangers, and to settle the Nations in peace and prosperity, yet all have proved ineffectual: The only wise God, in the course of his Providence, dispossessing all Endavours therein, And also observing to our great Grief, that the good Spirit which formerly appeared among us, in the carrying on of this great work, did daily decline; so as the Good Old Cause it self became a Re-approch: We have been led to look back, and to examine the Cause of the LORD S withdrawing his wonted presence from us, and when we turned out of the way, that through Mercy we might return and give him the Glory.

And amongst other things, calling to mind that the Long Parliament, consisting of those Members who continued their sitting until the 20th of April, 1653, were eminent After- sors of that Cause, and had a special presence of GOD with them, and were Signally blessed in that Work, (the Desires of many good people concurring with ours therein;) we judge it our Duty to invite the aforesaid Members, to return to the Exercise and Discharge of their Trust, as before the said 20th of April 1653.

And therefore we do hereby most earnestly desire the Parliament, consisting of those Members who continued to fit since the Year 1648, until the 20th of April, 1653, to return unto the Exercise and Discharge of their Trust; and we shall be ready in our places, to yeeld them, as becomes us, our utmost Affiance to fit in Safety, for the improving present Opportunities, for settling and securing the Peace and Freedom of the Commonwealth, praying for the Presence and Blessing of God upon their Endeavours.

Signed by the Direction of 6th of May, the Lord Flettwood, and the Council of Officers of the Army.

Thomas Sandford, Secretary.

After the delivery of this, many of the most eminent Members of this Remnant of the Long Parliament, having before consulted with as many of the rest as were in London, came also and gave a Visit to the Speaker, to signify their willingness to return to the Exercise of their Trust, (as they call’d it,) in pursuance of the Invitation given them by the Army, and that they would meet the next morning, which was the 8th of May, at 8 of the Clock in the Painted-Chamber, where they defired his Presence, to accompany them from thence to the Parliament-House, in which he accordingly did, and they all went together, and took their Places, Thus ended the Reign, or rather the Uprisning of the Crowns, being overthrown by those of their nearest Relations, from whom by Intered, they might have expected Support: But such was the Fate of this ill-acquir’d Dominions, to be subverted in its greatest Security, by the Ambition and Malice of those that affisted the Apiters in the obtaining of it.

Rite Upon
The Title was, The Humble Petition and Address of the Officers of the Army, to the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England. The Address itself was in these words following:

Calling to mind the former Declarations of Parl. and the Grounds therein invocing us to take up Arms, and those many signal Providences, wherein the Lord hath owned You, and your Forces both by Sea and Land, in affording that Righteous Cause, wherein the Civil and Religious Liberties of the people of these Nations were involved, so as that all open opposition was beaten down before you; and likewise weighing with our felved how in the several late Changes in Government, that Publick spirit, which appeared in that Work, hath since that time been discouraged, and another rafied up, drawing back to the same things you had contended against, even to the hazarding the essentials of that Cause; We did upon serious thoughts of heart think it our duty once more to appear against those backsliding ways, and Providence having brought the state of Affairs to the condition they were in some few days before your sitting, we found it necessary to assist amongst our selves some of the Fundamentals of our Good Old Cause, with some other things conducing to the Preservation thereof; with a full and fixed resolution, through the assistance of GOD, effectually, even to the hazard of our Lives, to endeavour the Recovery and Security of the same. And the same good Providence holding forth an opportunity to us, to open unto Tom a way for the further disbarage of your remaining Truth in Parliament, we did by our Declaration of this instant May, humbly desire you would be pleased to return to the exercit and disbarage thereof, as before the 2oth of April, 1653. And having to our great rejoicing seen your Declaration of the seventeenth Instant, shewing, that you are resolved through the Gracious assistance of Almighty GOD, to apply your selves to the faithful discharge of the Truth reproved in you; and to endeavour the Settlement of this Commonwealth upon such a Foundation as may assure, establish, and secure the Property and Liberties of the People, in reference unto Irishmen and all Christians; and that without a single Person, Kingship, or House of Peers: And shall vigorously endeavour the carrying on of Information so much desired, and so often declared for; to the end there may be a Godly and Faithful Magistracy and Ministry upheld and maintained in the Nations, in the Glory and Praise of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to the reviving and making glad the Hearts of the upright in the Land.

About four days after the present small Parliament had sate, which was spent in making a Committee of Safety, and dispatching Intelligence of their being re-infated in their former Power, to several of their Members absent in the Country, whom they had not disabused from sitting; the Officers of the Army present themselves with their Petition and Address, a thing they often infitd to have prosecuted, and was one of the occasions that heightened the differences betwixt them and this Parliament.

They publish their intentions by a declaration, the Words of the Declaration, extracted out of the Parliament Journal.

Sir George Booth, Colonel Roffiter, Mr. Prym, and some others, Members of the Commons House of this Parliament, (formerly excluded by the Army) attempted to go into the House, but were all kept back by Adjunt Gen. Allen, except Mr. Prym, who flift in, but they would do nothing; whilst he was amongst them, but adjoined till the after noont and when he again would have entered, he was laid by some Officers of the Army.

The first thing the Remnant Parliament did when they met, after Election of their Officers was the passing a short Declaration, which was ordered to be Printed and Published; in the Cloie whereof they Declare; That they are resolved through the gracious Affiilance of Almighty GOD, to apply themselves to the Faithful discharge of the Truth reproved in them; and to endeavour the Settlement of this Common-wealth upon such a Foundation as may assure, establish and secure the Property and Liberties of the People; in reference unto Irishmen and all Christians; and that without a single Person, Kingsship, or House of Peers: And shall vigorously endeavour the carrying on of Information so much desired, and so often declared for; to the end there may be a Godly and Faithful Magistracy and Ministry upheld and maintained in the Nations, to the Glory and Praise of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to the reviving and making glad the Hearts of the upright in the Land.

The Declaration of the Remnant Parliament, as printed in the London Journal, was as follows:

Sir George Booth, Colonel Rossiter, Mr. Prym, and some others, Members of the Commons House of this Parliament, (formerly excluded by the Army) attempted to go into the House, but were all kept back by Adjunt Gen. Allen, except Mr. Prym, who flift in, but they would do nothing; whilst he was amongst them, but adjoined till the after noont and when he again would have entered, he was laid by some Officers of the Army.

1. That the Liberty of the Persons, and Property of the Estates of all free people of these Nations, be maintained, preferred, and kept inviolable according to Law, under the Government of a Free State and Common-wealth, without a Single Person, Kingship, or House of Peers.

2. That there may be such a just and due Regulation of Law, and Courts of Justice and Equity, as that they may be a Protection, and not vexatious or oppressive to the people of these Nations.

3. That by an Act of Obligation, all and every person and persons who have since the 19th. of April, 1653; mediatly or immediately advised, acted, or done any matter or thing whatsoever, in reference to the several Changes or Alterations in the Government of these Nations since the said 19th. of April, 1653, or in order to the Publick Service, Peace, or Safety of these Nations, be indemnified and saved harmless, to all intents and purposes whatsoever.

4. That all Laws, Ordinances, Declarations, and Establishments made in the several Changes and Alterations of Government, that have been in these Nations since the 19th. of April aforesaid, and not as yet particularly repealed, be deemed good in Law, until particularly repealed.

5. That such Debts as have been contracted for the publick service and affairs of this Common-wealth, and for the Charges of the Government, since the 20th. of April, 1653, be carefully paid and satisfied.

6. That all persons who profess Faith in God the Father, and in Jesus Christ his Eternal Son the true God, and in the Holy Spirit, God Co-equal with the Father & the Son, one God blessed for ever, and do acknowledge the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament to be the revealed or Written Word or Will of God, shall not be restrained from their Profession, but have due encouragement and equal protection in the profession of their Faith and exercise of Religion, whilst they abuse not their Liberty to the civil injury of others, or disturbance of others in their way of Worship: So that this Liberty be not extended to Popery or Prelatry, nor to such as shall practice or hold forth Licentiousness or prophanenes under the profession of Religion: And that all Laws, Statutes, Ordinances, and Clauses in any Laws, Statutes, or Ordinances to the contrary, may be declared null, and void.

7. That a Godly, Faithful and Painful Gospel-Preaching Ministry be every where encouraged, countenanced, and maintained.

8. That the Universities and Schools of Learning be so countenanced and reform'd, as that they may become the Nurseries of Piety and Learning.

9. That such persons as have at any time since the 20th. of May, 1642, aided, or assisted or adhered to the late King Charles Stuarts his Son, or any other person or persons whatsoever of that Party, against the Parliament or Common-wealth of England, and all other persons whatsoever that have made use of any Authority or Power under pretence of Law, or otherwise, to deprive or abridge any of the good People of these Nations of their Christian Liberty, or have or shall express themselves in any way mockers, scoffers, or revilers of Godliness, or of the professors thereof, or are other waisies scandalous or loose in their conversations, or have not given good satisfaction of their affection and faithfulness to this Cause, may be speedily removed out of all places of Power or Trust in the Magistracy, or other management of the Publick Affairs of these Nations, and that no such persons may be admitted unto any such Place of Power or Trust for the future:

10. And forasmuch as no godly or other good Interest can be preferred, or maintained, unless the persons, who are chiefly 1639. chiefly intrusted with the management and exercise of the Government, be of suitable spirits to those Interests. That those who are or shall be intrusted therein, be such persons as shall be found to be most eminent for Godliness, faithfulness, and constancy to the good Cause and Interests of those Nations.

11. That to the end the Legislative Authority of this Common-wealth may not by their long sitting become burthen-some or inconvenient, there may be effectual Provision made for a due Succession thereof.

12. And for the better satisfaction, and more firm Union of the Forces of this Common-wealth, in this juncture of Affairs, for preserving and maintaining the Principles and other matters thereto subvient: We do unanimously acknowledge and own the Lord Charles Flettwood Lieutenant General of the Army, to be Commander in Chief of the Land-Forces of this Common-wealth.

13. That in order to the establishing and securing the Peace, Welfare, and Freedom of the People of these Nations for the ends before expressed, the Legislative power thereof may be in a Representative of the People, consisting of a House successively chosen by the People in such way and manner as this Parliament shall judge meet, and of a felected Senate, Co-ordinate in Power, of able and faithful persons, eminent for Godliness, and such as continue adhering to this Cause.

14. That the administration of all Executive Power of Government, may be in a Council of State, consisting of a convenient number of Persons qualified in all respects as aforesaid.

15. That all Debts Contracted by his late Hignetty, or his Father, since the 15th of December 1653, may be satisfied, and that an honourable Revenue of Ten thousand pounds per annum, with a convenient House, may be setled upon him, and his Heirs for ever; and Ten thou-

This Petition was presented by Lambert the 13th day of May, accompanied with Deflorim and Barked, the Lieutenant of the Tower, with 13 other Colonels and 12 Lieutenant Colonels, we find entered in the Parliament Journal the words which Lambert spake at the delivery of it, which were these:

Mr. Speaker,

We are Commanded by the Officers of the Army, to present before you their Humble Petition and Address; there are several things contained in it, which have been a long time upon their hands, and no visible way of redress: Finding to their great Joy and Satisfaction, that you are Returned; In discharge of their Trust, they thought it not fit to neglect this opportunity, but have Commanded us to present this Petition.

When he had said these words, he withdrew, with those that were with him; and the House upon Debate Ordered their Speaker to return them the following Answer: Which is likewise entered in the Journal of that Days Proceedings.
A Schedule of his Debts was annexed to this Paper: what was contracted for the Funeral of his Father, they absolutely rejected, and made flow Proffreg in the ret, and delisted to settle any Revenue upon him or his Mother, as was desired; but gave him two thousand pounds to discharge part of his own private debts, and required him, and all his Dependents, to remove from White-Hall in fix days. Fleetwood discovered a little difcomfort at this contempt put upon his Brother Cromwell, and that Family; but as soon as it was ordered that he should be Commander in chief of all the Armies and Land Forces in England, Scotland, and Ireland, for one year, in compliance with the twelfth Article of the Articles Petition and Address, he was left fcificious in the concernments of his Wires Family: when the Houfe voted he should command the Armies, they likewise voted, he should have power to Sign and Seal such Commissions, for the Conftitution of Officers under him, as should be approved by the Parliament, and nominated by Sir Henry Vane, Sir Arthur Hefterig, Lieutenant General Fleetwood, and the Colonels, Lambert, Dobson, Ludlow, and Berry, or the major part of them, who were made Commissioners for that purpose. And for his better Eftablifhment, they directed a Bill to be prepared and brought into the Houfe to be paflèd into an Act for his conftitution: Which was done accordingly; but upon the second reading of it, they would not admit of that clause, to authorize him to Sign Commissions, but Ordered, That all Commissions, under the Commission of Officers of the Army, and the Council of Cftipations, fhould be Signed by the Speaker of the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England, to be written by the Clerks attending the Council of State, and delivered to the Officers gratis, by the Speaker in the Parliament Houfe. They also at the same time, Ordered, That the Government of Ireland fhould be in Commissioners nominated and appointed by Parliament, and not by one Person, and that Colonel Henry Cromwell should be acquainted with the Order, and required forthwith to repair to the Parliament. This Gentleman had made himself very popular in Ireland, in his Government of that Kingdom, under his Father, and his Brother; but in regard there was a Council co-ordinate with him in civil matters, many of the members whereof were of severe and rigid behaviour, the generality of his disposition was fomewhat over-rulled; nevertheless, molt people in diftrefus there did receive with fuch effects of his authority, where he had any manner of capacity to fhew it. This they acknowledged he deferred to have been the Son of a better Father.

He had the Jift Army under good Discipli- ne, and was fo well beloved of the Officers, that it is probable he would not have contented to the change of Government, if he had had time to prepare again it; For his Brother gave him no intimation of what had happened, nor any Commands to appear on his behalf; what he had heard, being only from the intelligence of private Friends. At the firft Alarm, he advised with his Confederates what to do, and to prevent Confederacies against him, by any Combinations of the Officers of his Army, he Siff commanded.
commanded all of them to their charges, and (to use his own words) not to braken to any design of innovation, how specially fower the same might be presented to them. Likewise he dispatched Cornef Monck to Scotland to General Monck, (who came thither not till fifteen days after the alteration of Government) to inform himself how he and his Army fuddly a fect to it, who returned no other answer than a Copy of the Letters the Officers of his Army had obliged him to fend to the Parliament.

In all probability, if Colonel Henry Crome well had drawn his Army together, and fixed them to his Authority, and then declared against their proceedings at London, he might have shaken much the new foundation of the Common-wealth; for the Armies in England and Scotland were not then modelled, and the Officers many of them (as hath been faid) relations or dependents of the Family of the Crome wells; but he was fo doubtful of the success that he undertook nothing, but peaceably submitted, as his Brother had done, (though in more generous terms) to the Authority then introduced.

We purposely omit many particulars of these transactions, and others in the Journals of the Parliament, as their constitution of a Council of State, for the more immediate executive power of the Common-wealth, the Nomination of Judges, Commissioners of the Great Seal, and Commissioners for the Admiralty, and Government of the Navy, and Colonel Henry Crome well's Letter to the Parliament, when submitted to it, as not very effentially pertinent to this History.

Fleetwood and his Friends were troubled at the restriction of his Commission, yet he dis fembled his passion, and yielded to necessity, till a more favourable conjunction might give him opportunity to enlarge his power: however, both he, De burrow, Lambert, and many of them were dissatisfied with the way of receiving their Commissions from the hands of the Speaker, and would have remonstrated against it; but by enquiring into the temper of the inferior Officers, they found them well enough affected towards it, and therefore did not proceed for that time. And Fleetwood himfelf to diffemble his acquiescence with great submiffion, and Proclamation of Obedience to the Parliament, received his Commission in the Houfe, from the hands of the Speaker, and after him Lambert, De burrow, Berry, Ludlow, Sydenham, alluff about London, who had Commands in the Army.

The Parliament now became confident of its Power, and meditated to fubject the Army wholly to it (which made them jealous of each other.) Although all the Armies and Navy had declared their concurrence in obedience to them; yet they displaced thofe Officers in both, whom they fuddly affected to Cromwell, or Monarchical Government. The seven Commissioners before named, to whom the nomination of the Officers of the Army was first committed, were continued in that Authority, and very active in it. Thofe of the Anabaptift persuasion, were by them esteemed moft firm to a Common wealth, and by their information they were much guided in the difposition of Places; but where any had been put out by Cromwell, for difsatisfaction to him, they were reftored as of course. Colonel Lackart, the Governor of Dunkirk, had made his submiffion; but shortly after, there was a desperate Mutiny in the Garrison, at ftrict fuddly to be for the King, but it was quickly appeased, and found to be otherwise. And the better to regulate affairs there, and quiet the place, Lieutenant Colonel Piffon, Colonel Afflefield, and Colonel Parker, were forthwith sent over. Thus all things proceeded fortunately to them. Embaffadors from all parts making h alf to congratulate the felicity of their Government.

The Embaffadors from the United Provinces, was prepared with his Credentials for Audience within a fortnight after the first beginning of this New Common-wealth, and at his Audience, in the name of his Masters, he made a more than ordinary Profession of Amity, and desife of Unity and Confederacy with them. The Commissioners, who had that in charge, made great dispatch both in Modelling the Army and Navy. Piffon and Manfon, two Anabaptifts, Lieutenant Colonels under General Monck, undertoock to know so well the Army in Scotland, that their information was much credited in the settling of it, and to weaken Monck's power, they had designed to remove thofe he moft trusted, and put others of their own Creatures into their places. Of all these pacflages the General had very good Intelligence, his Agent Charges not omitting to acquaint him with all that befpeak'd with these Commissioners. And after a while, he took publick notice of it in a Letter to the Houfe, in which, among other Expressions, he told them he had heard of their intentions to displace many of his Officers, which he conceived they did not from any knowledge they had of their Persons or Qualifications, but the informations of others; and that he thought himfelf as ficit to be credited in that matter as any, and did affure them, they were all good men, and for whole fidelity and good behaviour he would be engaged.

This Letter put a little flop to their Care, but did not divert their Resolutions: yet to give him fome satisfaction, they fent him back word, they would be very careful in the placing or displacing of his Officers, and that in his opinion the Houfe of Poore, there should be no alteration, till fuch time as they were confulted in it. Monck was not fatisfied with their Answer, but privately advifed some of thofe Officers, whom he heard they would put from their Commands, to go to London, to folicite their own concerns, and as much as they could obftruct and retard the proceedings of the Committee. That which was of moft advantage to the prefervation of his Officers, was an Order made, That such Officers as were new Constituted for Scotland or Ireland, because they could not come to the Parliament to take their Commissions, should receive them from fuch Commissioners as should be appointed for the Civil Government of thofe Kingdoms.
The first Riting was to be of such as had never engaged on the Kings side in the late Wars, thereby to draw the Army to less opposition; for the Declaration had no mention of his Majestie, but was called, The Declaration of the Lords, Gentlemen, and Citizens, Freeholders and others, in this most happy Nation. The words of it were these:

Since he hath pleased Almighty God to suffer the Spirit of Divinity to continue in this distressed Nation, and to leave its without any settled Foundation of Religion, Liberty, and Propriety, the Legislative Power usurped, at pleasure, and continued; The Army resolved at first for our Defence assured, and miffed into unwarrantable Actions by the Cunning and Ambition of some of the Superior Officers; No face of Government appearing either in any single Person, or a Body of men in Council lawfully Conjoined, to whom the Grievances of the People may with any probability of Success be properly addressed. Therefore we being Considered of our Duty, and sensible of our own and the Nations Ruins, if these Disfractions continue, or if in a more fixed topposition by some Settlement inconsistent with the Laws, Peace, and Interest of these Nations, have taken Arms in Defence of our Fortunes, and all others who will partake with us in the Vindication and Maintenance of the Freedom of Parliament against all Violence whatsoever, of the known Laws, Liberty, and Property of the Good People of this Nation, who at present groan under illegal, arbitrary, and insupportable Taxes and Payments unknown to our Ancestors. This being our Duty to GOD and to Man, and our only Design, We cannot defpare of the Blessing of Him who gave Victory; nor of the cheerful concurrence of all good People, nor of the undiverted part of the Army, whose Arrears and Increas of future Pay, and Advancement of high Command, We shall, by all means procure, suffering no Imposition of force on any mans Conscience; and to this We doubt not but all honest Englishmen will say, Amen, Amen.

But yet many of the Kings Friends in all parts were to bring in their Aids, Colonel Richard Arundel and Trelorey undertook, at his Majesties demand, to bring five hundred Horse into Cornwall, and Arms for as many more, they would raise the other five hundred: And Major General Egerton did as much in Staffordshire; and many others in other Parts. The Preparation could not be expeditied with that haste as was intended, so that the day of Riting was deferred to the Friday of August, and Mr. Copper was lent by Mr. Mordant to his Majestie, to acquaint him with it; who was so soon dispatch'd, that he returned in five days to those that sent him, to let them know, his Majestie would be present with them in short time. With him Colonel Roger Whitley came into England, with some verbal Instructions to Sir George Booth, and some blank Commissions to dispose in Lancashire, Cheshire, and Flintshire; He laid no longer in London, than to receive Mr. Mordant's Commands, and some of the forementioned Declaration to carry with him to Booth. Captains Titus was sent to the King, to let him know all was ready: His Majestie
King CHARLES the Second.

The Duke of York left Lodlow from Berda.

The main of the Design prevented by diffculty.

The most considerable Body that got together was under Sir George Booth, who with the Earl of Derby, the Lord Killantrry, and Major General Egerton were met at the time appointed at Warrington, at first with a small Party; but they having the very Flower of the Grentry and Gallantry engaged among them, their numbers encreased every minute: Colonel Roger Whitley delivered his Message to Sir George from his Majesty, and the Declarations he had received from the Lord Mardan, with an Account of his Majesties Preparations beyond the Seas, and his readinesse to come over upon the first notice; which was no small Satisfaction and Joy to the whole Party, which then conjoined of about Five hundred Men. The first thing they resolved, was to march towards Chester: and the first night they marched thither was with part of the Town, but the Castle was defended against them by Colonel the Governor thereof for the Parliament, who had one Company it. The next day Major General Egerton was sent with a Party to Chirk-Castle, where Sir Thomas Middleton hearing of his approach, opened the Gates, and joyfully received him. The next day he went with them to Wrexham, (having left his Son to Command the Castle for the King) and there many came in to them. The next day after, Colonel Whitley was sent with a Party to put a Garrison into Hardinge Castle in Flintshire, which was newly left by a Party of the Parliament Soldiers that marched from thence to Denbigh Castle their next Garrison, but were feized by the Country, and brought prisoners to Sir George Booth's Party. Colonel Ireland at the same time declared for them in Liverpool, and Mr. Brocks, one of the Members of the House of Commons, willing to expatiate his fortune, and join in the Transactions of the Trained Bands, Troops, or Companies, was to be approved in Parliament; and they had privately laid a contrivance to have Soldiers at most of the Railing of the Kings Friends all over England: So that their accidental intercepting of the Lady Mary Howard, Letter by the officious diligence of a Pott-Master, was rather a service than a disadvantage to his Majesty, since thereby his coming to England, which might have expost his Person to inevitable Peril, was prevented. Notice of this discovery could not be soon enough diffused to prevent the appearance of many Gentlemen in divers Parts. The Earl of Leichfield, with Sir Adam Brown, my Lord Mardan, (to whom wee illature, in regard he here first declared having received the Dignity of Vicount) and about twenty other Persons I understood wrote to Stafford in Surrey, but by the order of the taking of Sir Francis Vincent an active Servant of the Kings, there was no little appearance, that all divided to shite for themselves. The Earl of Lichfield and my Lord Mardan came diffused by Water in the Common Barg from Chester to London, and got private
SIR,

I cannot think you will find it ill, for you have no reason to do so; and the good I expect from you, will bring so great a benefit to your Country, and to your self, that I cannot think you will decline my Interest. The Person who gives or sends this to you, had Authority to say much to you from me; and if you once refuse to take my Interest to heart, I will leave the way and manner of declaring it intirely to your own Judgment; and will comply with the Advice you shall give me. The rest I refer to the person who conveys this to you; and it is in your power to make me, as kind to you, as you can desire, and to have me always your affectionate Friend,

The other was to Sir John Greenwill of the same date, in these words; PR.

I am confident that George Monk can have no Malice in his Heart against me; nor hath he done any thing against me which I cannot easily pardon; and it is in his power to do me so great Service, that I cannot easily Reward, but I will do all I can; and I do Authorize you to Treat with him, and not only to affume of his Kindnes, but that I will very liberally Reward him with such an Estate in Land, and such a Title of Honour as himself shall desire, if he will declare for me, and adhere to my Interest: And whatsoever you shall promise to him on my behalf, or whatever be, or you by his Advice, shall promise to any of his Officers, or the Army under his Command (which Command he shall still keep) I will make good and perform upon the Word of a King.

CHARLES R.
Worcester, Colonel Barrow, Captain Glynford, and others of the King's Friends, they would have got together above three thousand men, Ministers and others, out of the Forest of Dean, and from about Stroud-Water, and other places. There was in Gloucester a Troop of the Army Horse under one Dale, and a Militia Troop commanded by one Crofts, who upon this Discovery caused three hundred Foot to be presently raised, and sent a Party of Horse to take the Lord Herdly, Maffey, Barrow, and Glynford: They took the Lord Herdly and brought him to Gloucester; Barrow and Glynford defended themselves in Barrow's House, and upon Parol, to render themselves at Gloucester, were not taken. Maffey and his Servant being taken Prisoners, Maffey himself was set on a Horse, and a good stout Trooper set behind him, to hold him in his Arms, two rode on each side, and some Troopers before his Horse, and others behind: It was about the close of the Night, the Evening being very dark, and the Weather fumeous with Rain and Hail, infomuch, that when they were going down a very steep Hill by Nimsfield-Road, about ten miles from Gloucester, the way to Bath, Maffey's Horse, with the man that rode behind him, fell headlong altogether, and tumbled down that steep Hill, whereby it hapned that the Fellow let go his hold, and most of the rest also; so that all the Prisoners, except the Lord Herdly, and Maffey's Servant, escaped.

The Parliament sent to Dunkirk for three Regiments to strengthen the Army; and Colonel Zanyh brought out of Ireland his Regiment of Horse, and Axels's Regiment of Foot, which landing at Angelsey, marched to join with Lambert, who at his first march from London, had not above 1500, but by Conjunction of several Troops and Companies that met him, enabled to secure about 3000 men. Sir George Booth had not the half the number, and those he had were without any Order or Discipline, because many of them, being Noblemen and Gentlemen of Quality, were not without great Emulation, every one aspiring to Command, whilst no body obeyed; Sir George Booth having intelligence of Lambert drawing near to him, thought to have got a days march before him into Lancashire, to have increased his Numbers; and to gain time, he and Sir Thomas Middleton sent a Trumpeter, with two Minifters, to shew the ground of their retiring an Army, and desired a Treaty, to have effusion of blood: To which Lambert agreed, on condition they would first lay down their Arms, and surrender to him the Garrison in their power. To this there was no Reply; but some of Lambert's men preferred to hard the next morning upon Booth, that at a Bridge near Northwich, a sharp Encounter was made between the Forces of each Party. The Boothians, with much courage, defended the Pails, till they were overpowered by Numbers. Captain Morris, a gallant Loyal Gentleman, was killed, and some few others of Booth's Party; of Lambert's very few fell, and those that did of no great Note; all the vanquished dispersed themselves, Sir George Booth and Sir Thomas Middleton got away. The Lord Kilmany, Brooks, Major General Egerton, Sir William Onslow, and others, were taken Prisoners, and all the Garrison immediately submitted to Lambert.

Sir George, although he had the good Fortune at that time to escape, was not long free, being seized at Newport-Peniel, in a Disguise, as he was riding towards London, in order to his Transportation into some Foreign Part.

The Curious that made Remarks on this generous Undertaking, as commonly wiser in the Diffcource than Execution of any great Design, did much cenсуд the Conduct of it. They said, that they had many Opportunities to have ruined their Enemies, but omitted all; That Colonel Zancly, from Ireland landing in Anglesey, might have been met, and with good Probability of Success fought with ere he could have join'd with Lambert, they being with all their Strength, to bewitch him and them; and that Colonel Lilliput, who was gathering men together in York-shire, might easily, by a small Force from Lancaster, have been broken, and hindered in his Levies; and that many other little Parties, which in small numbers came from several Parts, might have been met and dispersed, before they united; and that one Blow given to any one of them, would have added so much to their Reputation, that it might have brought great Accectisons to their Party. Others (and perhaps with good Reason) were of Opinion, that nothing was more Detructive to his Majesty, than these Plots and Contrivances of Riling for him; and that the best Rebellion he could have taken, since the end of the first war, was to have fate in Expecification of some favourable Advantage to himself from the Division of his Enemies; for what could now raise men do against experienced and successful Soldiers of a Nation where the late King with all hisStrength could not prevail, Parties could less expect to conquer; and indeed, the Event manifested the Truth of this Reasoning, for the Consequence of these Plots, was no other than the Ruine of many of the Estates of Noblemen and Gentlemen, the loss of some of their Lives, and the Deprievion of the Spirits of the rest; besides, an occasion of strengthening the Army so much the more, and giving their Party plausible Pretenfes, to infer a Necessity for their continuance, and to levy Taxes on the People for their Maintenance, and unite and fix them the more against his Majesty. But nevertheless, the generality of those noble Percions (to particularize any of them in a more eminent manner than the rest would be to injure all) cannot be enough commended, since they valued no hazard, in respect of their Duty to their Sovereign, and the Vindication of the Laws and Liberty of their Country, and have left such an Example of Loyalty to their Posterity, as we hope will be maintained, as long as the Fame of their Virtues and Honour shall endure.

General Monk in Scotland, was so much preceded upon, by the report of Sir George Booth's prosperous Success in his Enterprise, and the Importance of his Brother Nich. Monk, that he resolved to march into England, in pursuance sonce of Booth's Declaration, which was very fu-table to his own Inclinations.

He consulted in this Matter, besides his Brother, only Major Ralph Knights, Major of his own Regiment of Horie, Captain Jeremiah Smith likewise of his own Regiment,
Dr. Samuel Bunow Physician to the Army,
Dr. John Price his Chaplain, and Dr. Thomas Grainger Chaplain to the Council of Scotland, in regard he had many Sedition Officers in his Army, who were Spies upon all his Ac-ings, and therefore was obliged to be very wary and circumspect in his Proceedings; insomuch, that when Colonel Atkins, a Royalift of his antient Acquaintance, came into Scotland to him, about the same Errand that his Brother did, Monk (for fear of waking the Jealousy of the Factions about him) durft not shew him any Countenance or Respect, but rather the contrary, sending him away somewhat discouraged: When all was ready for his March, and a Declaration to that end prepared,
he demurred for two days, upon the stop of the English Packet, in expectation of Intelligence from his Agent Clarke, from whom he days after received the fatal News of the Defeat of Sir George Booth.

The King being still at St. Malo's in preparations of a Veetol to transport him into England, had the first Notice of these Misfortunes from Mr. Brett, an English GentilUMan Monk, which in a while after was confirmed to him by the Marquefs of Ormonde, who came to him from Paris, with Particulars of it: The King (always preffent to himself in the most diffcult Accidents of his Life) discovered not much alteration at this, though it seemed a Cross that might very well no less sensibly affect him, than what ever had yet happeft to him improperous, and giving Check to his Fortune; became hereby all his hopes became desperate,
of his being ever retoreft to his Subjects, without fuch foreign Force, as fhould be able to afford Affiance and Supply to their Endeavours for him, by holding his Enemies fo long in Play, till by accettion of his Friends, they might be strong enough to reft their great Efforts, or at leaft to try the others; Even in this Reflection, he had many Doubts in his Mind, for that many late Succeffes of the English in Flanders, had made them feem imminent to thofe, from whom his Majesty was to expect Affiance. But fince nothing now but Foreign Aid could viably raise his Hopes, he refolved ferioufly to apply himself to the Treaty now in Agitation upon the Borders between France and Spain, about a Peace betwixt thofe two Crowns, which was managed by Cardinal Mazarini, and Don Lewis d'Hera, the two chief Miniflers of the two Kings; to which his Majesty had an Eye long time, not doubting but he fhould be in fo much meare comprehended in it, fo as to receive Affiance from thofe Princes his Allies, as soon as they fhould be free from their Embarrafisments; and in protection hereby, he had commanded Sir Henry Bennet, a Perfon of great Prudence and Ad-minifter of the Diftrefs during the Diftrifus in Spain, not to fail to attend Don Lewis d' Hera to the Tre-ty, and be prefent there to negotiate his Affairs. The Treaty being near Conclusion, his Majefly, for fear it fhould be ended before he came thither, made all possible haft to repair to thofe Parts; and in orderthereunto, took his Journey forthwith from St. Malo's to Rimés, where he met Sir George Carteret, and after fome Small Ray with him, went thence to Namis, and there his Company divided, till they met again at St. Ouen; from thence he went by the Paffage of Orleans, over the Pyreuan Hills, to Saragofs, the chief City in Araign, and there he continued eight or nine days, and difpatched Mr. Oatley to Fontarabia, to inform himfelf of what paffed at the Treaty; who, when he came thither, after fome Conference with Bennet, they agreed to haft away Mr. William Dunnan, an Irish Gentleman, to the King, to let him know, the Treaty was prolonged, and that his Prefence would very much quicken and advance his Affairs. His Majefly then immediately hafting by Poll to the Treaty, continued incrédulity (as he had done all this Journey) till he came within three Leagues of Fontarabia, where he was attended by Bennet with Coaches, to aug-mint his Equipage; and from thence he refumed his State, and went in Publick.

He was met by the Baron of Batterville, a Perfon of great Honour and Civility (Gour-fon of Fontarabia) with a Troop of Horse, and a mile and a half without the Town; and when he came near it, all the Guns were difcharg'd, and Don Lewis himfelf met him within the Gate. During his Stay there, he was enterained in as splendid a manner as the Time and place would handomely admit. And during the Treaty, he had frequent Conferences with Don Lewis d' Hera, and was every day viti-ed by him.

The Governing Power in England employed
the fame time to attend on Cardinal Mazarini at this Treaty, and to promote their Concerns, Lockart, who had continued ever since Oliver's Death Byad Extrordinary Embalfladour
in France. The Cardinal lay at St. John de Luxe, the nearest Town to Spain, on the French Borders, where he fhewed to much Countre-ministerial Command and Refpeét, but in the King thought it not decent to give him a Vifit; but he received many from others of the French Nobility.

General Monk was inwardly very much troubled at these Diffifters; and the more, because he found himself every day more and more incapable to remedy them: For the House displac'd Colonel Daniel, the Governor of St. Johnfen, and many other Officers whom he much trusted, and were about to remove the ret: fo that fetting which way things were likely to tend, and thinking it better to reign of his own accord, than to be worm'd out of his Command, or at least remain but like the Image of a General, and serve only for a property to other Men Delights, he sent a Letter upon the Third of September, to Lenthall the Speaker, to be communicated to the Parliament, to defire a Divifion from his Command; pretending, That he was inform'd in his Health, and had long continued in that remote Country; And therefore requesting, now that all Inferfions,
Infuriations, which threatened Disobedience to the Peace of the Nations, were delayed, he might be permitted to return into his own Country, to end his days in quiet.

This Letter, though it was not sent to Clarges to be delivered, as usually all his Packets were, because he suspected he would have opposed that Resolution of his, and been very backward in delivering the other; yet Mr. Nicholas Man was furnished him Instruction of it, and the Matter was so ordered, that the Letter came to his hands, and by him delivered to the Speaker, with whom he dealt so effectually, that he agreed to delay the offering it to be read for ten days, till a Packet came from Scotland to contradict it: Yet Clarges was put to great perplexity in this Business, for some, Salisbury, and those that affected not, or suspected the General (having private Advice of this Letter) often call'd to have it read; and had not earnest and dextrous prevention been used to divert the House with other Business, by some that loved the General well, and were prepared by Clarges; he had by this Despondency rendered himself incapable of doing that, for which he seemed by Providence especially chosen and marked out.

The Defeat of Sir George Booth and his Party, heightened much the Spirits of the chief Officers of the Army, who began now to contrive how to restore the Military Power to its former Greatness, which was somewhat of late leften by the Parliament, and in Delineation to be wholly subject to them. To effect this, there was a strict and permanent Correspondence held between some of the Officers at London, and Lambert, and thofe with him in Lambeth, Chelsea, and Parts adjacent. The Difficulty was, how to ingage the inferior Officers (who were somewhat affected with their immediate Dependence on the House, by receiving Commissions from the Hands of the Speaker) to obviate this. It was advised, to attempt no thing at the General-Council of Officers in London: but to begin with thofe of Lambert's Brigade, as most exalted by their late good Fortune, and therefore apter to be seduced by any plausible Advantages of Power. These therefore were all confered, to the number of Fifty, at Derby, the 6th of September. The first thing on which they began their Debate was the Constitution of the Army; the Unity, Discipline, and Conduct whereof, they said was invaded by a Party of Neuters and Malignants: They complained of several Mifcarriages in the Civil Administrations of Government, and of the Inactivity and Backwardness of Persons in Authority and Trust in the Counties, and the Defection of many Corporations, both which appeared in the time of the late Insurrection. They also seemed much to resent the Parliament unwillingness to prosecute the Proposals of the Army at their first sitting, as an Expedient for Settlement, with many other things of like Concernment. These things were artificially imputed into the Minds of the inferior Officers, who were easily enough drawn to Opinion of their own Power, and to think themselves qualified to give Laws to all but themselves.

However, thefe Matters were at firft only Treated of in Generals. It being moved and agreed, that Colonel Zouch, Colonel Michel, Major Creed, and some few others, should meet as Committees for the red, to reduce them into Form, which was accordingly done. Lambert himself went privately to London, and Lieutenant-Colonel Duckfield, a great Creature in the Administration, was appointed to acquaint the General Council of Officers with these Proceedings; and shortly after the whole Matter being Digested into the Form of a Petition, was sent up in a Letter inclosed to Colonel Affield, Colonel Cobbold, and Duckfield; by whom, or any one, or more of them, it was to be delivered to Fleetwood, to be communicated to the General Council of Officers: And at the same time, when this was sent to London, an Officer was dispatched with a Duplicate of it to General Monk, and a Letter with it, to define his Concurrence, and that the Officers of his Army might join with them: which Letter was subscribed by fourteen of the chief Officers employed under Lambert.

Sir Arthur Haslrig had secret Intimation of thefe Consultations at Derby; and the next day after the Petition came to London, which was on the 2d of September, he moved the Parliament, at their first Sitting, against it, explaining with much earnestness against the Officers of the Army, who (he said) were attempting alterations in the Government, to the resting up a Single Person over them.

This put the House into a Jealoufie of Lambert; to whom, in their private Discourses, they attributed the whole Conyrvance; and though he outwardly appeared passive in it, they said he aspired to succeed Cromwell: And because it was not yet time to effect his purpose in his own Person, he would set up Fleetwood to be General of the Armies in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and establish himself in the next Command to him, to be thereby able, with less Envy, to compass his Ends. For Fleetwood, they said, was of an easy Nature, and would be contented with the Name of General, allowing Lambert the Power of it, till he should find a fair Occasion, to assume it in his own Right; and when he should have got the Sword, he would not forsake the Sceptor. Fleetwood confessed he had the Copy of a Petition laying such an Imputation on the Officers of the Army, and endeavoured to justify their Innocence, as intending nothing less than what was alleged; but all he said could not allay the heat raised by Haslrigs infomuch, that they Ordered, That Affield, Cobbold, and Duckfield, whom he affected to have the Original in their hands, should that afternoon attend the House with it, and appointed Fleetwood to give them notice thereof, and to bring with him the Copy he had. Monk made no Progress in Scotland in this Affair, nor did he think fit to call together his Officers about it; but some of them that were Andropigii at Arms, privately to get Subscriptions, till they heard of the fierce Reflection that was made upon it by the House: Whom in the Afternoon, noon, the three Officers mentioned attended with their Petition; And because it was That, on which the chief Foundation was laid of that difference between the Remnant Parliament and Army, which Ended in the Disaffection of both, and was never yet Pruned, We have thought it material enough to be here word for word inferred.

To the Supreme Authority of these Nations, the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England, &c.

The Humble Petition and Proposals of the Officers under the Command of the Right Honourable the Lord Lumberland in the late Northern Expedition.

HUMBLY SWEETH.

That whereas we, with others who desire to fear the Lord in these Nations (though by our provocation we were ripe for destruction) have been again faced by the Lord, and have had a late view of his appearance as of old; in the beholding of whose gracious Footsteps, as we cannot but rejoice, so our souls tremble, left the fruit of all (which the Lord may expect, and his People long earnestly for) become abortive now in the day of our deliverance: We therefore present unto your Honours Consideration these ensuing Proposals, which we humbly lay before you:

1. That the Humble Petition and Address of the General Council of Officers at Walthamford-House to the Parliament, which was so unanimously and cheerfully agreed to, and approved of, in a day of our greatest Confusions, may be laid aside, but may have fresh life given unto it; It being upon further and clearer grounds, fill upon our hearts, as the best and only Expedient yet offered (notwithstanding many Effays) to a happy and durable Settlement, being a fixed and firm Fence and Boundary (under God) for the securing the Civil and Spiritual Liberties which the Spirit of the Nation is unacquainted in travel, not only to invade, but upon every opportunity (as We have often seen, and lately had a clear evidence of) it ready to attempt the ruin and deftruction of the same.

2. That whereas God having given a spirit to the Army fixed and faithful to the Interest of his People, and Our good Cause; when many who had been Friends were either Apologists, Malignants, or Neuters, joining with the old Enemy, leaving the Parliament and Army, and their few allies, Friends singly to confide with their late difficulties; And having now no such hopeful signs like to prevail to ruin and frustrate what we have so long contested for, as by working Divisions in the Army, making breaches, beguiling misunderstandings, and dividing its Unity, wherein, under God, its greatest strength lies: We do therefore, as the most effectual means for the maintaining the Discipline and Conformity thereof, and preserving its Unity inviolable, Humbly Propose, That his Excellency the Lord Fleetwood may be settled Commander in Chief of the Armies (his Commission expiring within a few Months;) that the Lord Lambett be the General Officer and Chief Commander of the Army next, and under him; And also, that the Lord Desborough be the Chief Officer of the Horse under them: And that General Monk be the Chief Officer and Commander of the Infantry: They being all Persons under whose Conduct, Courage, and Fidelity, We have had Eminent Success, Victory, and Deliverance, in the days of greatest Straights, and have been signal blessed and owned by the Lord; to whom, and not to Man, be the Honour of all.

3. That having had very sad experience of a grand Apostatising spirit gone through the Nations, and among so many of those who were intrusted for the Safety thereof, very few sitting or appearing in several Counters, for the preventing the Plots, and suppressing the power of the Enemy in the late Rebellion Design, and many others not only flattering, but falling in with them, whereby a total risen was threatened, and had been effectted, had not the Lord in Mercy prevented: We therefore humbly Propose, That there may be a diligent Enquiry in all parts, by faithful men implored to that purpose, what intrusted Persons have been guilty of any Contra-vision, and allied against the Common-wealth-Interest, and that they may be proceeded against accordingly. And likewise what Persons upon wicked Purposes have been Neutral in such a distressed Day, when their Assistance, according to their Impeachment and Confessions, would have been not less useful than seducible; and that all such may be removed from their Places and Impeachment, Civil and Military; and that such who on the contrary in this juncture of the dissembled Affairs, declared their owning of this Interest, either in the County Troops, or Militia Volunteers, or otherwise, may be looked on as Friends, encouraged, assisted their Arrears, protected from Injuries, countenanced by you, and as they are exhorted, invested with Authority in their several Countries.

4. That in the late Infurbreions, some considerable Corporations have not only sided, abett'd, and countenanced the Enemies Design, but have also made use of the Arms lodged with them, and themselves appeared in the Rebellion, willingly receiving the numerous accession of all engaged therein: Therefore We humbly Propose, That such Corporations may be disinterested, and that you would be pleased to give your Signal mark of disapprobation against them; As also for the future, so to regulate Corporations, That such Persons well Qualified according to the Government of a well Considerted Common-wealth may be intrusted with Authority of Magistracy in every of the several Towns; That so the Footsteps of Monarchy may be rooted out.

5. We humbly offer, That all Persons whatsoever, Magistrates, Ministers, or others, who have openly or secretly stirred up or provoked the Inhabitants of these Nations to War and Combinations against the Parliament, and particularly to the late Insurbreions, (of which is visibly apparent, many of them have not only been abettors, but in their persons appeared with Instruments and Weapons of War, as some of Us know) may be proceeded against, as you in your Judgment shall think fit.
After the reading of this Paper, the House adjourned till the next morning, and Ordered then to resume the Debate of it, and that no other business should intervene; and at their meeting, they Voted, That to have more General Officers in the Army, than are already settled by the Parliament, is needless, chargeable, and dangerous to the Commonwealth; and that Fleetwood shall acquaint them with this Resolved.

They had it under Consideration, to have imprisoned those that brought the Petition; but because the chief and most remarkable design of it tended to set up some new General Officers in the Army, they thought it enough to declare against it.

Fleetwood the next day, at a Meeting with many of the Leading Officers at his own House, informed them of the Parliament's displeasure signified in their late declarative Vote against the Petition and Proposals, and that he was then upon motion to decline the infinitely honourable, but agreed, that some of their number should draw up somewhat in Writing of a more moderate nature, to be presented to the House, to profess an adherence to their Authority, in opposition to the King and his Party, (whom they styled, The Common Enemy) and that they would stand by them in the Settlement of the Commonwealth against all Disturbances whatsoever: And that this should be prepared and brought to be read and considered by a General Council of Officers to meet for that purpose the 27th of September, in the Chappell at Somerset-House.

And the said Petition was at the appointed time prepared and brought into the General Council by thro' to whom the care of framing it was committed, with a long Preamble, and many Proposals far different from what much they were prepared, for; for their former being by a General Council, to meet for that purpose; and it was on a more moderate nature, to be presented to the House, to profess an adherence to their Authority, in opposition to the King and his Party, (whom they styled, The Common Enemy) and that they would stand by them in the Settlement of the Commonwealth against all Disturbances whatsoever: And that this should be prepared and brought to be read and considered by a General Council of Officers to meet for that purpose the 27th of September, in the Chappell at Somerset-House.

Another Petition brought into the Council of Officers more high than the former.

Munk was somewhat at a stand to know how to behave himself in this matter, but to avoid suspicion, he wrote to Fleetwood a courteous letter of his opinion of the whole Affair, but insinued chiefly on that part of the Petition wherein it was proposed, That no Officer or Soldier should be cashiered or dismissed from their Places, without a due proceeding at a Court-Martial, or by his own consent, except in case of reduction or disbending; defining they would add (after the words, Court-Martial) or by order of the Commander in Chief of the Army upon the place, alleging, That although the removing or dismissing of Soldiers, otherwise than by sentence of Court-Martial, was a thing rarely practis'd: yet if a General, or the Supreme Authority, should be understood to be restrained therein, it might encourage the more inferior Officers and Soldiers to affront the Superior, and the General himself, and would in time make the Army a kind of separate Corporation from the Parliament.

This Letter came not to Fleetwood, till the greater part of the Officers had agreed to the Representation to be presented to the House, But Munk's intention was to make his advantage of this division, and to that end, sent to his Brother Nicholas at London to Clerges, to authorize him principally to acquaint such of the Members, as thought most fit, That if they would offer their own Authority, they would march into England, to justify it against any opposition.

During this Debate at London of the General Officers, all imaginable endeavours were used by the dissenters, to protract and lengthen the time; but they were by much overnumbered. And the Petition was signed by 350. Commiss: Officers of the Armies in England, Scotland, and Ireland, who were then in and about London.

The leading Members had from time to time notice of the Progress of this Petition, and the matter of it, so that to prevent the Officers of the Army, even in the most reasonable of their Demands, They made many Orders concerning Pay of the Soldiers, and Mariners, and Provision for the Maintained Soldiers, and Orphans, and Widows of such as were killed in their Service. To the Soldiers they Ordered, That all the Arrears, as well of those of the Army, as the Militia Troops and Companies, should be paid out of the Moneys of such Monies as should be raised by the Sale, or other disposition of the Estates of Delinquent Sequestr'd, and to be Sequestr'd upon the late Inquisition, and out of one Moneys of Money to be raised by the sale of Foreffs and Chaces, excepting New Forest, and the Forest of Duns. And excepting tull, Timber and Trees as should be thought fit to be reserved and made use of, for the use of the Commonwealth. And to the Officers and Mariners of the Navy, They ordered the other Monies of the Money to be raised upon Delinquent Estates. And also that Hampton Court House, Parks, and Somerset-House (except the Chappel which was reserved for a French Congregation) and all other Manors, Parks, Houses, and Lands, contained
And withdrew, they coals of our pride and interest. Committees were some to their end, and finding nothing amongst them but Faithfulness and Integrity to the Parliament and Common-wealth, they are sensible that there have not wanted some persons who have endeavoured to begot mis-understanding between the Parliament and the Army, and to that end have represented their affections and intentions so, as it is taken for granted, that there hath been irregularity amongst them, at which they fear they have taken offence; whereas if there had not been an anticipation, they are persuaded it would have appeared to all unprejudiced spirits, that neither they (who for the generality of them were ignorant (for so they pretended) of that whereby the interest was taken) nor their faithful Brethren of the Northern Brigade who signed the said petition and proposals, did design or intend any thing tending to the subversion of the Parliament, the Army, the prejudice of the Peace of the Common-wealth, or any other by or minister respect not becoming the Truth reported in them. Wherefore being sensible of the evils that persons abroad may make from the least apprehensions of difference betwixt the Parliament and the Army; and that they may, as much as in them lies, remove all occasion of furth, justify their own innocency before them; and frustrate the expectations of any, who by blowing up the coals of dissension, hope to warm themselves thereby; they have thought it their duty to present their naked thoughts to them, hoping they will find as much of integrity and approved Faithfulness in them, for the welfare of the Common-wealth, as may continue a firm confidence of them; and engage them zeal against all such as shall go about to reproach their Faithful Army, or any member thereof for the future, especially considering that the peace of these Nations depends much upon a Cordial and Affectionate Union of the Parliament and Army, and an uninterrupted good understanding of each other.

It could not rationally be believed, that these men could think this their manner of proceeding futable to the temper of Subjects to their Superiors, or that it could tend to any thing but that which they seemed to avoid; namely, a breach betwixt their Parliament and them: But a clearer manifestation of this, was apparent in their proposals annexed to this preamble, uttered in with four bold declaratory Assertions; of all which we shall infer the words themselves as they were prefent. Where they say,

We do humbly and plainly declare,

1. That notwithstanding what any persons may allege or say to the contrary, we are not for propositions, but against the setting up of any Single Person whatsoever in Supreme Authority: And for a demonstration hereof, We may appeal to your own judgments upon our late Allings, wherein we said

We do humbly and plainly declare,
our Declaration of the Sixth of May last, we have with all Industry and Faithfulness endeavored to render our selves serviceable to you and the Common-wealth, and have cheerfully offered your Commandes, some of it with our Lives in our hands in your late Service; wherein to our great encouragement the Lord hath once more appeared to own you and your Army, and the Good Old Cause, for which we have contended. And at the late Return of this Parliament to the discharge of their remaining Trust, we did with simplicity and plainness, in our Humble Petition and Addresses presented to you, manifest our Hearts and Defires, and that with much unanimity and fulness of confent, which we apprehended was well accepted by you.

2. That we have not since changed our Principles, leading to a well regulated Common-wealth, wherein the Liberties of the People thereof both Spiritual and Civil may be fully secured, and Persons of known Integrity, Piety, and Ability employed in Places of Trust and Concernments; but refuse by the Assistance of God to remain cont-ent thereunto. And may God make it our humble Prayer to God, That he would incline your Hearts effectually to promote the same, and make you Instrumental in bringing forth such a Foundation of Govern-ment, whereby all the good People of these Nations may rationally expect that such Liberties and Rights shall be preferred to them and their Posterity. And we truly say, That it is in our hearts earnestly to desire, that God would crown you with the Honour of making these Nations happy by such a Settlement, as may not be liable at every Change of Government to have the Peace thereof disturbed by introducing new Govern-ments.

3. Whereas a Petition and Proposals were lately drawn up by the Officers of the Brigade that (under the Command of Major General Lambert) hazarded themselves in your Service with good success, whereby through the blessing of God upon them, and others of your faithful Friends and Servants in the Peace of this Commonwealth is still continued: And the said Petition was sent up to some Officers here, to be presented to the Lord Fleetwood; which hath been by some interpreted to call and sinister Ends, and from thence Suggestion derived, as if there were Intentions to vio-late the Parliament, to set up a Single Person, or another General; in order thereto, We do sincerely profess (whatever the design of any persons may be to promote such Calamities: We have had no other than Faithfulness and Con- der in our Hearts and Alliances towards the Parlia-ment; nor do we apprehend (with submission we may speak it) any reason or cause of offence to be conceived against your Faithful Servants, who lately gave so ample proof of their Fidelity and Courage.

4. We cannot but esteem our selves unhappy, to have been so misrepresented to the Parliament, as should occasion such a publick Admonition upon Record; And considering what Evil use may be made of these things by a Publick Enemy, and to the end they may be disappointed of their hopes, and all such persons discouraged as seek about for the future to promote Jealousies, or by mis-informa-tion to begot Divisions between the Parliament and their Faithful Servants the Army: And that a good understanding may be preserved between them, We humbly Pray

1. That the Officers of the Army, and parti-cularly those who have reason to hear the marks of Your Favour for their Faithfulness in the late Northern Expedition, may stand right in Your Opinion, and have your Countenance.

2. That whatsoever person or persons shall for the future groundlessly and Carelessly inform the House against your Servants, thereby creating Jea-lousies, and causing scandals and imputations upon them, may be brought to Examination, Justice, and Condemn Punishment.

3. That it being an undoubted Right of the People to have a Liberty in a peaceable and sub-missive way, to Petition the Supreme Authority, which Liberty hath been by Your selves Asserted, allowed and approved of; We cannot but also assert the said Liberty, and humbly Conceive, that your Faithful Servants of the Army have no way forfeited their Rights as Freeman, and that therefore they hope it will be no offence for them to submit their humble Defires to the Parliament.

4. That Your Majesties would be pleased to take into Your serious Consideration, the necessary Condition of the poor Soldiers of Your Armies, and that all possible care may be taken for their timely supply, their Wants being such an earnest call for it; And that some speedy and effectual Courses may be taken to provide for the Maintained Soldiers, and the Poor Widows and Orphans, of such as have been slain in Your Service, that the Blessing of God may be upon You.

5. That such as have freely offered themselves in the several Counties and Cities of these Nations, to own and stand by You and Your Cause in the late Insurrections, with the hazard of all which is dear unto them, may have Your Encour-agement, and be Employed in Place of Trust and Command.

6. That it is a thing granted by all, that without the execution of Military Disciplining the Peace, Nation, and good Government of an Army cannot be preserved; the Discipline of the Army may be preferred inviolable, and in particular, That no Officer or Soldier of the Army may be Committed or Dismissed from their Places without a due proceeding at a Court-Martial, or by his own Consent, except in cases of Reduction or Disbanding.

7. That it being judged necessary by the Parlia-ment, for the keeping of the Army under such a Combat as may render the same Serviceable to the Common-wealth, to appoint a Committee of Nominations for the proposing of Officers to the Parliament for their Appointment; We humbly pray, That no Officers may be brought into the Army, but such as shall first come under the Con-sideration of the said Committee, and be by them presented.

8. That the Office of the Commander in Chief of the Army being of so great Concernment to the Peace of this Commonwealth, and his Committee as present (as we conceive) expiring within a few months, We humbly pray, That the Consideration of that matter may come before you, and some such effectual course taken therein, as may prevent our fears, and the hazard of leaving the Army so Confusion.

9. And that you would retain a good Opinion of your Army, and against all discouragements whatever,
The Infolency of these Proposals, gave our present Senators reason to suspect their Authority to be of no long continuance; but in regard many Officers of the Army differed from the Refpefting and Proposing Party, they imagined the reft would not be very hearty to make a Repefe: Therefore they rejoiced to affert their Power at any hazard; in order whereunto, they had many sharp Debates about this Reprefentation and Petition; but in the end they conclufed with moderation, and directed their Speaker to call the Petitioners into the Houfe, and acquainted them, "That the Particular had read their Reprefentation and Petition, and taking notice of the good Experiences therein of their Reprefentations and faithfully to this Parliament and Commonwealth, had Commanded him to give them the Thanks of their Houfe for them; and that they knew, that they had already taken into conideration the Relief of the Poor Widows, Orphans, and maimed Soldiers, to whom Penfions had been formerly allowed; and had also fetled a way for fatisfa&ion of the Arrears due to the Officers and Soldiers, and would endeavour to bring the fame to speedy effect.

Desborow gives an Accomp of this Anfwer to a General Council of Officers who fettled that Afternoon upon purpofe. It was not unknown to them, that the Houfe refented their Address, & that in fuch a degree, that it was evident they intended to alter the Confitution of the Army. To provide againft this, they thought fit to ftrengthen their Party, by getting more Subscriptions to their Reprefentation and Petition; and immediately they agreed upon the form of a Letter to be fent to Ireland, and another to Scotland, and to every Regiment in England, for the Signing and dilpafing of which, they nominated from among themselves a fe&et Number in the nature of a Committee, That to General Monk, was in thefe words:

Right Honourable,

We do by Command from the General Council of the Officers of the Army now in London, tranmit the inclofed to you, being a true Copy of the Reprefentation and Petition which was this day by them humbly prefented to the Parliament; and the Veto of the Houfe paflod thereupon; And are further to infigne as their Desire, that the fame may be Communicated to all the Com- miffion Officers of that part of the Army under your Command, and the Subscriptions of all taken to the Reprefentation and Petition, that are free to Sign the fame; Which being fo Signed, it is defired you will be pleased to caufe them to be clofe sealed up, and returned to Thomas Sandford Esquire, Secretary to his Excellency the Lord Part, who is to give an Accomp thereof. As we have thus fulfilled the General Councils, Pleasure, we are well affured you will be pleased to comply with their Requeft; which is all at preffent from your humble Servants,

The General had Intimation of this Letter from Clarges before it came to his hands, with a full Narrative of the Occurrences that paffed upon the delivery of the Representation; which made him resolve to admit of no Subcriptions in Scotland. And when the Letter came to his hands, He returned in Anfwer to the Time that he thought it unfit to have any Subscriptions made to that, to which now the Parliament had given an Anfwer, lest it should be undertook to make a Party against them. And in pursuance of this Refolution, he sent Orders to all the Regiments under his Command, to forbide them to subscribe.

The Houfe a little before this Agitation, had begun to Court General Monk very much, as thinking it a matter of no small importance, to gain him wholly to them. And he having lent a Letter to them, by which they received Two days after the delivery of the Representation of the Army, to acquaint them with the peaceable conduct of Scotland in obedience to their Government, wherein he moved nothing in favour of none of his Officers, and commended the temper of his Army: They returned him Anfwer the fame day, with the Thanks of the Houfe, and let him know, That the high from them had of the Services which with so much Valour, Prowe, and Faithfulness he had performed, and that they had granted the desife of his Letters, with Affurance to him and his Officers and Soldiers under his Command, of return of Favours from the Parliament answerable to their Merit.

Upon the Tenth of the faid Month, they took the Proposals in the Armies Representation into Debate:

To the First, they Answer,

That the Officers of the Army have receiued, and fhall from time to time receive marks of the Favour of the Parliament, and countenance answerable to their Merit and Faithfulness.

To the Second they Answer,

That it is the Duty of all Persons, especially the Members of Parliament, to inform the House of any thing, which in their apprehenfion may concern the Publick Safety; And it is the unbounded Right of the Parliament to receive, and debate those Informations, and to Refolve what they think fit thereupon.

To
To the Third they Declare,

"That every Member of the Army, as Freemen of England, have right of Petitioning the Parliament; but widows, think fit to let them know, That the Petitioners ought to be very careful, both in the manner, and in the matter which they desire; That the way of promoting and presenting the same may be peaceable; and the things Petitioned for, not tending to the disturbance of the Common-wealth, nor to the dishonour of the Parliament; And that it is the Duty of Petitioners to submit their Desires to the Parliament, and to acquiesce in the Judgment thereof.

In answer to the Fourth Proposal,

"They Order Two Months Pay to be forthwith paid to the Officers and Soldiers of the Army in England, out of the Six Months Allowment of Five and thirty thousand pounds a month now due; And that the Council of State do give Order, that the same be paid accordingly; And that Two Months Pay be also issued to the Officers and Soldiers in Scotland and Ireland. To that part of the Proposal, To provide for the Maintained Soldiers, and the poor Widows and Orphans of such as had been slain in their Service, They refer the former Votes made in their behalfs.

To the Fifth Proposal they Answer,

"That such Persons as have been Faithful and Active for the Parliament in the late Insurrections, the Parliament will take care to give them all due encouragement as occasion shall be offered.

This Resolve Procedure of the Members at Westminster, filled the Army with strange Rumours: And they in the mean time to provide against all Accidents, consulted, if any Breach should be made upon their Government, how to leave them that did it as delitium as might be of Means and Authority to maintain themselves in such actions. And since nothing could more weaken them in such Confusion than want of Money, They for a time deferred their further consideration on the Proposals of the Representation, and made an Act against the raising of Money upon the People without Consent of Parliament, Wherein they Enact,

That all Orders, Ordinances, and Acts, made by any Single Person or his Council, or by both or either of them, or otherwise, or by any Assembly or Convention pretending to have Authority of Parliament, from and after the Nineteenth day of April, 1653, and before the Seventh day of May, 1659, and which have not been or should not be Enacted, Allowed, and Conformed by this present Parliament, should be declared, deemed, taken and adjudged to be of no force or effect from and after the said Seventh day of May, 1659. And that no Person or Persons shall after the Eleventh day of October, 1659, Act, Levy, Collect, Gather, or Receive any Customs, Impacts, Excises, Assessment, Contribution, Tax, Taxage, or any Sum or Sums of Money, or other Imposition whatsoever, of this Commonwealth, without their Consent in Parliament, or as by Law might have been done before the Third of November, 1649. And that every person offending contrary to this Act, should be adjudged to be guilty of High Treason, and forfei and suffer in such as Tres Tres.

That which chiefly provoked them to the hasty making of this Law, was a Letter which had been communicated to them, under the hands of Lambert, Desborow, Berry, Kelsfy, Affield, Coblet, Parker, Barrow, and Creed, directed to Colonel Okey. It was much to the same Purport with that sent to General Monk before mentioned, and in the same Form: This Letter was by accident delivered to them, for there being many Letters signed, to be sent to the several Regiments, which were left to be disposed of by Fleetwoods Secretary, he, amongst others, directed one to Okey; who, as soon as he had it, shewed it to Sir Arthur Haslerig, and he to the Houte; who looked upon the Contents thereof, to be such as tended to the fomenting of the Army against them; but resented the Consideration of it till the next Morning, which was the twelfth of October.

That Night Mr. Nicholas Monk arrived (after not above four days Journey) from Scotland, and had Orders from the General, to tell the Clarges, That he was resolved, if the Parliament would be resolute in offering their own Authority against the Army, he would assay them in it; and if required thereunto, march into England in their Defence.

Clarges, early the next Morning, communicated this to Walton, Haslerig, and Sect, who were so much encouraged by it, That at the first sitting of the Houte, they moved, that the Doors might be shut, that none of their Members might go out; and then after a long and brisk Debate, they Ordered, That the Commissioners of Lambert, Desborow, Berry, Kelsfy, Affield, Coblet, Parker, and Barrow, who subscribed the said Letter, should be void.

They bad it in Motion, to Declare at the same time, that the next immediate Officers to them should have their Commands conferred on them, but delayed that till the next day, yet ordered the Names of those Officers to be brought to them: And before they parted, they made an Act, appointing Commissioners for the Government of the Army; wherein they first repealed and made void the A.C.T Confinishing Charles Fleetwood, General and Commander in Chief of the Forces raised, and be raised by Authority of Parliament, within England, and Scotland, and all Power and Authority thereby given; And that all the Armies for the future should be governed by Commissioners in the place and stead of a Lieutenant-General. These Commissioners were, Fleetwood, Monk, Ludlow, Haslerig, Mersey, Walton, and Gorton, who were empowered to execute all and and singular the Powers and Authorities, incident or belonging to the Office of Lieutenant-General, from the 11th of October, 1659, to the 22 of February, 1659, &c. They likewise Ordered the Sergeant at Arms to carry that (as well) and the Discharge of the said Office, to the respective Persons whom it concerned: And because Lambert was the most considerable Perfon, and the next Officers to him were men they knew, and in whom they confided, they immediately ordered Campfield, his Lieutenant-Colonel, to have the Command of his Regiment; and that Skepper the Major should be advanced to be Lieutenant-Colonel, and Captain Bradford, to be Major of the Regiment. Three of these, lately Constituted Commissioners for the Government of the Army, met at Night, in the Speakers Chamber at Westminster, and Ordered Colonel Morleys and Colonel Meffis Regiments, as a guard to the Parliament, who profefled themselves of the Palace-Tard, and the Guard that Lambert, on the other fide, feeing what was like to become of him, if Matters were driven on at that Rate, as they were begun against him, thought beft to play his Game, while it was in his power to prevent, and to that end drew some Regiments together, who marched to King's Street, and profefled themselves of all Avenues to the Parliament.

The Speaker came with his Coach towards the Houfe; but at the Entry into the Palace-Tard, he was flp'd by Lieutenant-Colonel Dickefield; and after a little Exploitation was forced to return. The Southerns on both fides kept their Station till towards the Evening, in a Portue of Holpility, ready to have fired one againft the other, only expecting when the Word would be given for Onfet; to that it was verily thought the Bifhops would have come to a Sharp Confliét between them: but they were better advised, informed, that the Council of State meeting at White-Hall, and being traitorably driven off to their Quarters, both Parties agreed themo, and marched away that Night: However, Lambert's Party obtained their Design for as much as none of the Members were permitted that Day to assemble; and for the future, Fleetwood took care alwais to keep good Guards at the Door of the Parliament-Houfe, to prevent them from Meeting. The next Day divers of the chief Officers of the Army met at White-Hall, and chose Ten Perfons as a Council, for carrying on the Affairs and Government of the Common-wealth, till further Order. Thofe were Fleetwood, Lambert, Whitchafk, Sir Henry Van, Deboran, Sir James Harrison, Major Salamey, Berry, Sydenham, and Archibald Johnston a Scotchman, commonly called the Laird of Warrefen; And at Wokingford-Houfe, the fame Day, the General Council of Officers agreed, That Fleetwood should be Commander in Chief over all the Armies; That Lambert should be the next Chief Officer under him; and Deboran Commanding General of the Horfe; and that all the Officers, to be constituted in the Army, should be nominated by Sir Henry Van, Fleetwood, Lambert, Deboran, Ludlow, and Berry; but in especial manner they took care for the preparing of Articles of War, for the good Government and Discipline of the Army, as that which would be most necejfary for their Confolience. In this they adhered to no inftructions, and in all the time since the first mentioned of their Armies, their Discipline was to evif, that the Carriage of their Souldiers was very tolerable to the People, and that made their Enormities, in reference to the Governments, less obnoxious to Vulgar Cenfure. Some mentioned General Monk to be confidered in their Distribution of Offices, but were not heard to; and tho' he oppofed it, affured the refi, That he had little power over the Officers of his Army; and if he difagreed to their Counfels, he might be easily displaced: They had not yet received his Revolution concerning the Subscriptions, about which they writ, to be made by his Officers to their Representation and Petition, and therefore were ignorant of his Difeant from their Actions: So that in Confidence of his Recapitulation, they dispatched Colonel Cadets to him, with a large Narrative of the Reasons of their proceeding, and the Lord Mardron, and some others of the King's Friends, lying at Calais, immediately upon the News of thefe Diforders in England, did dispatch Mr. Nicholas Armeroy to his Majesty, who was then at Fontarabie, industriously folliciting for Supplies of Men and Money, of which he had large Promifes from the Spaniards: and for the defraying the Expences of his Journey, he received from Don Lewis de Haro a Pretent of Twenty Thousand Crowns: His Majefly had once a purpofe to have gone directly to Madrid; but upon the Advice brought to him by Mr. Armeroy, in hopes that something might fall out in England to his Advantage, he choofe to return to Brussels. The Earl of St. Albans coming up to the Borders to the King, just upon the Diffolution of the Treaty, met his Majefly at Bayon, in his Return from Fontarabie, and being before departed from St. John de Luxe, had receiving any Visit from his Majefly before his Departure.

The Earl of St. Albans confered much with the King whilft he lay with him, which was not long, and then he went to Paris, whither the King followed him ignobly by easy journeis; and after some stay there, went thence to Brussels. At this time such of the Kings Friends as had opportunity were very active in his Service, amongst whom the endeavours of Mr. Evelyn, of Sayers Court near Depford in Kent, is not to be omitted, who having some acquaintance with Colonel Herbert Maries, one of the five Commissioners for the Command of the Army, whole Birth, Education, and Interest in his Country rendered him unlikely to be cordially inclined to promote himself to the ruine of his Country: He attempted with just and honourful Arguments to draw him into the Royal Party, to which he believed he might be very useful, as having a greater credit than any of his Party in Sussex, where he lived, in case his Majefly should Land there, and having also...
also a good influence upon the Fleet, and two of the Army-Regiments:
Morley, after some Hesitation, was persuadded by Mr. Evelyn to return to his Allegiance, and he desired him to intercede with the King for a Pardon to himself, and some few others of his Relations, (which he named) and then departed into his Country, and gave him noricce how to correspond further with him.

The Council of Officers had frequent Meetings at White-Hall, and a un of the wisest
of them were in deep Confutation, how to make such a Frame of Government as should durable and lasting, against all Attempts wherewith. They found most of the Gentry in England to be some way or other involved in the late Endeavours for the King, and were advising of a way to seize all their Estates, and divideth among his own Party; whereby the Riches of the Nation, the most powerful of all Interests, would be absolutely changed into the Hands of Persons irreconcilable to Monarchy. This was such Advice, as if it had succeeded, might have proved fatal, and laid a Foundation to Slavery, never to have been subverted.

The General Council, on the 26 of this Month, nominated 23 Persons, to be intrusted with the Management of Publick Affairs, whom they called a Committee of Safety; and the next Day they invited them to sit, and gave them Powers and Instructions; of which, the chief were,

1. To Execute all the Powers of the late Council of State, together with Authority to call all Delinquents to Account, that were in the late Infrucktion, and to proceed to a bringing them to Justice, and to demand Indemnity to all Persons that had aided for the Service of the Common-wealth, since the Year, 1649.

2. To oppose and suppress all Rebellions and Infrucktions.

3. To treat with Forein States and Princes.

4. To raise the Militia in the several Counties.

5. To dispose of all Places of Trust that are void, and to remove such as are Scandalous.

6. To make Sale and Compositions for all Delinquents Estates.

The Names of these Governors were, Bulfrode Whitley, lately made Keeper of their Great Seal, Fleetwood, Lambert, Desbrow, Steel Chancellor of Ireland, Sir Henry Vane, Ludlow, Sydneyham, Salway, Walter Strickland, Berry, Lawrence, Sir James Harrington, the Laird of WarrenHar, Alderman Irton, Tichborne, Hemp-son, Clark, Brass, Colonel Lilburn, Cornelius Holland, Henry Brandiff, and Robert Thompson.

They likewise published a Declaration, in the Close whereof they Declare, That or any of them, Enacted, made, or past on "Monday the tenth of this instant October,

"and on Tuesday and Wednesday the next fol"lowing, to declare them, and every of them
"null and void to all intents and purposes:

"And likewise all Acts, Orders, and Proceedings
"thereupon had or done, in full and ampie
"manner, as if the said Orders, Acts, pretended Acts, or Declarations, and every of "them, had never been: All which they publish and declare, that all persons concerned
"may take notice thereof, and no person what"ever suffer any further prejudice thereby,
"hoping that all peaceable, well-minded, and
"unprejudiced persons will acquiesce in the "Necessity and Justice thereof.

"They further Declare to the World, that "it is upon their Hearts, and they earnestly
"desire, and shall endeavour, that a due Li"berty to be abjured to all the Free-born
"People of these Nations, both as Men and "Christians; That a full and through Information of the Law may be effected; as also,
"that a faithful, godly, and painfull Gospel
"Preaching-Ministry may be encouraged and "provided for, by some certain Way that may "be left troublesome to them, and least vexatious to the People, than that of Tybber. And "further, that they have no Aim or Ends to "set up a Military or Arbitrary Government
"over the Common-wealth: But have already "provided, That the Civil and Executive part
"of Government shall be lodged in a Coun-
"mittee of Safety; and they obliged in a short "time, to prepare such a Form of Government
"as may best suit and comport with a Free-
"State and Common-wealth, without a Single
"Peron, Kingship, or House of Peers; And that "they shall, to the utmost of their Endeavours,
"labour to obtain those desirable things so of"ten declared for; and to maintain and pre"serve the Peace of these Nations, in their
"several Stations and Places, and shall hope,
"The God for his own Glory, and the good
"of his own People, will give a blessed end of "these Troubles, by a happy Settlement upon
"the Principles formerly declared for; and
"which have been, and still are, so earneft-
"ly breathed after, by all those that truly fear
"his Name.

And then to Caise the Godly Party (as they called them) they proceed to call them;

"They doubtnot, but such being truly fa-fible of the many Temptations betheing them on every Hand, the great Difficulties they la-
"terns of Providence (and know not what further
"Strights a Day may bring forth) will say
"on their Behalts, Who are Sufficient for these "Things? And out of former Experiences be"ing taught, That the Lord is a prefect help
"in time of Trouble, will cry aloud for them
"before the Throne of Grace, That the LORD
"himselt may appear, and carry on his own
"Work in their Hands: And if it shall please
"him by his Spirit, to stir up those that fear
"his Name to be inftant on their behalf, they "shall not fear what evil man can do unto them.
The unreasonable Men, impatient of all Government, thought by these Intimations, to silence all Gain-sayers, and to make the People believe, they could Frame an Government, and not be obliged to submit to it. Their Conceit was great, and their frequent Invasion of several Conventions so successful, that they thought they were not by any to be opposed, in the most extravagant of their Afftings: yet in this Design of theirs, they had the better grounded hope, in regard Visit, Whitlock, and Selway, and some others of the most prudent of their Party, afflict in their Councils.

Whitlock, indeed, was much Cenfured for his Conjunction with them; but some wise men, that marked his Deemamour, and the Moderation he used, did believe, that if he had not in a great measure restrained the Exhbitbition of their Intentions, they had in the short time of their Tyranny, done much mischief to many of the King's Friends.

That which put the greatest Check to their Carreers, and gave some Life to the fainting Hopes of all good Men, was the Arrival of Letters from General Monk in Scotland, to Fleetwood and Lambert, which came to them the 38 of October, in the Evening. He complained therein, of their Violation of Faith to the Parliament; and declared his Resolution, to endeavour to restore them to their Power, against all Opposition whatsoever.

Fleetwood, Lambert, and Desbors immediately met at White-Hall in much Confusion; and about Twelve at Night they sent Major Haynes to desire Clarges to come to them; who when he came, after some quizz of his knowledge of the Generals Proceedings (to which he made very wary Answers) They desired him to go into Scotland with Colonel Talbot, (whole Regiment was then at Edin- burgh) to prevail with Major General Monk, and the Convention, to prevent the effusion of Blood. They said, they chose Talbot to accompany him, because he was very grateful to the General.

Clarges was very glad of this Opportunity to get away, (for he feared to be much worse Treated) and they were so preffing for his Departure, that they allowed him but three hours preparation for his Journey.

In the mean time, Monk, in Scotland had by an Express from Clarges, which came to him the 17th of October, received exact Information of the Interruptions of the Parliament; and at several Times before, he had Notice of all the Proceedings introductory to it, which made him expect no lefs, and therefore gave him time to prepare for what happened.

He had in Scotland at this time Ten Regiments of Foot compleat, each consisting of 28 Companies, besides Officers; except four Companies which had been drawn into England, and a little before upon the Alarm of Sir George Booth's Rising; his Numbers of Horse were but small, having had two Regiments of them likewise removed upon the same occasion: so that there remained with him but two Regiments of Horse, sixt his own, and Colonel Philip Twisleton's and one Regiment of Dragonis, commanded by Major General Morgan: The Foot were dispersed at great distances, Eight Companies of his own Regiment lay at Edinburgh, and two of them at Dalkith, where his Residence usually was: All Colonel Talbot's Regiment was quartered in Edinburgh: Nine Companies of Col. Wike's Regiment were in the Citidnel at Leith, and one of them in the Castle at Edinburgh; Nine Companies of Colonel Read's Regiment were at Stirling, and the Tenth in England; Colonel Daniel's Regiment lay at St. John's; Colonel Savics's Regiment at Aire; Colonel Coblet at Glasgow; Nine Companies of Colonel Fairbank's Regiment at Aberdeen, and the other in England; and part of Colonel Smith's Regiment at Inverness, and the rest of the Garrison in the Highland. The Horfe and Dragonis lay in several places near the Foot-Quarters; but at such distances, as might not accommodate the Country.

The late Commissioners of Nomination, whilst they face at White-Hall, had much changed the Officers in all the Regiments, both of Horfe and Foot, which raised great Discontent among them: They had given Colonel Daniel's Regiment to Percifon, his Lieut- eutenant-Colonel, an Anabaptist; They had also displaced Hubbleton, who was Major to Col onel Talbot's Regiment; Hughes, who was Major to Wike's, they had reduced to be but Captain, and preferred one Kneller in Anabaptist to his Command; Johnson, the Eifteft Captain in his own Regiment of Horse, they put out, and many more (too long to mention) in all the Regiments; few or none ot these New Officers chosen at White-Hall, to supply the Places of those removed, were yet come into Scotland: So that General Monk, taking that Opportunity, to retain all the displaced Officers in their respective Commands, made them, who had been thus disoblige before, displaced, thereby entirely depend on him.

Having resolvo to stand upon his Grand, and Declare against the Army in England, the first thing he did, was to Confer which way was best to secure thefe Regiments, and the feveral Garrisons, with least hazard; and knowing that in Actions of great Concernment, there was more use of Execution than Coun fel, he made very little Habitation in what he in ended to Act: He was most diffident of his own Regiment of Foot, (which during his Ab- sence in the Dutch War, had been so transform ed, that most of the Officers were become Anabap tists) and the three Regiments in Glasgow, Aire, and St. Johnfons.

The frst Mrson that he had Notice of the Disorders at Westminster, which was on the before mentioned 17th day of October, he sent Captain Jeremy Smith of his own Regiment of Foot, to Edinburgh and Leith, to stirrize his Pleasure to Major Hubbleton, Major Hughes, and Captain John fon, to have them come to him to Dalkith: The first was Major to Talbot's Regiment of Foot, the other, to that of Wike's, quartered at Leith; and John fon, Uuuu com-commanded a Troop in his own Regiment of Horse.

These came immediately upon Summons to the General, and there they met Captain Morgan of his own Regiment of Foot, and Miller of Wilkes his Regiment, who had the Guards of Duke's House: The Lieutenant-Colonel, and Major of the Generals Regiments, were both Ambassador, and at that time absent; Lieutenant-Colonel Clokeby, of Read's Regiment, was by chance there, and was advised with. The General communicated his Inten tion to them, who, on his Resolu tion, to receive the Parliament and both their friends and opponents.

Great Preparations in Monk's Army for the awaiting栖格in England.

The General determined to march to England, to re-establish the Parliament, and both their friends and opponents.

The next day after dinner the General marched to Edinburgh, with only Captain Smith's Troop of Horse, having before dispatched to Edinburger, and had given Orders to Morgan, whom he immediately made Lieutenant-Colonel, Captain Nicholas had been sent to command the Guards, and at the same instant, to be quartered in England, with a part of his Army, to re-establish the Parliament; To which they all freely consented: Hublethorn gave him perfect Affurance of all that Regiment, of which he had now the Command; because the Colonel, and Powell the Lieutenant-Colonel, were both in England: And indeed much must be attributed to the Courage and Diligence of that Gentleman, whose Regiment was by him intirely, both Officers and Soldiers, made at the General's Devotion; which being then quartered at Edinburgh, gave a great Reputa tion to the whole undertaking: For although some in all the Regiments, and many in mole, were ready upon the Confidence they had in the General's Courage and Conduct, and were well inclined towards him; yet they were all a

upon to follow in any Design (as most naturally are) than to begin the Action: Captain Johnson had been by the Nominators at London, and removed from his Troop, but was now by the General restored to it; and as he was Elected Captain of the Regiment, by the absence of Major Knight, he had the Command, under the General, of all his Regiment of Horse, and was well-beloved by them: Major Hughes gave him hopes of making all Colonel Wilkes hts Regiment at his Service: Hublethorn (whom he made Lieutenant-Colonel of the Regiment) was Ordered to draw it early the next Morning into the High-Street at Eden burgh, and to let all the Muscereker have Marches lighted, with Powder and Bullet; And Johnson was Commanded to be ready in Edinburgh at the same time, with his own Troop; and that of one Captain Symons, an honest flout Officer: Hughes was appointed, in the absence of his Colonel, and Lieutenant-Colonel, who were sent for the next Morning to confer with the General, to secure the Cit adel at Leith; He had, upon some kind of Expec	ation of Charge, kept Captain Wit ter (of the Regiment lying at St. John'stown) and Captain Robson (of the Regiment at Aire) both at Edinburgh, and had sent for them to him; and upon Conference with them, they both undertook, One to secure the Citadel at St. John's-town, and the other at Aire; which were very difficult Service to perform, in regard that most of the Officers in those Regiments were very ill-difposed towards the General: Little more was done that Night, but the sending an Express to Major Knight, who was then in Yorkshire at his own House, to halten him to his Command.

Upon this, Colonel Wilkes and his Lieu tenant-Colonel, with all that were present, unani mously declared to live and die with him; Captain Johnson was then dispatched to Bar
wick, to secure that Garrison, which was then under the Command of Lieutenant-Colonel Masters; and he did it effectually, and it was a Service of great advantage to Monk's Design: Captain Hat, and Captain Dennis, two very well approved Officers of Colonel Cobbe's Regiment, being both at Edinburgh when these transactons were, and having received private Orders to model that Regiment then quartered at Glasow, and to march with it to Edenurgh, came thither before any knowledge of the alterations at the Head of the Quarters, and privately confided with such of the Regiment as they were confident of before they publicly discovered their Orders: Lieutenant Colonel Yeung, who was there in chief of the Colonel and Major, did as much as he could to oppose it; but he being presently fe	ure, Hat and Dennis performed their per	inacions, and immediately marched the Re giment to the General.

Captain Winter, as soon as he came to S. John's-town, drew up two Companies, whom he most confided in, upon the Sands before the Cit del, and proposed to them what he had in charge from the General; whereupon they all shrouded in confide to it, at the noise whereof, the Soldiers coming in confusion out of the Citadel, he marched with the foresaid Compa

and took possession thereof; He made Lieutenant Colonel Keirs, and Major Kelk Prisoners; the first whereof was afterwards, upon his consent to join with the General, released from his Imprisonment, but Kelk was still detained. Of this Regiment at St. John'sown, Witter, for his handsome performance of this undertaking, is by the General advanced to be Major.

Robfon at Ayre was more deliberate in the execution of his Orders; he dealt so with the Officers, that most of them, except the Colonel and Lieutenant-Colonel, agreed to comply with the General. The Lieutenant-Colonel privately got away to Carlisle, and secured that Garrison for the Army in England. The Colonel temporized a while, but finding his Arts useless, and thereupon flying away into England, the General gave the Command of the Regiment to Robfon, for his good Service, and went into England for Colonel Daniel, who had been a little before displaced, (and Pierfom his Lieutenant-Colonel advanced to the Command of that Regiment) to take again his Command ofthat Regiment.

The settlement of these two Regiments gave much encouragement to the General, in reference to the carrying on of his Design; and the rather, in regard he himself had look'd upon it as none of the easiest works to compass.

He made no alteration at first in those Companies which belonged to Colonel Overton at Dundee, because he had hopes to gain him to declare for him with the Garrison at Haddington, under his Command; and in regard they were on that life of the River Tay, they could not have done much if they had opposed. He sent to Colonel Fairfax, who quartered with his Regiment at Aberdeen, to make haste to Edinburgh, and Lieutenant-Colonel Clokerry was sent to Reed, his Colonel at Sterling, to appoint him to march to the General with all his men, except two Companies, which were to be left for the safety of the Town and Castle. And at the same time, he sent a Commission to Interests to Colonel Mann to be Colonel of that Regiment, in the place of Smith (who adhered to the Army in England) and appointed him to send three of his best Companies to Edinburgh. He dispatched also some Trusty Officers to the Horse-Troops, and then went himself to Leith, to settle the Citadel and Regiment in obedience to him; upon his first arrival, he displaced Knolly, and confined him, and restored Hughes to be again Major to the Regiment, and likewise some other Assistant Officers were put out, and others placed in their Rooms; Captain Clifton, who with a Company of this Regiment from Leith, had the Command of Edinburgh Castle, upon promise of faithfulness and service to the General, was by him continued in his Command with Trust and Confidence. And thus these three Regiments of Foot at Leith and Edinburgh, were in one Afternoon pretty well settled, till more time could be allowed to refine them.

Upon the 1st. he marched some Companies of Horse and Foot to Linlithgow, intending to go thence to Glassow, to settle Cabot's Regiment, of which he was in some doubt; but he there received Intelligence of what was done by Hatts and Denniss, and therefore went no further.

He there also had notice of the submission of the Citadel at Ayres, and that Barwick was rendered to him, where Colonel Cabot was stayed and detained in Prifon, as he was coming into Scotland with his Regiment, and it was fecon- dably done; for if he had been permitted to pass, the opinion which was had of him by the Souffliers, might have much hindered the Generals Proceedings. He was brought with a Guard to Edinburgh Castle, and kept there, the General being much incensed against him, upon private service that he had Instructions to have feized him, if he had not agreed to the Armistices in England. At Linlithgow, at a Council of Officers, it was advised that some way should be used to draw off the Independents Churches in England, from favouring the English Army, which would have much weakened that Party, if it had succeeded; for most of the inferior Officers were of that persuasion; for the effecting of this, a Declaration was framed, agreed to, and published and dispersed all over England; And at the same time, another Declaration was also made to satisfy the King in general, with the reason of his taking Arms, alleging that he did it for the vindication of the Rights and Liberties of the People, and the freedom of Parliament.

Two Expostulatory Letters were also writ; the one to Eleetwood, and the other to Lamburgh, blaming the violence of their Proceedings against the Parliament, and another to the Speaker, to be informed of the Condition wherein the House then was; declaring therein, that whereas there ought to be a right understanding between the Parliament and the Army, he would be ready, in case the Army permitted to disobey their Orders, to assist them with the Forces under his Command, according to his Duty.

By this time, Major Knight was returned out of England; for hearing of the disorders at London, and that some Jealousies had been entertained of him, upon Information that he had been some Months before engaged with the Lord Caistor in Sir George Booths Rising, he thought best for his own security, to make all possible haste down to his Command; his Arrival fell on the 23d day after the General had first Declared; Major Read of the Horse, of Dragons, was made a Regiment of Horse; and Major Farmer was sent with a Troop to secure Carlisle, who when he came thither, did not march into it with Confidence, as Johnstone did into Barwick; but sent in to treat with the Governess, and was so long doing it till Elson, that Commanded the Town, had fixed the Soldiers to a Resolution of keeping him out; Moreover, Monk supposed that his Army could not be got together in six weeks time, to march into England, he therefore to amuse the Faction there, sent Major Knights with a Party to renew his Affronts to the Southerners, were were commanded by Knight, Johnson, Wilmot, and Simmick, and the Foot by Miller, Mansfield, Collins, Winter, Seymour, and Belchean, all gallant and well-armed men. But being come as far as Morpeth, he had advice, that some forces were got into Newcastle before him, which being intimated also to the General, he presently countermanded him and his party to Anwick, where he said for some time; The not taking Newcastle was no discouragement to the General, or his army; for upon more deliberate Consideration, he thought the misfortune rather fortunate, than prejudicial to him, since if he had taken it, it would in all probability have been immediately besieged by Lamberts. And then he must have been obliged to attempt the relief of it, and fought before he could have been well enough prepared for it, and thereby have hazarded his whole design.

The General, at the same time that he sent the before-mentioned Letters to London, did likewise send a Messenger with Letters to Lieutenant General Ludlow, who commanded the Army in Ireland, to move him to join with him, or at least to represent to him so fair an accout of his Actions, as might induce him not to be his hinderance in any of his undertakings.

Colonel Lillo, who lay at York with some forces, upon the former Rumour of Monk’s Declaration, drew what forces together he could, and without staying to be well informed of the Resolutions of Fleetwood and Lamberts breaking up the Parliament. He drew all the Officers in those parts to enter into an Association against Monk, and to join with the Army at London, in whatsoever they designed.

He also wrote to Mr. Clarke, the Generals Secretary, who was an active useful Instrument in his affairs, to seduce him from his Service; the truth is, the greatest part of Clarke’s Eiace was in England, and he was a man of so civil and ingenuous a Conversation, that he might have been the better excused in a Neutrality to both Parties, and his Interest did direct him to it. But he was resolved to hazard all his Fortunes in the Generals Bottom, and would not by threats or cunning, which were both used by Lillo to him, be prevailed with to quit his Party. For which his fidelity and constancy, at this time, he was ever after so much esteemed by the General, that he trusted him with his most confidential affairs.

Major General Morgan had lain long sick of the Gout at York, and began about this time to recover his health. The Letter which Monk sent to him was intercepted by Lillo, which Morgan a little resented, but thought it advisable so far to conceal his passion (till he might have convenient opportunity to get into Scotland) as to seem to Lillo rather to dislike than approhe of the Generals proceedings.

Colonel Talbot and Clarges came not to Edin- burgh till the second of November; they were both very well received by Monk, but especially Clarges, being his Brother-in-Law, with whom he had that night much Conference in private. The General wondered that Fleetwood and Lambert would send him, and thought it a good Omen to his success that he had him to assist his designs. Clarges frankly asked him what was the true end he aimed at in this Enterprise? telling him, that it was impossible for him to be ever trusted after this Rupture if he patched up a Peace with the English Army, and withal acquainting him that he observed a great Conternation in the Officers and Soldiers as he passed, and that he believed many of them would fall off to him.

The General (as the most retired man then living) was in some trouble to preferred to discover his Intentions, and at that time opened himself no further than to let him The present condition of Monk, and what Mr. Clarke received from him, The General, and to let the army in his ditt, and some of his ill-willers, that the King was in the bottom of his Designs that all he could contrive, would be little enough to beg a Confidence, even in his own Party to engage with him.

As to the present Condition of his Affairs, he acquainted him that he had about Seventy thousand pounds of money in his Treasury, and the rest would be soon paid into it. And that all his Magazines were very well stored with Ammunition, Arms, and all other necessaries, and that he had in part modelled his Army fit for his purposes, and should in a while perfect it. Clarges let him know, that the want in Fleetwood and Lambert’s Army were very great, and that upon Lambert’s Expedition they were not able to advance one month’s Pay for his Army, which would make them by free-Quarter be very barrat-folme and disservice to the Country. So that if by a Treaty, or any other means he could procure that time, his business might be done without hazard. The General replied, That he thought the thought of a Treaty from Fleetwood and Lambert might be improved to his great advantage, for he could not in a month’s time draw his men together.

And this was the last time that Knight and Morgan were for a Lodge at Anwick, was to make them think in greater readiness than he was, the more thereby to distract their Levies. The General then resolved upon a Treaty, and the next Morning summoned his chief Officers together, to nominate Commissioners, and to resolve upon Instructions for them. He chose to advise with his Officers in all these matters to free them from suspicion. Colonel Talbot was very glad his Journey was so successful to obtain a Treaty so easily. He was and his Officers met; and at the first Proposition they confedered to the motion for a Treaty; and when he put them to name fit Persons to be Commissioners, they referred it to him. He
The Army had not yet friendly relations with the Dutch, who believed the Commissioners to be too lenient. The General, therefore, had the task of keeping the peace between England and Scotland, while his agents in the Netherlands were busy negotiating with the Dutch to secure their support.

The Dutch were willing to supply the necessary provisions and equipment for the Army, as long as the General would agree to the terms of the Treaty. However, the General was not entirely satisfied with the terms, as he believed they did not provide enough protection for the soldiers. Despite this, he agreed to the terms and began preparations for the Army's departure.

The Army left London on the 1st of November, and arrived in Scotland on the 10th of November. The General was pleased with the outcome of the Treaty, as it had secured the necessary provisions and equipment for the Army. He was also pleased with the cooperation of the Dutch, as they had provided valuable support in the negotiations.

The Army laid siege to the Scottish city of Stirling, and the Scottish forces were defeated. The General was pleased with the outcome, as it demonstrated the strength of the English Army and the power of the General.

The Army returned to London on the 10th of December, and the General was pleased with the outcome of the campaign. He had secured the necessary provisions and equipment for the Army, and the Scottish forces had been defeated.

them know as much. Morgan Replied, I promised to ask you the Question, but not to return to them that sent me, if you denied it: I am very glad I am here with you to assist you, and follow your Fortutunes in all your undertakings. You know I am no Statesman; I am sure you are a Lover of your Country, and therefore I will join with you in all your Alliments, and submit to your Prudence and Judgement in the Conduct of them.

This generous Friendship was kindly received by Monk, and it was the more valuable, in that it was done at a time when the Army in England was at its greatest height; and that in Scotland very inconsiderable in respect of the other, and not yet well settled; for a day or two before, one of the Troops of Morgan's own Regiment ran over Twed to Lamper.

In the Evening Morgan was private with the General, and delivered him a Letter which he brought from Mr. Boulter a Minifter of York, a very eminent Man of those Parts, and of great Credit with my Lord Fairfax, and many others of good Note in that Country: (Clarges being yet at Edinburgh, and Confeulated with in the busines.) The Letter imported, That the Lord Fairfax, and many others of good Inteff in Yorkshire, were willing to join with the General, but that they disapproved of his Declaration which was restrain'd to the reforing of that Part of the Parliament only which fate after the Seclusion of the Ref; and was filled with many Protestations for the effecting of no other than a Common-wealth Government. To this the General anfwered, That Clarges could not mean his Intention in thofe Particulars, That what was Printed in his Name, was not (as that Concefa) to be regarded as the Refult of his own Reafon, because his Writings were drawn by other Hand; and that his Affairs had a firmer Confedency, and he more Power in his bands, it was unfatisfactory for him to confidr what was done, since all that was writ, could scarce prevail with the Army to believe he had not a Design to fet up the King in his Government. The Conclusion of this, was to fend Clarges to Fairfax, Redifer, and several others, to engage; it being thought expedient, at the fame time, to impof all possible care to amufe
the Parliament and Army, till the General could get a Power in his hands to Jufhife other Councils. Clarges was dispatch'd to Boulter, with a Letter of Credit to him, to caufe a belief in him of what he fhould acquaint him with,
the part of the General; and another Letter to the fame purpofe to my Lord Fairfax, from whom he was to have an Address to Redifer in Laidoffife.

Talbot knew nothing of these Travels, but cared himself with much moderation all the time of his Stay, and with fo much profefion of respect to the General, That he affured him, If he would go to London and be a Newer, he would preserve his Regiment for him: Which he promis'd to do, but was afterwards by the importunity of Lambe, prevailed upon to not contrary to that Engagement, and (some think) to his own Inclinations; for he was effeemed by all that knew him to be a Perfon not averse to a better and more Jurf Government than he at that time lived under, and was

obliging to all the Gentry where he lived, that needed his affiftance and help.

Fleetwood could not conceal his fens; for the fame Week that Talbot and Clarges were sent to endeavour a Reconciliation, before he had any return from them, Captain Dean, one of the Treasurers, and not long after, Mr. Carryll the Minifter, with Colonel Goff and Whaley, were fent to the General on the fame Errand: Likewise Mr. Hammond and Mr. Barker were defuted in the name of the Independent Congregations in London to mediate a Peace betwixt the two Armies.

While mean, Clarges and Talbot took their leaves of the General to return home. The pretence of Dean's coming into Scotland before Caryll and Whaley, was to look after his Charge; for he was one of the Treasurers at War; but he privately dispersed Tickets as he travell'd, to induce Monk's Soldiery from him, bringing him withal a Letter from Fleetwood, which contained an Offer of what Command in the Army he should defire, upon the least private intimation of his inclining to take part with him: This made the General to be lieve there were fome Jealousies betwixt Lambert and him; which he might have improved to the breaking of one of them; but he chose the more Generous way and refufed the Offer.
Letting him know, He fought not himfelf, but the good of the Nations; and when that was obtained, he would rather lay the Command, he had done, than feek to enlarge it.

Lieutenant Colonel Barre came at the fame time from Ireland with a Letter from Sir Hardres Walter, John Jones, and the ruling peodle of that Country (for Ludlow was then in England) declaring their Refufal to join with the General; Letting him know by their said Letter, bearing date the fourth of No-

Ave, that at a General Meeting of the Officers of the Irish Army, they unanimously refolved not to approve of the Resolution he had taken, which tended (as they alleged'd) to the Engaging of part of the Armies of thefe Nations againft their Brethren, or the dividing of them in Inteff or Affeafion, being well afured, that fuch a Practice would be found in the Smith to be nothing else but the opening of a door for the Common Enemies to come in (whatever other Measure should be put upon it) and defroythefe very Perfons and Authority, on whose behalf their effeafions inclin'd them to undergo very great Difficulties. Adding, That they held it a Duty incumbent on them towards him (as their breath in the behalf of all the people of the Lord in these Three Nations, to bear their Witnesrefs against any fuch Reclamation or Pracfices, and to improve their wills endeavours to prevent the fame.

The General was not at all discouraged at this return to his Civil Letters and Declaration fent thither, having at the fame time recieved advice from Cornet Monk by ano-other hand, That Sir Charles Coot, Sir Theophilus Jones, and a very confiderable part of the Army, were refolved to affift him; That Sir Hardres Walter himself might in time be drawn to join with them, and that he doubted not in a short while to receive good effects of their endeavours.

But in the mean time, upon notice that Dean and Barret were Active to withdraw the affections of the Souliers from their Duties, they were thereupon sent away from Scotland with a severe Rebuke; The General being unwilling to punish them by Imprisonment or any severer course, because they came to him on publick Bullene.

These Men did much mischief amongst the Souliers, who were many of them by their inveiglements seduced; Two Troops of Twiflet's Regiment of Horse, Commanded by Alley and Dean, refused to Join with the General, and Thirty three of them were discharged. But Johnstoun, Colonel Foot, and Colonel Barret, put on their Horses; but Forty of Dean's Troop with their Colours ran into England; And two Companies of Foot of the Regiment which came from St. John's Point, being Quartered at Dunbar, had like to have been betrayed to Newcastle by one Captain Gullion, who had been lately of that Regiment, and was discharged; This Gullion procuring leave to go into England came to Dunbar, where he made the Souliers believe that he was by the General restored to his Command, and had order to secure Captain Thompson who then Commanded them, and to carry them in Boats to Berwick; Some of the Sergeants so far gave Credit to him, that they placed a Guard upon Thompson, whilst he in the mean time was hiring Boats to carry them, and was so earnest in it, that he would have taken any, though never so leaky, for their Conveyance: This put the Men and Officers of Foot,信息 much, that they desired to fee his Orders; whereupon he leaped upon his Horse, and ran away.

At Sterling, a Troop of Colonel Sanders his Regiment was in the like Disorder, and about thirty of the men dismounted, and others put in their places. This obliged the General to be more circumspect in the reforming his Regiments; so that he discharged all the Officers whom he any way suspected, and sent them into England. In Colonel Fairfax his Regiment eighteen Officers were dispaßed; and in most of the rest, some were put out, in all, to the number of seven hundred Persons: Thofe Regiments wherein least alteration was made, were Talbot's, and Read's: the first, through the diligence of Hubbellthorpe, who, while after defervingly, upon Talbot's joying with Lambert, had the Regiment conferred upon him; and the latter, by the Care and good Example of the Colonel, who was a Person that always loved and esteem'd the General.

Lambert was much troubled when he heard that Morgan had deferred him, and when Talbot and Clarges came to York, he complained of it as a kind of Breach of Faith, but was quickly by Clarges better satisfied: for he assured him, he had heard him more General Monck to a Peace with him; but being Major-General of that Army, he could not refuse to do his Duty, in staying there where his charge was, since the Difference between the two Armies was not yet come to that Degree, to make it beyond hopes of Reconciliation; and that he might rather further the same by his Preference, than Abstinence.

Clarges, as hath been already mentioned, had received a Letter to the Lord Fairfax, from the General, and some Instructions to Ruffier, and several others; about which he was secretly to confer with Bowles the Minifter at York, to whom also he brought a Letter of Credit, for what he should propofe to him; Bowles, with whom he had much discourse, desired to be fully informed of the Generals Intentions, and was by Clarges so well satisfied in them, that he undertook to negotiate with the Lord Fairfax, Colonel Bethel and several others in Monks behalf, and for Evidence of it, he advised him to stay privately in York, till he went to confer with the Lord Fairfax at his House at Nun Appleton, five miles from thence, (that he might know what Advice to fend into Scotland) which he accordingly did. And at his Return, acquainted him, That Fairfax would rise by the midst of January, and he might be confident Bethel and Smithfon would join with him, who were men of good Interest, and well-beloved of the Soulierry in Lambert's Army; On the other side, Bowles preffed him to know what Expectations the General had from other places, and was by Clarges informed, that Col. Whetbam at Portsmouth was a great Friend to the General, and he doubted not, but he would take the first Opportunity he could, to declare with that Grefon for him; which he liked very well, for Whetbam was a moderate Man. He told him likewise, that Colonel Haver with his Regiment would raise foldmen in Nottinghamshire and Leicestershire, and Colonel Hutchinson, and Sir Arthur Haffenrig would join with them; and that Coke was labouring to make Disturbances in London amongst the Regiments there. Bowles at first was not well pleased that he should make use of these Aids: But when he was acquainted by Clarges with the Reasons which induced him to it, he was satisfied.

The first thing the General design'd was to break Lambert's Forces, to make himself Master of all the Armies; and to effect this, it was requisite to refuse no help, since the Major Part of the whole would be such, as he could make use of to model the rest, to any purpose he should employ them in. Then they found out a secret Mellenger to fend with Intimation of this Conference to Monks; And Clarges went towards Lincolnshire to pursuie his Negotiation; but about Dinsdail he had to grievances a fall from his Horse, as he was riding that bidell Post, that his Life was depended on; but after a little stay there, he was brought to a Village betwixt Tuxford and Newark, where he was forced to stay ten days ere he was able to travel; nevertheless, in the mean time he sent Expresses several ways, and by the means of one Belfows, a Confident of Colonel Ruffiers, he had opportunity to fend to him, and had his Answer; which was, That he would join with Fairfax, and do what he should direct. When he came to Leicestershire, he heard nothing of Haffenrig, but that he had, in despair of doing, any any thing, retired to Woodstock; and the Reason he gave for it, was, That if he should raise Forces in his County, it might give occasion to the King's Party to Arm, and thereby hazard the whole Cause; and that therefore it would be better to close with the Army in all their Exorbitances, than venture with so much danger to oppose it.

Clarges was somewhat troubled at this Discouragement, but omitted not to proceed in his Endeavours; and thereupon sent to many of the Council of State, who were retired, to draw them together to him, to disabuse them of their Fears, in promovering the Restoration of the Parliament; which he did upon Observation amongst the Soultiers of Lambert's Army, that they favoured much the Declaration of Monk, for retaining that Authority, and were only diverted from joying with him against Lambert, upon a Jealousy of the King being in the Bottom of his Design, which was often intiminated by the Council of Officers at London, in their publick and private Debates: So that in the immaturity of that time, nothing could more advance Monk's purpose of subduing the English Army, than to begot Confidence in them of his adherence to his Declaration.

This Practice prevailed so far, as to get the Council of State together in London, where they had many private Meetings: But in the mean time, the Commissioners for the Independent Churches, which were sent into Scotland, were solicitous to divert Monk from the prosecution of the War; and to far the Bishops proceeded, that there was a Conference appointed with them at Holy-rood-house, where they were present to treat with them, General Monk, Colonel Fairfax, Colonel Syler, Doctor Barrow the Judge Advocate of the Army, and Mr. Gumble one of the Generals Chaplains.

At this Conference, Mr. Collins an Independent Minister (who had been one of the Preachers of the late Council in Scotland) was admitted to be present as a Neuter.

Mr. Carlyle was the first that spoke, who in a long and studied Speech declared, That the Commissioners had desired him to speak for them; That they all came, not to deliver their own Sentiments of the Generals Proceedings, but the Sentiments of the Churches, (for to upon every occasion he called the Independent Congregations) That the Churches had not given them Commissioners to enter into the Merits of the Cause, nor to Debate whether Lambert's Action of turning out the Parliament were justifiable or not; but only to present it to his Lordship, as their Opinion; That though that Action could not be justified, yet his Lordship had not a Call to appear against it, in that manner that he then did; That his Lordship had only in Charge to keep Scotland in quiet, and was not bound to take notice of any Differences that should happen in England. (Nor indeed could it reasonably be expected of him, being in a place where he could not be supposed to have such true and timely Information, as was necessary in a Business of that Concernment.) He proceeded to shew Reasons, why the General should go on no further, telling him, That it would put a fierce amongst those that hitherto had been Brethren engaged all along in the same Cause, Partakers in the same Dangers, and the same Successes; amongst those that still in their Papers, and all their Adressers, called and owned one another for Brethren, and that at a very unseasonable time, whilst the Cannibals and Perizites were in the Land: And thereupon he took occasion, to enlarge himself upon all the Advantages the King and his Party would reap by this Quarrel, and all the Dangers the People of God (for so he called such People) might run into; And at last, by way of Aggravation, he told the General, That what inconveniences would happen, would be laid at his Door, in regard he would appear to be the Beginner of the War.

At this the General, in a little hear, interrupted him, shewing, That the War was already begun by Lambert and his Party, who had offered violence to those, from whom they had all received their Commissions; not sparing freely and at large to lay open their reliefs Insolubility, which would not suffer the Three Nations to enjoy any settled Government at all, but kept them in a perpetual Circumvention, till they were in danger to be brought to utter Ruine; repeating much of their Declarations, and many of their Actions; and declaring, That if they continued in that Course, he was resolved to oppose them to the uttermost, and would (to repeat his own words) lay them on their Backs.

Carly and his Fellow-Commissioners endeavoured to excuse that Expression of theirs, which stirred up the Generals Anger; and Barrow, one the Generals side, did qualify and mitigate his Answer, not thinking it meete wholly to dispose so considerable a Party as the Independents, as things stood at that time; and so by degrees Expressions came to be very calm on both sides, both being in Expectation of the Issue of the Treaty then on foot, between the Commissioners of the Army of Scotland, and those of the Army in England; but after this time there was no more Meetings, for upon News from England, that Matters were tending to Accommodation, the Commissioners thought their Business done, and made haste to return to London.

Clarges, disabled by his Fall, could not get soon enough to London, to prevent the hasty Conclusion of the Treaty there, (which was concluded on the fifteenth of November) although he endeavoured by several Letters to Major Knight, one of the Commissioners, to prevent it, forasmuch as the rest of them were so prevailed on by the Importance of the English Officers, or else to terrify with their great Preparations, that he could not hinder the speed of it: As he came to London, he passed by Cambridge, and settled there a Correspondency with Mr. Prodman, one of the Fellows of King's-College, by whose Care and Secrecy all his Packets were conveyed safe to Scotland, when all the ordinary Ways were obstructed. Mean while, being much troubled to find, that that very Night he arrived at London, the Treaty betwixt the Commissioners on both parts was concluded, he sent his expounded with the Commissioners about about their precipitant proceeding, telling them what Progress he had made in his Negotiations, and that by the mid of January there would be in many Places such strong Resistance made, that the General could not but obtain his Ends. That his Money would last till the beginning of February, and by that means his Men would be so united and encouraged, that if he did nothing but lie still, Lambert's Army by their great wants (which made them insupportable to the Country) must break of themselves.

Knight was very sensible of this Error in this hasty Conclusion, and the rest were so far convinced, That in their Letter of the sixteenth of November, to the General Council of the Officers of the Army in Scotland, giving them an Accomp of the Conclusion of the Treaty, They confess, out of a Sufpicion, as the Porture of Affairs then stood, That the Iffie of the Difference, if longer continued, would not be to the Advantage of themselves, or of their Brothers of England, but of the Common Enemy.

The Agreement itself consisted of Nine Articles, which were expressed in the following words, viz.

1. That We will, as the uttermost of our Power, in our several Capacities, oppose the Intrest and pretended Right of Charles Stuart, in and to the Government of these Nations, as also of all and every Person claiming a Right or Title to the said Government, or any Share therein; together with, under, or from him, or any other Person or Persons pleading or pretending such a Right or Title, by virtue of his or their Defent from the same Line with him.

2. That we will not give our Consent unto, but will oppose to our utmost Power, the setting up of any Single Person whatsoever, in the Place of, and for the Defence of the same Title, and will endeavour to our utmost, That the Government of these Nations may be settled in the Way of a Free-State, or Common-wealth, without a Single Person, Kingship, or House of Lords.

3. That no Form of Government shall be determined of, and affected by any part of the Army, as the Supreme Legislative Authority of this Common-wealth, and the Territories thereto belonging, without the Approbation and Consent of a General-Council of the Officers of the Army and Navy of this Common-wealth; which General-Council shall consist of two Commission-Officers for each respective Regiment, chosen by the Commission-Officers of the said Regiment, or by the major part of them, who can conveniently meet together; and likewise such Governors of Garrisons, as are not Regimented, and can conveniently be spared, may be called to the said Council, and ten Officers of the Fleet, chosen by a Council of the Officers of the Fleet; and that the Quorum shall be Thirty one, and the Day of their Meeting be the Sixth of December next at White-Hall in the Old Council Room.

4. That a Parliament, or a Supreme Delegated Authority of this Common-wealth, be with all possible Speed Convenited and Summoned in such manner and form, as shall be by the Officers Said General-Council agreed upon; and the Qualifications of the Members thereof, to be agreed on by the Lord St. John, the Lord Warrioton, Lieuten- General Ludlow, Sir Henry Vane, Lord Whitlock, Sir James Harrington, Major Salway, Colonel George Thompson, Colonel Berry, and Mr. Scot; together with the Lord Steel, Colonel Barron, and Lieutenant-Colonel Dobson, as Commissioners for the Army in Ireland; and three Commissioners for the Army in England, to be appointed thereunto; with the three Commissioners for the Army of Scotland, whereof the Quorum to be Nine.

5. That the Proportion of Money out of the Affairs of England, formerly appointed for the Supply of the Forces of Scotland, be duly paid, and no further step upon the same, but that it may be returned by Bills of Exchange, or otherwise with all convenient Speed, and any former Order and Orders to be made void.

6. That the Cape of Officers of the Army of England and Scotland, that are suspended or dis- missed, be returned to their former Posts, and that their Former and former Quarters be restored to them, and their former Libraries and Conventiments, and that their former Pay be restored to them; and the Officers of the Union shall be continued with their former Ranks, with all the Privileges and Immunities appertaining to the same.

7. That the Officers, or Soldiers, or other Persons of these Nations, that have acted in the late Differences on behalf of the late Parliament and the Army, or between any of the Forces of this Common-wealth, for one against another, shall have their Devils and Differences, and that the Interest of the Subjects thereof, be considered, and all Kindness be put in perpetual Obligation.

8. That Godly, Learned, and Faithful Ministry, with proper Maintenance, and other Encouragement, be continued in the Three Nations; and that the Universities and Schools of Learning be so Companied and Reformed, so that they may become the Nurseries of Piety and Learning.

9. That the Forces of Horse and Foot respectively, both of England and Scotland, that have been drawn forth by reason of the late Differences, shall forthwith March to such Quarters in both Nations where they may best secure and preserve the Peace of the Common-wealth against the Enemies thereof; and that there be no further difference or appearance of difference amongst them.

We the Commissioners Inrumpent appointed and authorized by General Monk, and the General Council of Officers in Scotland, do this fifteenth of November, 1659, in the name, and on the behalf of the said General Monk, and General Council of Officers in Scotland, fully Concur and agree to the aforesaid Agreement, XXXX and
King Charles the Second.

and every part thereof, and do engage our selves and every of us to the full performance of the same.

Present as Witnesses,

Signed as the Agreement of the General Council of Officers of the Army met at Huntingdon-House the fifteenth of November, 1659. And I do for myself, and in the name of the said General Council, consent to the aforesaid Agreement, and every part thereof, and do engage to the full performance of the same.

Witnesses,

Ch. Fleetwood.

Wellingtion and Lloyd, Two Captains of the English Army at London, were sent with this Agreement to General Monk to put it in execution; and as they went, Major Cambridge of Lambert's Army was sent by him in their Company, but Clarges was careful to fend a Copy of it to him some days before they arrived; and the General was in much perplexity at the Receipt of it, as that which disheartened his Design almost past recovery; he was resolved not to accept of it, but could not well how to decline it.

To take any pretence from those Articles which excluded the Kings Government, would confirm the suspicion which was fomented of his secret Intentions for the Royal Family; and to ground his diffent from the Subscription of the Commissioners, where they assume an authority (which they never had,) and undertook for the performance of that Agreement for the General and all his Officers, would not be thought material enough to continue the breach betwixt them: That which was most plausible, was to break it upon the Sixth Article, where it was provided, That all the Officers displaced by General Monk might be in a Capacity of being referred to other Commands; and all those put by him in their places (wherein his strength confined) be removed; He called together a few of his Confidants to advise what to do: Those were Major General Morgan, Colonel Fairfax, Colonel Lydcoat, Doctor Barnum, and Mr. Gamble; Lydcoat was admitted, because he was from a private Captain newly preferred to the Command of Cobbe's Regiment, and therefore by interest supposed to be averse to this Agreement. The General and these Gentlemen having had much discourse of the Business, They all thought it fit to disapprove of the Agreement, but differed in the manner; but at last it was by Barnum proposed, and agreed to by the General and the rest, That they should not declare a positive diffent to what their Commissioners had done; but urge, That there was something untractable of further to be agreed upon; and some of those things confined to by their Commissioners, which without further explication, could not stand with their Declaration or Instructions; and that therefore it should be desired, that two more might be allowed to be added to their Commissioners, to meet a like number of theirs to be thereunto authorized, to put a more absolute period to their differences.

The same Evening, Wellington, Lloyd, and Cambridge arrived; and the next morning at a General Council of Officers at Edinburgh, when the Agreement was communicated to them, they were so artificially prepared, that they unanimously disapproved it, and a Letter was framed, which they all subscribed, to the same purpose with what was agreed on the day before, and Lloyd and those with him went with it to London.

The City of London was very much disconcerted at the Committee of Safety, and Fleetwood became doubtful of them: But to heighten them the more, General Monk sent a Letter to the Lord Mayor and Common Council, which was delivered to them by Mr. Allin, and Colonel Markham, about the 7th or 8th of November: Wherein he acquainted them

That at the first, he was sad of the Force upon the Parliament, he had sent a Letter to them, declaring his Resolution to endeavour their Re-establishment, and that his Army was very unanimously to concur with him in it; but that Letter miscarried, he had with the advice of his Officers now again written to them, to let them know, they were confin'd to their own Resolution; and that they were confirmed in it, for being informed that the Authors of that Force had proceeded so far, as to, and would make with some Acts of Parliament, (which the King when he was at the highest never attempted to do, and which no true Englishman can endure to be done by any but Parliament themselves,) and after they had influenced the Abolition of an ancient Government, they were contriving by their own Power and Authority to set up a new Government over the Nation. Adding, That if this should be suffered, he knew not to what purpose so much Blood had been spilt, so much Treasure spent, and so many Engagements made; They must take upon themselves the Guilt of all, and look upon this Slavery they had brought upon themselves, as a Judgment upon them for their Absurdities, Raptures, and Prodigies: He protestted to aim only at the restoring Parliaments to their former Freedom and Authority, and the People to their Civil Rights and Liberties; in which he expected to be sure of their Affiance. As to Religion, he told them, he intended not that those that truly feared God should be abridged of their Worship, but he should be unwilling that some other Pretense of maintaining that Liberty, should endanger the overthrow of National Authority, and by thus the greatest part of the People to suffer Ignorance and Atheism: Concluding nevertheless, That Religion was not that about which he did at present contend; being determined to leave that to the Consideration of the Parliament, for the Defence whereof, he and those with him were resolved to venture to the utmost; and if he should miscarry through none of their timely aid, it would be too late for them by their own
This was a great Encouragement to the Officers in Scotland; for the wish of them did conclude from these appearances of Action at London, that their Party was increased in England, Imagining that otherwise they durst not have openly acted.

Colonel Whiteham at Portsmouth was labouring to frame a Design of declaring for General Monk with that Garrison; And Colonels Merley, Walton, and Hastier went privately to wards him to Treat about it: But before they went, the Council of State, at another meeting, before the time appointed by Parliament for their Continuance was expired, framed a Commission, whereby they Constituted General Monk absolute Commander in Chief of all the Armies in England and Scotland, which was Dated the 24th of November, Sealed with their Seal, and left in the hands of Chalmers, till a safe Meffenger might be sent with it to him.

As soon as Fleetwood had received General Monk's Letters against the Restitution of the Treaty, and his desire to have Two more Commissioners added to his, to renew the Treaty at New-Castle, Willes, Cheverly, and Knight, the Commissioners, had their dispatch, and a Pase to licence their repair thither; But before they got to New-Castle, at the Request of all Lambert's Officers, a Letter was framed, and sent by Colonel Zanchy to General Monk's Officers, and one from Lamert to the General himself.

In that from the Officers they write, That they had advis'd their General to acquaint General Monk, that if he pleased to appoint two Commissioned Officers of his Army to be added to those already ready in England, and signify their names to him, a safe Conveyance should be forthwith given to them; but would, That nothing in the Agreement be parted from, nor any new matter, or further explanations admitted, which are not consonant to what is already concluded; And that the General Council (agreed upon in the third Article of the Agreement at London) to meet upon the 8th of December, may accordingly hold their meeting. And in a Postscript to this Letter, they complained of the detention of Colonel Cobler, who, they said, was a publick Meffenger, and desired therefore he might enjoy his Privilege accordingly, except by some mishap in he had forfeited the fame. Colonel Zanchy was very kindly received by General Monk, and all his Officers, and they met together with all convenience to give him his dispatch; acquainting them, That they should not demand any thing in that Agreement that was contrary to the Instructions by which their Commissioners were authorized; but what should appear to be beyond, they insisted to have it Treated on and explained.

As to the third Article, mentioned in their Letter, they would not admit of any meeting in pursuance of it, till the whole should be concluded. And concerning Cobler, they alleged, That he came not to Scotland as a publick Meffenger, but as a Colonel to Command a Regiment after his Commission had been vacated by the Parliament, (the day before their Interruption) and without any leave from General Monk; And that the General had Intimation from a Person of Credit, That he had a

The Letter Lookd upon as fictitious, and the Meffengers Imprisoned.
The General, upon the receipt of this Paper, advised with some select Officers about an Answer to it (viz.) Colonel Fairfax, Major Jeremiah Smith, Colonel Lydect, Colonel Read, and Doctor Barrow. And the chief Question debated on was, whether they should permit the Scots to Arm for their Assistance? Colonel Read was for Arming them, He argued, That it was a common danger, and they ought to make use of any aid that could be obtained for their defence. The General himself told them, That if he should draw all the men from his Garrison, he could make his numbers of Foot quickly equal to Lamberti, but he had hitherto declined that, being unwilling to put Scotland out of English hands, and that he doubted not, if he could get a few more Horse than he had, even with those Foot he had without weakening his Garrison, he should well enough defend himself against Lamberti.

Others were of opinion, That although they should not employ whole Troops, or Companies of Scots, yet they might safely mingle a good party of them with the English. But Doctor Barrow was against all motions of Arming the Scots at that time, believing if it were done, many of their own men might defect them; But if the General would take any opportunity, though it were but to beat up any of Lamberti’s Troops, so that they might once come to Blood, that the division being likely to increase after such an action, he might then strengthen himself with what Acceltions he pleased. Nevertheless, he moved that some privately might confer with the leading men of the Scotch Gentury, to try if there would be brought to provide any numbers of Horses on which the General might mount English to reinforce his own Troops. This last was approved as to the main Question; but upon the whole debate, they agreed upon particular Answers to every Article, in the General’s name.

1. To the First, That he would authorize the General to Arme the next adjacent Garrison, to put in execution such Orders and Commands as his Lordship shall give for securing the Peace of the County.

2. To the second, That he would allow the Counties next adjacent to the High-Lands, viz. to the County of Dumbarton and Sterling, Forty men in Arms; to the County of Perth, Forty men in Arms; to the County of Forfar and Kin- kardine, Forty men in Arms; And to the County of Aberdeen, Forty men in Arms, which are to be a Guard for the security of the said Counties against Thieves and Robbers. And for the rest of the Shires, his Lordship would take care, if he should have occasion to remove farther out of Scotland; and he would allow the Heritors of the above named Shires, to make choice of a fit Person to Command the said defensive Guards; They giving Security to the Governor of the next adjacent Garrison, for their Fidelity and good behaviour, or Six hundred Pounds Sterling.

3. To the third, His Lordship defer’d his Answer, till the Issue of the Treaty now intended.
intended between him and the English Army.

4. To the Fourth, That he would furnish them with fit means for their defence, whensoever he should apprehend their Peace and Safety to be in eminent danger.

5. To the Fifth, Such Noblemen and Gentlemen as should suffer to live peaceably, and do nothing to the prejudice of England, should have liberty with Paffes to wear their Swords, and have four Strongs Armed for their Attendants.

At a Conference with the Scotch Commissioners, upon the delivery of these Answes to their Propositions, they deemed unsatisfied with them, and the Earl of Glamorgan, in the name of the rest, told the General, That since they were willing to hazard their Persons and Estates with him, They hoped he would not deny them to Arm for his Assistance, and their own safety, since he should engage and be warred, they should be expos'd to great risks for their Affiliation and respect to him, from which otherwise, by a Neutrality, they might be secure. To which he answered, That if that should happen, they should then Arm to what numbers they pleased. To this the Earl replied, That the Country were now willing to rise in Confidence of his Conduct and Courage. But if his force should be defeated, they would not be persuad'd to it. And besides, they could not understand weeks to make their Levies. And if permission were now denied, the Enemy, if Victorious, would be in their bowels, before they should be in a posture of Defence.

The cautious General would not be prevail'd on with these Arguments, and so they departed, he returned to Coldstream to his Quarters, and the Scotch Noblemen and Gentlemen to their several Countries.

They had absolutely refused the raising any Horfe to mount English, yet came to no business between them and the General, in regard, before they left Barwick, the General acquainted them with Intelligence he had received from England, of the distractions in the English Armies and other affairs, which made them to fear less than before their own Peace at home, and so all parted with mutual respect.

After this meeting, the General was designing how to break off the Treaty with Lambeets, which he had hitherto not without great Artifice delayed; but he considered, that as soon as that should be done, Lambeets would march towards him, and therefore he made preparation to fight him, if occasion should urge him to it. In order to which, he sent an express to Clarges, to provide him some good Horfe-Officers, and lend them by Sea in a nimble Bark. Mean while, in Northumberland and the Ogleys rais'd him two compleat Troops, and more Horfe were rais'd. He in-creas'd his number of Pikcs in each Company, to be equal to his Mufquers, as thereby to be better able to make defence against Horfe, in which Lambeets greatest strength was placed.

Coldstream was nine miles from Barwick up on the Tweed, and he had Quartered all his men so conveniently, that he could draw them all together in six hours; for the Villages are much thicker upon the Scotch than English Borders. And if Lambeets march'd towards him, the Villages in Northumberland being thin, he must have Quarters at such distance, that his men would have been expos'd to great hazard of being often disturb'd in their Quarters. And if he had march'd to figure; the General, being upon the defensive part, could have brought as many hands to action as he, Or if he had march'd to Curtile, to have invaded Scotland that way; Monk would then have march'd directly to London, and should have been two or three days march before him. Or if he had divided his Army, the General would have presently fallen on the nearest part to him. In this posture he lay at Coldstream, when he received Intelligence from Clarges,

"That there were many great differences in the City of London, betwixt Fleetwood and the City. That the Apprentices, and several others in all, were in favour of him, had many Confutations to make disturbances, and that they would not send any more.* A Petition to the Lord Mayor and Commons, Council, to press their Intercision for the restoring of the Parliament, and preservation of Magistracy, which was endeavoured to be suppress'd by the Committee of Safety, who emitted a Proclamation to prohibit all gathering of hands to Petitions, which incen'ded the young men so much, (being for'mented by wiser heads) that they rose in many places in a tumultuous manner. And thereupon, Colonel Hewfon was sent into London, to suppress them, whereby a rumour was rais'd, that the Souldiers came to plunder them, and all Shops were shut up, and many reproachful words past in the Streets, between the Souldiers and Apprentices, to that heat of passion, that two of the Apprentices were slain, and about twenty wounded, and the rest for that time dispers'd. * The Souldiers were for victuals, as 'co'd, and bill, that they were affiduous to march, and many Officers, when they went into the City, durst not wear Swords for fear of affronts, and That many of the Private Souldiers, especially the Horfe, with'd themselves with him. Captain Lead, and others, being active to draw them from * Fleetwood Party. That he had sent Captain Goodwin with some Horfe Officers to him by Sea to Barwick, and that Goodwin had his Lordships Commission for Commander in Chief, of all the Armies in England and Scotland. And that he had treated with Mr. Philip Howard, who had undertaken to raise an hundred Gentlemen well Armed and mounted in Northumberland and Cumberland, on Condition to Command them for his Life:* Sir Gardner, which he had promised his Lordship; should consent to; but that justly he was preparing for his Journey, he was seized, with the Small Pox, but his Elder Brother was in the mean time, had writ and undertook to promote the Levies of themen; That he had treat'd with Colonel Redman, a gallant Horfe-Officer, and Colonel Byt, who had been both by Lieutenant removed from their Commands, to draw off the Irish Brigade.
from Lambert, many of the men having been before Commanded by them, and therefore easily persuaded; and that Colonel Merley, Sir Arthur Hatty, and Colonel Walton, were active in Portsmouth, and all the Foot which were sent to believe that Town, had been on their Officers, and carried them Prisoners into it, and five Troops of Colonel Rich his Regiment, and two of Colonel Berries were come in to them; That those of Sorries were Commanded by Colonel Creeks, who was lately their Major, and is sent into the Life of Wights, where his Forces are increased to Seven hundred: And atamount, and several other places, there was great defection amongst all the Souliards; That Sir Michael Livesey in Kent had raised two Regiments, and Colonel Gibson was joyned with him, and was called home with Tweny and Twenty Sail declared for the Parliament, and was come into the Hope, hopping upon the River of Thames. And the Black-hoists near Gravesend, on both sides of the River, had also Declared; That the Lord Mayor and several Aldermen, I have had many ineffectual Treaties with Fleetwood, and the Chief of the Army and Committee of Safety; the City demanding the management and Conduct of their own Militia, and and the instant refutation of the Parliament, or the calling another, which are refused to them, and the difcontents thereby much augmented.

Upon Receipt of these Letters, the General wrote to Lambert, by Major Bannifler, one of the Officers at Barwick, acquainting him, That since his last by Zanych, he had certain advice
That three of the Commissioners appointed by All Parliament, for the Government of the Army, were now in Portsmouth, offering by virtue of the same Authority, upon which he All'd, and decla-rating for the same ends; And that he and the Army were thereby obliged in Honour and Duty, to take their Advice and Content in all affairs that relate to the Cause they are now engaged in, which he doubted not, but he would judge reasonable and necessary; and therefore he desired a safe Conduct for the Major, to acquaint them with what had passed in the several Overtures between them;
but whithal, he told him freely, he could not think it advisable to proceed further in Treaty and he expelled the other Commissioners would be of the same mind) till he remained all those Troops he had sent into Northumberland, Cumberland, and Westmoreland, during that time.

Lambert upon advice with his Officers, would not let Bannifler pass, but sent him back to Weymouth. For he now began plainly to perceive, that the General intended nothing less than to treat further; whereupon both sides prepared for War: But Lambert was so daily alarmed with the facetious of the Commissioners at Portsmouth, and the daily submission of several Troops and Companies of men, that he thought it more necessary to march Southward to affit his Friends in London, than hazard Bat-tel with General Monk.

Fleetwood, and the reit of the Committee of Safety were in no less disorder than Lamert, but that which most amaz'd them, was the Declaration of Lawton with his Fleet for the Parliament (which was chiefly transmitted by the endeavors of Colonel Streeter, an active Instrument for the King in all these Revolutions, who was for a'day stirr'd upon discovery of a design he had to seize on the Tower) for they thought themselves sure of Lawton, and by his defec-ton (added to the rest) their Authority came to be generally desisted, even by their own Souliers, so that they abandoned all; and Fleetwood, with great comfition and submission, in behalf of his Confederates, sent to the Speaker to desire him to send to the rest of the Parliament Members, and with them to return to the exercite of their Tryst and Power for the Government of the Nation; aknowledging, That the Lord had blaff'd their Courts, and (to repeat his own words)

'  in their faces.

Upon this, several Members met privately in the Speaker House, and gave Colonel Okes, Colonel Markham, Colonel Allerd, and Con Colonel Monfs, orders to draw the Regiments about Westminster to a Rendezvous in Lincoln-in the Field; which being performed accordingly, the Souliards declared to live and die with the Parliament; and marched down Chancery-Lane, where at the Rolls they made a halt till the Speaker came to them, and received their acknowledgments, and from thence by his Orders, they went to their Quarters, having first from him received the Word.

And two dais after, that is to say, on the 29th of December, in the Evening, the Speaker and the Members of Parliament, retired the Government, and sat in the Parliament-House, having met first in White-Hall in the Council-Chamber, from whence they went on foot through Chancery-Wall (the Mace being carried before the Speaker) to Westminster-Hall, where as they pafs'd, the Souliards upon the Guard stood in Ranks, and made acclama-tions.

At their first meeting, They Ordered
Alexander Popeham, Col.Thompson, Mr.Sct, Col-

1 Colonel Okes, Sir Anthony Afley-Cooper, Colonel Matthew Allerd, and Colonel Markham, or any three of them, to order, direct, and Condui't the Forces of the Army, and all other Forces, and to command the same to suppress all tumults, infur-re-bits, and Rebellion, and all such Forces which shall oppose or resist the Command of the Parliament; and to oppose such Orders and Directions as they should receive from time to time from the Parliament, or the Commissioners appointed by All Parliament, to Command the Army, or any three of them, till they shall come to London or Westminster, or until the Parliament shall take further order.

From these Commissioners an Order was sent to Lambert to disperse his Forces, but they were upon breaking before notice thereof came to him.

We made some relation of a Treaty betwixt
Mr. Evelyn and Colonel Morley, which at this time Mr. Evelyn thought to bring some advantageable issue, for Morley upon the change that had his Regiment restor'd, and with it the Government of the Tower conferred on him, and his Brother Colonel Pegg had also a Regiment: Mr. Evelyn had done for him towards his Majesty, all he desired, for Pardon of him and his Friends; but when he came to him with the report of it, he was very revered, and would not entertain any discourse with him of that matter, and after one time would rarely admit him into his company, which made him suspect he had altered his intentions, and put him to the hazardous experiment of a sharp and expeditious Letter; but he was newly involved with General Monk, and Sir Anthony Alley-Cooper in intrigues of the like nature, which he durst not communicate; and Affairs were not yet mature enough for the things which Mr. Evelyn proposed, nor was he affurred of his Officer's and Soull's in the Tower for such a Service: But it was most certain he received such impressions from Mr. Evelyn's former discourses, that he was one of the foremost of his Party to embrace all occasions for the King's Service, as was evident by his early, vigorous, and hazardous opposition in Parliament, shortly after their fitting to that impious Oath of abjuration of the King's Family and Line (hereafter mentioned.)

When the Parliament thus reconvened, and Lambert in his declension; The Irish Brigade submitted to Redman and Britt, and was brought off by them; and at the same time, the Soulls of two Dunkirk Regiments, then with Lambert, were in Mutiny for the General, who scarce had received Information of these actions, when Captain Campbell also arrived at Coldstream with Letters from Sir Hardres Waller, and others from Dublin, with Intelligence of the Generals, and Dublin Castle by the former, and Captain Bond, which was thus performed: One of Bows men safely knocking at the Gates, the Sentinel opened the door, and as he opened it, the refent presently rushed in, and on a sudden surprized them within, and feized on Colonel John Jones, Miller Corbet, Colonel Matthew Thomlinson, Colonel Richard Lawrence, Lieutenant Colonel Henry Jones, Mr. Standish the Treasurer, and Tombs the Store-Keeper: The Defign was chiefly managed at Dublin by Sir Thomas Jones, Trevor, the three Warrens, Colonel Bridges, Thompson, Liff, Warder, and Temple, having been two months in Agitation, and was the more dangerous, because but in one of Five Foot Companies that Quartered in the City, they could repel any Confidence; neither durst they Communicate their Intentions with more than one Officer of that Company, and a few Officers of Horse, whom they engaged out of three Troops; and so much they differed about the time of putting the business in execution, that till the night before the Action, they had not resolved it: The present made use of for the Butines, was their meeting to promote a Petition in the Army to call a General Council; which so dazzled the Eyes of the Commander in Chief, and several others of his Confidants, that they suspected no other thing to have been intended. And that which in the Execution was most remarkable, is, that no one drop of Blood was shed. The next day after, the City of Dublin drew out their Militia, and declared with them; and although they had but eight hours notice, there appeared above two thousand Foot, besides Horse.

Colonel Monk was privy to the Design, and sent to Wexford, Waterford, and thole Parcs, to incline them to join in it: But Sir Charles Court and his Brothers had the hardest Task in the Province of Connaught; but they overcame all difficulties, and in a very short time brought the whole Souliery and Garrison there to obedience, and in less than a Weeks space, Limerick, Clarewell, Toghall, Rofs, Kilkenny, Drogheda, Donegal, Antrim, and many other Places declared their Concurrence.

The General, always carrying an eventemper in his behaviour, feem'd not much excited with this News; yet since it was likely to prove of no small Concernment to himself, he presently dispatch'd Captain Campbell back, with great acknowledgments of these Services, and desired to be supplied by them with fix Troops of Horse with all convenient speed: This good News was seconded with advice from Bowles of Fairford, and Green of the Lord Fairfax's Riding in York-shire, which was somewhat sooner than his Promise, but ver’s reasonable to make a diversion to Lamberts Forces, with whom Colonel Liburn's Regiment joyned by means of Major Smithson, who was a great Lover of General Monk, and Colonel Redman came in to them with the Irish Brigade; Colonel Bethel, Sir Henry Cholmeley, Captain Stragonides, and Mr. Arthington also joyned with them: The said Meffenger also informed him, That the Parliament was again Sitting, and that Fleetwood had submitted to them; which made the General immediately March, (for he heard that Lamberts kept his Brigade together, and intended to oppose the Lord Fairfax and his Friends, and having quitted New-Castle, was marched towards them;) wherefore on the Second of January at night he advanced with two Regiments of Horse, and two of Foot, and marched to Pouller: He had the day before sent Colonel Knight with three Troops to Morpheth, to whom he that night sent Orders to seize on New-Castle, which he did by six of the Clock the next morning. Major General Morgan was left sick, and Colonel Read, who commanded the Rear of the Army, marched the next day with two Regiments of Horse, and three Regiments of Foot, with which his whole number amounted in all to five thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse. By that time he came to Morpheth, he had information that Lamberts whole Party was of themselves dispersed into several Q.letters in Submission to the Parliament's Orders. And to Assure him of the Parliament's Sitting, he receiv'd a Letter from the Speaker, dated the 27th of December, of Thanks for his Service; wherein the retribution of their Authority was wholly attributed to his Fidelity, Care, and Courage.

The knowledge of this did more than any thing perplex the General, as one of the most fatal accidents that could happen to him; for by their ever-haity renewal of Power, back'd with a great Army newly return'd to their obedience, he despaired of doing the good he intended to his Country, and thought no longer of Continuing in Arms than till a fair Opportunity should be offered him to lay them down and retire, without making them jealous of him; For he expected they would not have thought their Sitting safe, till his arrival at London with his Army, and then he would have refreshed all the other Members with them, without undertaking to judge of the Differences between them.

When he came to Morpeth, Mr. William Mass, the Sword-Bearer of London, came to him, with a very respectful Letter from the Lord Mayor and Common-Council of London; To which he made a Civil Return the next day from New-Castle, and thence he marched with continued Journeys to York, where he continued Five days, and all the way as he marched from Coldstream he was met by the Genrty, and saluted by all the People as he passed, with great Acclamations of Joy, Colonel Wateris the Sheriff of York-shire, met him betwixt Allerton and Topcliffe, several of the Genrty having attended him the day before at his first entrance into the Country. At York he was Visited by the Lord Fairfax, whom he received with much Kindness and Respect, and very civilly acknowledged Mr. Bowles his diligent and industrious acting in his Concerns; There he modell'd Lambert's and Lilburn's Regiments of Horse, and gave the first of them to Colonel Bishell, and the latter to Smithson, and chang'd most of the other Officers.

The new Return'd Members begin very Actively in settling their Affairs; and on the Second of January they name One and Thirty to be of the Council of State, paffing an Act for their Constitution, and several Instructions for them to Act by: Amongst which it was provided, That none should sit but such as should take an Oath of Abjuration of the King, his Family, and Government.

The Oath was in these following words: viz.

I do hereby Swear, That I do renounce the pretended Title of Charles Stuart, and the whole Line of the late King James, and of every other shall Pretend, to the Crown or Government of these Nations of England, Scotland, and Ireland, or any of them, and the Dominions and Territories belonging to them, or any of them; And that I will, by the Grace and Assistance of Almighty God, be True, Faithful, and Con descendant to the Parliament and Common-Wealth, and will oppose the bringing in, or setting up any Single Person, or House of Lords, and every of them, in this Common-Wealth.

This Oath being firther than any that had ever been imposed, was by many disliked; However, the Leading Men that promoted it in Parliament, affirmed, That without this, they could have no certain Assurance of Power; And that the Hollanders, and those of the Confederated Provinces could never be fix'd in their Government, till they had made a Renunciation of the King of Spain. And to that height this business was brought, that not thinking it enough for the Council of State. They drove on to have it ordered, That every Member in the House should first take the said Oath; This was strongly opposed by Colonel Feild, Weaver, Dave, Hutchinson, both the Parries, Ingoldby, and many more of the Soberer sort, Who allowed it would be a Confining of Providence to make such an Oath, a Snare to many good men, and a terror to such as were truly Conscientious, who might suspect this to be a fore-runner of many Oaths to fetter their Conferences. Of those more moderate sort of men, Feild and Ingoldby only were thought favvourers of the Kings Party, but the rest were such of whom they had no manner of Jealousie at that time; Though afterwards they appeared much inclined to a Conjunction with the Secluded Members, and well disposed to Monarchy: So that when the Act for the Council of State came to be executed, in that part of it which was the administration of the Oath, Mr. Weaver, Colonel Morley, Oliver St. John, Colonel Fagg, the Lord Fairfax, and many more, even a third part at least of their number refused it, and were therefore not admitted to Sit, and Act.

Whilest the General laid at York, he had Intimation, that Overton was taking Beds into Hull, breaking the Ice in the Grains, and making such Preparation as if he took him rather for an Enemy than a Friend; wherefore he sent Major Smith to him, one well known in that Garrison, to inspect the Condition of it, and write a Letter to Overton, to expostulate with him about the Matter: Who returned to Anwner to him, That he perceived Overton had rendered Hull so difficult to him as it had his Design dangerous to them and others; but he was glad to hear that he adhered to this Parliament in their present Constitution, against the remonstrations of the Secluded Members, a Free Parliament, or Single Person, of which he had been continually charged upon him by the Common Cry of the Army.

The Leading Members of Parliament, finding this difference growing amongst themselves about the Oath of Abjuration, conceived how to draw the General to their Party; and in order therunto, Scott and Robinson, two of their Members, were sent to meet him upon the Highway to gratulate his Return, but with private directions to engage him to take the Oath as soon as he came to London, before he took his place in the Council of State.
Of these their Initations Charges having timely notice, was resolved to be with the General before them; but before he went, he privately got from Quarter-Master-General Bostler a List of all the Quarters in London, for a purpose which shall be discovered hereafter.

On the Twelfth of January, the House, to retifie their Confidence in the General, paffed a Vote, To approve of all he had done in order to the Service of the Parliament; and Ordered their Vote to be Printed: When he removed from York, he lent one of the Danbyck Regiments of Foot, Commanded by Colonel Clarke, and Major-General Morgan Regiment of Horfe, into Scotland, which, with those he left in Garrison there, he thought enough to secure the Peace of that Kingdom, till time should admit further Cofideration thereof. He left Colonel Fairfax his Regiment at York, and Disbanded some Companies of Afffield's Regiment, and mingled the Private Soldiers thereof among his Regiments to fill up the Companies; and then having given the Council of State an Accompt of what he had done, he proceeded in his March towards London with four Regiments of Foot, viz. his Own, Colonel Read, Colonel Lydeotts, and Colonel Hubbardtornor; and Three Regiments of Horfe, his Own, Colonel Knight's, and Colonel Clowberrieis, which made his Number in all 800 besides Officers; that is, Four Thousand Foot, and Eighteen Hundred Horfe; He came the 29th of January to Nottingham, where Charges came to him the day following, on which day also, Seat and Robinson arrived at Leicester and because the next day was Sunday, they relented there, and met the General upon the Road betwixt Leicester and Nottingham the 22d.

At Nottingham, Charges, having had secret Conference with the General, communicated to him in what Condition all Affairs stood at London, and that they had there two thousand Horfe, and eight thousand Foot, most of them modelled to their own Principles; That the Horfe were the Regiments of Okay, Haflerig, Rich, and Desboren; and though they had newly given the laft to Sir Anthony Afley-Cooper, yet all the Officers under him were of the fame Mould as the Former. The Regiments of Foot were commanded by Ayles, Markham, Senter, Fitch, Meja, Fletwood, Morley, and Fogg; of all which, he could have no Allurance but of the two laft: For Morley's men were firm to him, deferred their Officers in the North, and declared for him; And Fogg was a new Regiment, raised in the British Party, in his behalf. He told him, That except he could get all thefe Horfe and Foot out of London, (except Morley's and Fogg's Regiments) and difpofe them into feveral Quarters, and march his own men thither, and be Master of London, he could never expect to do any good for his Country; from all these times, it had been experienced, That to what ever was done at London, where they had Nine or Ten Thousand Men to juftifie their Actions, all the rest of the Regiments submitted.

And if his distant and absolute Command in Scotland had not hapned in a Conjunction when Fleetwood and Lambert, the two chief Officers of the Army, were in Jealousie of each other, and their Treasure quite exhausted, he had never been able to have flood against them; and although there was that Jealousie, and the Principles on which he declared were fuch, as moft of thefe in Command favoured; yet how fowly did Ireland and the Fleet join with him? And even the Council of State thcmfelves (who had the Temptation of Power to excite them) were backward enough to appear till they faw a Diftraft in the others Councils; for fear, as some of the Chief of themalleged, left the King's Party might have Opportunity to mingle with their Levies, if they should make any: These Confederations took fuch imprefion in the General, as made him apprehend great Difficulties in what he went about; till Charges told him, there were yet probable Hopes to make him Master of his Wifters, which he propofed thus: He told him, The Council of State confifted of fuch only as had taken the Oath of Abjuration; and till he should take that, they would be fo diffident of him, that whatever he defired of them, of any material Concernment, would be denied; That the Major Part in Parliament were againit the Oath; And therefore in all his Affairs he was to apply himfelf to them, and therefore that his belt way would be to write them a Letter to this purpose, That he thought it inconvenient for their Service, that fo many of the Coldiry now in London, lately in Rebellion againit them, fould be trufted with their Guards, till the prefent Officers by them placed upon them, fould have by Discipline reduced them to perfect Obedience. To which the General Anfwered, That he approved of the Advice, but that if they fhould offer to have an equal Number of his Regiments with the other, that Obfervation would be removed; and besides, he believed he had not men enough to supply the Guards, which then now in London kept.

To this Charges replied, It was worth his Aflempt to Endeavour this; and that the fame Reafon for not trufling the men, might hold as for not trufling them intire, but as concerning their Guards, that he had brought with him a List of all their Quarters, and did believe his Three Regiments of Horfe, being in number, within two hundred, as many as the four now there, they might do the fame Duty; And that his four Regiments of Foot, now faff as they were, might well keep the same Guards as fuch of theirs.

The General, in fow, approving of all he said, Charges drew the Letter to the Parliament, for him to sign, in these words:

Right Honourable,

I have lately acquainted the Council of State, with what Forces I have fent into Scotland, and to the Horfe, who are now exercized in Observance to your Commands; therefore I am now commanded in Obedience to your Commands; therefore I am now directed to write this Letter to you, and I am now marched in Obedience to your Commands: therefore I am now ordered to write this Letter to you, and I am now marched in Obedience to your Commands.
The Foot were disposed as followeth:

Colonel Ayr his Regiment; To Sandwich one Company, Dover two Companies, Canterbury five Companies, Ryetwo Companies, Colonel Markham's Regiment; To Ipswich three Companies, to Colchester five Companies, and to Sudbury two Companies.

Colonel Struther's Regiment; To Buckingham three Companies, to Northampton five Companies, and to Newark upon Trent two Companies. The Confidence the General had of Colonel Struther, in placing his Regiment in the midst of the Kingdom, afterwards proved a good Expedition at the breaking out of Lambert.

The Regiment belonging to Fleetwood; To Hereford two Companies, to Oxford four Companies, to Worcester four Companies.

Col. Maj's Regiment; To Cambridge five Companies, and to Ely five Companies.

Col. Fitch's Regiment; To Chichester five Companies, and the rest to Winchester.

The Disposition of those to be in London were in this Order:

The General's own Regiment of Horse in the Menzies, and in the Strand,

Col. Struther's Regiment; To have four Troops in Kings-street, and Tittle-street in Westminster, and two Troops in Holborn,

Col. Claverie's Regiment; Two Troops in Southwark, one in Bishop's Gate-street, and three in Smithfield,

The General's Regiment of Foot in St. James's, and Parts adjacent.

Col. Read's Regiment in Soverst-houses, the Straddes, Long-Acre, Covent-Garden, and St. Martin's Lane.

Col. Lydeott's Regiment in Thanet-houses, Peter-houses, and Parts adjacent.

Col. Hubbardson's Regiment, in Holborn, Smithfield, and Parts adjacent.

Col. Fagg's Regiment in Southwark,

Col. Merley's Regiment in the Tower, and Parts adjacent.

The next Morning the General marched towards Leicesters, and he met Sect and Robinson, the Parliament's Commissioners, in the way to it, and they never parted with him till he came to London.

At Leicesters the General expected to be attacked about the Oath of Abjuration, and was much troubled to think how to divert it. Clarges told him, He had a plain and a fair Answer to make to them; which was, That he heard many men of unquestionable Integrity had refused the Oath; and till he came to London, to bear the Reason on both sides, for the taking and refusing, he could not with Prudence refuse it, This Advice he followed, and succeeded in it. Sect and Robinson at their first Interview told him, That the Parliament had Ordered a Thousand Pounds per head to be paid to their Members for the Time of the House.
The General was more never put to it than in this Journey to diftribute his Inclinations; For those men watched every moment of his time: At Harrow Alderman Fonke, Alderman Vincent, and Mr. Bromfield, met him as Commissioners from the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common-Council of London; and at the same time, Sir John Norris, with many of the chief Gentry of Northamptonshire, welcomed him into their County.

The Citizens, after a Congratulatory Speech, fell upon Particulars, for the general Settlement of the Kingdom; and Mr. Bromfield, in a hand-some Free Speech, after the consideration of the several Calamities it lay under, as the best Remedy, proposed the re-admission of the Secluded Members, that the Parliament might be made full and free. So it was so impatient at this, That he took the Words out of the Generals Mouth, and would not permit him to answer them. He told them, Now the Parliament had subjected the Military Power, to a due Subordination to the Civil, they were free; and that having already given their Judgment in the Cafe of the Secluded Members, it did not become them to insist on their re-admission. Fonke Endeavoured to qualify what Bromfield had proposed, by saying, He conceived they were not obliged by their Instructions, to desire the Generals Mediation further, than that they might have all their own Members admitted, since it was unreasonable, that they should be Governed by a Parliament, where they had not their Representatives.

This Discourse, on all sides, was managed with some heat; and the General was forced to comply with Sea and Robinson, in their Extravagancies, to preserve their Opinion of him, which made the Citizens part from him somewhat unsatisfied, and so they continued, till be sent Clerges privately to give them a better understanding of his Intentions. But Sir John Norris, and the Northamptonshire Gentlemen, who were prepared to attend him at Northampton with an Address, were so much discouraged, that they thought to decline it, till Doctor Barrow requested Mr. Philip Howard, to advise them to proceed in their Intentions, and to allure them. That though they had not a satisfactory Answer, they might be sure it would produce a good Effect. At Northampton Sir John Norris delivered his Address; and as he marched to St. Albans, several of the same nature were presented to him from the Gentry of Buckinghamshire, Oxfordshire, Norfolk, and almost all Counties, which did all agree in the same Matter (viz.) For the Reinstatement of the Members Secluded in the Year, 1648, and the filling up the Vacancies in Parliament, or else for the calling of a Full and Free Parliament. All which were answered with much respect by him, although he durst not discover his Approbation of their Desires: And it is very observable, That in all the Countries, so much Caution was observed, That no Gentlemen signed any of these Addresses, that had ever been engaged in his present Majesties, or his Royal Fathers Cause, nor scarce any of the Sons of rich.

At Dunstable the General consulted Major Knight and Clerges, about the filling up the Blanks, in the Letter prepared at Nottingham, having had Thoughts to fend it by Clerges, Knight, or Clark his Secretary: But upon further consideration, it was thought convenient not to part with Knight, because his presence would be requisite with his Troops, if any Disorders should happen upon their March to London; so for Clark, he was so necessary to be with the General, for the illuing out Orders, that he could not be spared: and for Clerges, it was judged more expedient, that he should be sent before, to prepare a Party in the House; so that Lydets was chosen to be sent, asone very grateful to the Speaker, to whom he was near ally'd, and Friday was the Day intended for his March into London: And upon the next Days Conjunction, which was Saturday in the Evening, the 28 of January, he was dispatched away: And on Monday the Letter was delivered, which caused a long and violent Debate: Hafterig told them, the Council of State had before agreed, that four Regiments of those in London should march out, and four of the Generals be admitted; but nothing prevailed that he said against the Generals Letter: So that after a Debate, from eight in the Morning, to twelve at Noon, the Result was in these words.

Monday, January 30, 1659.

Upon Reading of a Letter from S. Albans, from General Adair, Dated the 28 of January, 1659, and two Lits therein, Resolved upon the Question by the Parliament, That the Parliament doth agree with the Business of the Divisions of the Soldiers, according to these Lits.

Resolved upon the Question by the Parliament, That it be referred to the Commissioners of the Army, to see the Soldiers forthwith distributed accordingly.

Lydets returns to the General with the welcome News of these Votes, as well might be fo to him; for from the moment of the execution of them (which gave him the possession of London) he could not but think his Conduct would prove very ill, if he did not reduce the Armies, in the three Kingdoms, to his Obedience.

Captain Cuff, an Agent from Sir Charles, the General hath conformed the Interest of all Affairs in Ireland; he is made of Capt.'s... would undertake for them; which allay'd the Sufpicion for that time, or at least to raked it up in Athes, that no Sparks outwardly appeared.

The Regiments that were to march from London, to give place to the General and his Regiments, had a Months Pay alignd them, to be paid at their Remove; but that did not hinder them from Mutiny at their departure, especially those that Quartered at St. James's and Somerset-house, which was not without great Industry of the Officers appealed: Upon which followed about Midnight an Infracrion in the City, where about six or seven hundred drew together, and by Beat of Drum about the Streets, invited others to joyn with them for a Free Parliament, and the Liberty of the City, in expectation to have the Soul- diers join with them; but two Troops of Horse suddenly dispersed most of them, and took the rest (about Eight and Thirty) Prisoners, which were the next Morning committed to Lambeth house: This Infracrion, together with the Diforders of the Soldiers, so frighted the Council of State, that in the beginning of the fore-going Night, they had sent to the General to march with all haste in to London, but that was afterwards contradicted, and he drew nor near the Town till the Morning, and in the Afternoon, the others being all marched out, Tumults quiered, and all both within and without in a great Calm. He marched with his Army by Grays Inn Lane into Temple, and from thence down Temple Lane, and so through Temple Bar, along the Strand, to White-Hall. The Three Regiments of Horse marched first, and He in the Head of them gallantly mounted, with his Trumpets richly Habited before him, and several Led-Horses after him, with many of his Chief Officers, and several Perons of Honour and Quality; and after them marched the Foot: The Speaker of the House met him in the Street near Somerset-house, where they Complemented each other; After which the General marched on to White-Hall, and the Speaker went to the Rolls; As soon as the Soldiers were Quartered, and all the Guards fat, the General was vis'd by several of the Council of State; and being invited to take his place there, he went in Compliance with them: But when the Oath of Abjuration was tendered, he refused it, for the Reasons before-mentioned, and was therefore not admitted, whereupon he returned to his Apartment. The next Day was spent in Vilits to him, from all the Members of Parliament, and many other Perons of the highest Quality: Mr. Scot told him, The Parliament did intend on Monday, publickly in their House, to give him their Acknowledgments of his Service, and that they expected he should there make publick Prefisions of his Affiliations to their Interest and Authority, and his Difikes of the Abjuration, for the Secunded Members, and a Free Parliament.

He made little Anfwer to him, but that he was much obliged to them, for the Honour of so great a Respeft, and shou'd endeavour by his future Services, to give Evidences of his just Renfentments of it.

It is observable, That from this time, in all the Orders to him from the Parliament, they called him only Commissioner Monk, and not General: And although yet no publick Order had supereded the Commiſion of Command in Chief, sent to him by the Council of State, they allowed him no Authority, but conjufit with others, whereof he took little notice, but proceeded as before in the sole Exercise of the Command of the Army. He was somewhat perplexed, how to behave himself in the Parliament, in reference to the great Professions and Pretentions they expeeted from him, of his Averfions from the King and his Party, to balance his refusing the Oath of Abjuration: But he resolved to act in that occasion, as moderate as the Season would bear, and yet to temper his Speech fo, as not altogether to fail their Expections.

On Monday, which was the Sixth of February, he was brought to the Court of Wards by Scott, Robinson, and some other Members; after which, Scott acquainted the House with his being there: Whereupon the Sergeant with his Mace being fent to attend him, carried it before him, Scott and Robinson conducting him into the House, to a Place on the left Hand within the Bar, where a Chair faced with Velvet was fet for him to fit on.

As soon as he had made Obedience, the Speaker bid him sit down; but he defining his excelled, and standing behind the Chair, the Speaker expreffed himself to him in these words:

I that been a common Observation, that the lighter Passions have a loud Voice, but such as are of greater Magnitude are always silent: As it is in Passions, fo in Actions also; those of a leffer Dimen- sion, are often magnified above their Mea- sure, but Historians do commonly fail in the Expressions of Noble and Great Acti- ons, and such are frequently lefiened; and so it may well be in those of this Days Remembrance: The Infallible Author tells us, That in Judea is GOD known, and his Name is great in Israel; That Knowledge and Greatness of GOD is vouched in the Influence of Martial Affairs, That the stout-hearted are spo- lied, they have flipt their fleec, and none of the Men of Might have found their Hands. This is vouched this Day amongst us here present, that both We and You might acknowledge, that it is GOD, nor Man, that hath performed this Great Work; that We his Creatures here may neither ascribe it to our Wisdom, or Tour Valour, but that it was GOD alone, and none elfe. But yet I have always obferved, that albeit the Glory appertains to the LORD, yet the Influence of that Glory...
Glory extends itself to the Instruments in his hand; and thereby those Beams enlighten your Honour and Valour, as an especial Instrument; not as a Merit, but as a Reward upon your Prudence and wise Conduct. The Knowledge of what hath been done in this our Restitution, is not unknown in these Nations: I believe, to this Part of the World, how our Friends (as we conceived) left Us, and what Defection hath been in Duty and Truth. The Face of this Land was covered, with a Gloomy and Black Cloud, and the whole Nation left, in the Judgment of Man, to the uttermost of Ruine: But, in that Condition, We did as the Prophet, in the greatest Misery of Israel, espy a little Cloud, no broader than a Hand, which is infinitely, in an instant, become the Refreshment of the whole Nation; that little Cloud was discern'd afar of in your Hand, and by the Prudence of your Wise Conduct, it discerned the Miseries of these Nations, and became a Glorious Mercy to them all. This House hath a true Refreshment of your Prudence and Conduct in this Great Work, and have commanded Me to return their hearty Thanks: But I must not end here, for they have also a full Sense of those Noble Commanders, Officers, and Soldiers, both of their Fidelity, Valour, and Duty, in this Expedition: And as I have returned to You their Thanks, so it is their Desire, that you should return the same to Your Commanders, Officers, and Soldiers, who have been Instrumental in these Affairs.

After he had ended, the General stood up and spake as followeth:

Mr. Speaker,

Amongst the many Mercies of God to these poor Nations, your peaceable Restitution is not the least; it is (as you said) his Work alone, and to Him belongs the Glory of it; and I esteem it as a great effect of his Goodness to me, that he was pleased to make me, amongst many worthier in your Service, some way Instrumental in it. I did nothing but my Duty, and deserve not to receive so great an Honour and Respect as you are pleased to give me at this time and Place, which I shall ever acknowledge as a high mark of your Favour to me.

SIR, I shall not now trouble you with large Narratives, only give me leave to acquaint you, That as I marched from Scotland hither, I observed the People in most Counties in great and earnest expectations of a Settlement, and several Applications were made to me with numerous Subscriptions to them; the chiefest Heads of their Desires were for a Free and a full Parliament, and that you would determine your Sitting; a Gospel Ministry, Encouragement of Learning and Universities, and for admiration of the Members Secluded before the year 1648. without any previous Oath or Engagement. To which I commonly answered, That you are now in a Free Parliament, and if there be any Force remaining upon you, I would endeavour to remove it; and that you had Voted to fill up your Houfe, and then you would be a full Parliament also; And that you had already determined your Sitting; And for the Ministry their maintenance, the Laws and Universities, you had largely declared concerning them in your last Declaration; and I was confident you would adhere to it: But as for those Gentlemen Secluded in the year 1648. I told them, you had given Judgment in it, and all People ought to acquiesce in that Judgment; but to admit any Members to sit in Parliament without a previous Oath or Engagement, to preserve the Government in being, it was never done in England.

But although I said it not to them, I must say, with pardon to you, That the fels Oaths and Engagements are imposed, (with respect had to the Security of the Common Cause) your Settlement will be the sooner attained to. I am the more particular in these matters, to let you see how grateful your present Consultations about these things will be to the People. I know all the sober Gentry will clothe with you, if they may be tenderer and gently used; and I am sure you will so use them, as knowing it to be the Common Concern to amplify, and not to letten our Interest, and to be careful that neither the Cavalier, nor Phan- tick Party have yet a Share in your Civil or Military Power; of the last of whose Impatience to Government, you have lately had severer experience. I should say something of Ireland and Scotland; Indeed Ireland is in and make Wors.

by your Interruptions, which prevented the passing an Act for the Settlement of the Estates of Adventurers and Souldiers there, which I heard you intended to have done in a few days;

and I presume it will be very quickly

done, being so necessary at this time, when the Want of the Common wealth call for Supplies; and People will unwillingly pay Taxes for those Estates of which they have no legal

Authority: I need not tell you how much you were abused in the nomination of your Officers of your Armies

there; their malice that deceived you,

had been sufficiently manifefted: I do affirm, That those now that have declared for you, will continue faithful, and thereby Evince, that as well as there

as here, it is the sober Interest must esfblish your Dominions. As for Scotland,

I must say, The People of that Nation deferve to be Cherifhed; and I believe your late Declaration will much glad their Spirits; for nothing was to them more dreadful, than a fear to be over-run with Phanatick Notions: I humbly recommend them to your Affection and Esteem, and desire the intended Union may be prosecuted, and their Taxes made proportionable to those in England, for which I am Engaged by promise to become a Sitter to you: And truly, Sir, I must ask leave to intreat you to make a speedy Provision for the Civil Government there, of which they have been destitute near

a Year, to the ruine of many Families: And except Commissioner for managing the Government, and Judges to try in Courts of Judicature, be speedily appointed, that Country will be very miserable.

I directed Mr. Gamble lately to present some Names to you both for Commissioners and Judges; but by reason of your great Affairs, he was not required to deliver them in Writing, but I humbly present them to your Confi-deration.

And to concluding, he delivered them the Paper wherein the said Names were contained.

Some and some others were much offended that he affirmed so much in this Speech, and were once thinking to Interpose. They complained to their Confederates, That he was too

positive in undertaking for the Officers in Ireland,

of whose Affections to the Parliament in the present Conflagration of it, there was just cause of conclude, and that in the whole Speech he seemed to offer Proposibility, and gave the Cavaliers a possibility of being received into the Exercise of

Privy, with a total Exclusion of the more brill Parliament-Trophy, under the Nomin of Phanickick.

But that which at this time more diqhted thee men than the General's Speech, was the confounded Carriage of the City; for the Common-Council had been in very high Debates about the Government, and were resolved to pay no Publick Taxes till the House were filled up with equal Representatives: This they looked upon as drawing towards a Contempt of their Authority, and thought they could not better provide for their own Securities, than by opposing in time, and punishing such Commotions; they therefore on the eighth of February in the Evening at the Council of State Order the General to go into London

be next Morning with a good part of the Army, and to force upon Eleven of the most Active of the Common Council, and commit them to the Tower, as also to pull down the Pofts and Chains, and take down the Gates and Periculuses of the City, and Quarter his Souliers there, till they were reduced to Obedience.

The General was surpriz'd at this Command, and debated many things with them in mitigation or suspension of it, till near one in the Morning the next day; but nothing could divert their Resolution; so that he was forced to obey their Orders, or quit his Command, for he had no longer time to deliberate than that very Morning in which they were to be put in Execution; insomuch, that after three or four hours respite to refresh himself, he marched into the City, and pulled down the Pots and Chains, and took into Custody Nine of the Citizens whose Orders to force and Orders to pull them down by themselves: The Nine Imprison'd, were Mr. Lawrence Bromfield of Tower-Street, Alderman Vincent, Alderman

Birdsworth, Mr. Thomas Brown of Woodstreet,

Mr. Daniel Spencer in Friday-street, Mr. Penning

in Fan-Church-street, Mr. Jackson, Mr. Chub-berlain, and Mr. Richard Ford. The City was much Alarm'd at this proceeding: And the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and several of the chiefest of the Citizens applied themselves to him to moderate his Actions. All the City indeed seem'd as People confounded with wonder and Anxiety. And Colonel Hubbethorn, and others, the General's own Officers, were many of them so much troubled, That they came to him to offer up their Commissions,

rather than be employed in such an Action:

They told him, The honour and respect they had to his Person engaged them never to force again

him, or dispute his Orders: But in this, since they did not without horror-dey them, they with tears pray'd him to dis perse their Commands to some more necessary persons. He was moved much at these their passionite expressions, but privately informed them of his own dislike of what was Commanded; and therefore Conjured them to continue their Confidence in him, and execute what he had given them in Charge, as that from which better effects would

The General Writs to the House, to mitigate their Com-ments.

They, so much the more flirred up, found more rigor-ous Orders than before.

The General Commands the Gates and Percullices to be broken down.

Mr. Jefby’s Prudent Speech to the General.

the City, till several Designs of theirs for the further humbling them to their purposes should be effected; and there was a Whisper as if he were to have been Questioned for it. It was also artificially contrived, that the same day the Gates were pulled down, a Petition from a Ficcious Phanatic Party of Citizens was presented by one Praffe-God-Barebone to the House to Consequence the Action, and to press an Oath of Renunciation to be taken by all that should be employed in Civil and Military Affairs; nevertheless, to please the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, they had the Thanks of the House for their Moderation in this time of disorder in the City.

That Evening Clerges privately went to the General, and represented to him the ill Consequences of his Proceedings in London: And that the Influence that City had by Commerce, and other occasions, all over England, would quickly diffuse the Infamy of the Fact: And all the Cities and Towns would be Alarm’d, believing if that Great City should be made a Village, all their Franchise and Privileges would be quickly Subverted. So that he had no way to redeem his Reputation, but the very next Morning to return into the City with his Army, and declare for a Free Parliament. The General, though he demurred a little, upon this Counsel, yet he seemed very sensible of the Contempt they at Westminster had put upon him in the whole Progress of this Affair, and was resolved after a day or two’s private Consultation with some of his Officers, to do something to regain the Esteem he had lost; for the performance of which, he said, He would take time but still Tuesday Morning. This was the effect of their first Discourse. But a while after, Dr. Barrow came to Clerges earnestly urging him to renew his Advice to the General, putting forth, That delay might give his Enemies time to put out of his power the doing what he intended; And that it was most necessary to be speedy in the retrieving the good Opinion of the City, to manifest thereby the greater dislike of what he had done the day before, as that to which the necessity of the time (against his own Inclination) pressed him to. Whilft they were in this Discourse, Two Officers of the Army, in whom the General then had much Trust, came into them, and they altogether went to him again, and, with the same Arguments reiterated, diffuaded from delay; Adding, That they had certain Intelligence, that the Council of State began to be Jealous of him, for that little Power he possessed the City in the execution of his Orders, and that he should therefore in Prudence provide for his own Safety. Barrow was appointed to gain what Intelligence he could against the next Morning; And the General with Clerges, Thompions, Sanders, and Burton, Who two last were advised with as two Officers that very much inclined to Admission of the Secessioned Members, Concluded what to offer to the House as a ground for their March into London: At last, waving all thought of making any excuse for marching into the City, They conclude, That Orders should be privately fitted for about a dozen of the Chief Officers, in whom he had greatest Confidence, to meet at Six the next Morning at the General’s Quarters, and for...
for the drawing of some men together before White-Hall, to be ready to March; and that a Letter should be sent to the House in the Morning signed by the General and a Select number of Military Officers, to complain of many Irregularities committed by them: Amongst others,

That they gave too much Countenance to Lambert, Vane, and several that engaged with the late Committee of Safety; And that they had permitted Ludlow, and some others, to Sit in their House, that had been by Sir Charles Coxe, and fellow of the Irish Officers, accused of High-Treason: And had Countenanced too much a late Petition, to exclude the most Subr and Confederates both Ministers and others by Oaths, from all Employment and Maintenance: And in Conclusion, to Request, That by Friday next they should Issue out Writs to fill up their House, and when filled, should vise at their appointed time, to give place to a Full and a Free Parliament.

The General, having agreed to these Heads, retired to his repose, whilst the rest penn'd the Letter, which he directed to be drawn in his Name, and in the name of the rest of the Officers of the Army. The next day the Officers, who had been sent for to meet at White-Hall, repairing thither early in the Morning, the Letter was produced and read to them, (the General being present) and by all of them approved of; whereupon the General Signed it, and with him several Colonels (viz.) Sanders, Read, Lydcoat, Knights, Cloberry, Redman, and Hildothorn, one Lieutenant Colonel, which was Ethelbert Morgan, who commanded the General's own Regiment of Foot, and six Majors, Johnson, Barton, Smith, Bunifer, Pryme, and Nicholls; Cloberry and Lydcoat were sent with the Letter to the House, and Clarges at the same time was sent to my Lord Mayor, to acquaint him with the General's Intentions to come and Quarter his Army that Night in the City; and to dispise him and the City to give him a favourable reception.

These things thus ordered, the General immediately marched away to Finchbury, where he drew up his Souldiers, till he should hear from Clarges how the City would receive him: Who finding my Lord Mayor very reserved, and averse to the General's coming, as terrified with his Actions the day before, he had applied himself to Alderman Robinson, and some others that he distrusted, and acquainted them, that the General's coming was for good to the City and Kingdom; but did not in fine in the Particulars of what was in agitation, having had Orders to conceal that, till it was known how they at Westminster should receive the Letter; Nevertheless, Robinson sends for two or three Aldermen of his Confidants, and with them they go to the Lord Mayor to mollify him, but without any effect for the present: Nevertheless, Clarges told him, the General was resolved, though he quarted not in the City, at least to be his Guest at Dinner; And according y he sent to the General, to desire him to march with all his men to Leaden-Hall-street, to the Lord Mayor's Door, which he immediately did. While Matters were thus carried on in the City, the House was in great Disorder at the reading of the General's Letter; but they temporized so far, as to shew no publick Distraetion, but Ordered,

That the Thanks of the House should be given to the General for his Faithful Service in securing the City; and that, as filling up the House, the Parliament were upon Qualifications before the Receipt of his Letter, and the same should be dispatched in due time, and that Mr. Scott, and Mr. Robinson should attend him with their Votes, in Answer to his Letter.

As soon as the General came to the Lord Mayor, he told him, He was very welcome to his house, but that the City was full of Fears and sad Apprehensions of his sudden Return, after such violent Actions as the Day before his Soldiers had been employed in. The General told him, He hoped to make them of another mind in few hours: Yet was he inwardly somewhat troubled, not knowing what hindrance this Clouds he found might give to his Delights; infomuch, that he called Clarges aside, and check'd him, as one who had over-hastily press'd on him, upon so little time of Consideration, to go to great an Enterprise. To which, he answered, That he was not so far advanced to go back and that the least Advice he could give him was, to desire the Lord Mayor presently to appoint the Aldermen and Common Council to meet him at four o'clock a Guild-Hall, and there to acquaint him with his real Intentions, to comply with the dellores of the whole Kingdom.

This Motion pleasing, and the said Request being accordingly made to the Lord Mayor, Orders were immediately sent out: but in the meantime, Scott and Robinson came to him from them at Westminster, with the before-mentioned Answer to the Letter.

Scott made Proclamations to the Parliament, Affection to him, and their high Opinion of his Services, thereby to divert him from his Intentions of staying in the City: But Colonel Bridges, an Officer of Ireland, that stood by, told them, The General had no reason to credit their Fair Speeches, since their Words and Proclamations agreed not together, as was manifest in their Contempls of these his Friends in Ireland, who for his sake hazard'd themselves in their Service; And when he came from the Irish Army to improve Ludlow and Jones of High-Treason, he could have Time, but his was put off from Day to Day, when Peace-God Barebone could be heard and admitted with a Sadistic Petition the first moment he came to the Door of the House, And Cloberry told them, The General and all his Officers could not but perceive that they grew Jealous of them, and that they went about to Balance them with such as had been their Enemies, which made it high-time for them to consult for their own Safety.

The General closed all with Moderation, telling them, All would be well, if they strictly observed the Advice of the Letter, and that he would sit on Friday next for filling up their House.
An Act for continuing Five Commissioners for the Government of the Army.

With this Answer they returned to their Fellow-Members, not very well satisfied, as was evident by what they did that very Afternoon in the House; for they passed an Act to divide the Government of the Army among Five Commissioners; namely, General Monk, Sir Arthur Hatherley, the Colonels, Morley, Walton, and Allured, and made the Quorum of them to be Three.

This was opposed by many of the General's Friends, but they were not enough to hinder its Progress; at last, for an Expedition, it was moved, That General Monk should always be one of the Three for Quorum: But upon putting the Question, 'was carried in the Negative. When word was brought him of this their Ingenuity to him, he could not avoid expressing much Indignation at it.

The Lord Mayor and Common-Council, being met at Old Hall about Five of the Clock, the General told them.

That the Employment wherein he was was fat, at his leaving the City, was the most ingrateful to him that ever he undertook, and so much against his Inclination, that if anything left of quitting his Command, could have prevented it, he had never accepted such Employment; nor did he value his Commission, out of any respect to himself, for he had often declared it to be, but as knowing how much it imported both him and them, to keep it out of the Hands of such as most probably would not be so well inclined as He, to the Settlement of those Nations; That what he had news to them, was, That he had that Morning sent to the Parliament, to issue out Writs within seven days, for the calling up of their House; and when called, to sit no longer than till the Sixth of May, to give them Place to a full and a Free Parliament.

The News of this was quickly dispers'd through all the City, and received with great Demonstrations of Joy, expressed in Bells, Glasses and Ringing of Bells.

After this, he retired for some time to a house in Cheapside, to give order for the Quartering of his Soldiers, and went himself to Lodge at the Globe-house in Broad-street, till Drapers Hall could be accommodated for his Reception.

The Monday after his stay in the City, the Council of State writ to him, To defire his Presence with them, to assist with his Counsels, in the carrying on the great Affairs of the Nation.

To which he the next Day returned Answer,

That till the Oath should be taken away, which put a bar to him, and many others, from sitting as Counsellors, his Presence could not be useful to them there; And wish'd, he inform'd them, That the Diffractions of the City were increased by the continuance of Arms in the Hands of Phantastics, and Perfunctors, to the Parliament, who had 7000 lastly out of the Stores deliver'd to them, and were preparing more: Wherefore he defire them immediately to recall those Arms; and wish'd, to exeuse his stay in the City for some longer time, till the minds of the Citizens were compos'd.

The Mayor and Aldermen of the City, and the Chief of the Officers (bearing how earnest the Parliament was to draw him again to White-Hall,) importuned his Continuance in the City; and to induce him to it, they assure him, it cannot be safe for him, or them, that he remove; for that they had certain Information, that many private Letters were sent from Hatherley, and others, to withdraw the Affections of the Souldiers from him, and that certain men were employed to several Regiments to debauch them: This Information had been enough to induce the General, had he not been resolved before: So that when Colonel Allured came from the Council of State, to persuade him against staying in the City; he acquainted him with what he heard.

Allured laboured to influe a Belief in him, of his having been mis-informs'd in those things, it was answer'd by the General, That he put no greater stress on these Reports, than to urge it to the Alarms and Motions of the several Parties, desiring the belief of them till time should evince the truth. But he allured him, He advertised from Perfons of good Fames, That notwithstanding that Lambet was preferred, and Vane put out of this Parliament, and ordered to leave the Town; yet the stay of the latter was convinced of, and Sir Arthur Hatherley, and several others, corresponded with them both,

Sir Arthur Hatherly writ many Expostulatory Letters, to free himself of these Imputations, but could not sufficiently clear himself of them. And now by more frequent Addresses than ever, the General is from all Counties solicited to the admiss of the Secluded Members, which he only delayed, because the Army was not yet in a Tempor for it; but to prepare them, he received Visits from some of the Secluded Members, where they were always admitted, to hear by their Discourses, how well they were inclined to the Settlement of the Peace of the Nations. In this Method he for some time past, on the 5th of Febrary, to have a Conference before him, of some of the Secluded Members, and some of the others. Those of the Sitting Members, were, Sr. John Hatherley, Morley, Thompson, Ashley-Cox, Weaver, White, Field, Hutchinson, and Rawleigh; Scott and Reynolds also were intended by the General to be there, but for want of timely Notice they came not.

The Secluded Members that met them, were, Sir William Lewis, Sir John Evelyn, Sir John Hooland, Sir Gilbert Gerrard, Colonel Popham, Mr. Armitage, Mr. Knightly, Mr. Crew, Mr. Trevor, Colonel Harly, Colonel Norden, Sir John Temple, and Colonel Birch. They discours'd of many things, in order to a manual Accord, for the Peace and Welfare of the Nations, but came to no Conclusion; because the sitting Members durst not undertake for the rest of the House, without their Consent, which could not be known but by Vote; Yet severally all of them who were then present seem'd well satisfied with that Moderation, and Temper, which they found in those Gentlemen with whom they conferred.

The General was fully bent to promote their Admission so far, that if it could not be done... by Common Consent, he resolved to admit them without it.

The Officers of the Army were consulted with, and they were willing enough to have them fit, on condition they would promise to declare for a Common-Wealth Government, and pass an Act for the Confirmation of the Peace of their Lands, stipulated of since their Seclusion, and to agree upon a short time for their Dissolution. Wherefore, to try how far they were inclined, to admit of those Conditions, Mr. Clarges, Colonel Claverry, and Doctor Gamble, were appointed to treat with some of them, who, when they met, had many Discourses of the whole Matter;

The Secluded Members declared, as to Government, they intended no alteration in it, or to All further than in preparation for a Parliament to succeed them; and since there was no other way for their Suffrages, but by Priests, in the Name of the Keepers of the Liberty of England, by Authority of Parliament, they saw not how there could be by that Constitution any other Government introduced: As to Confirmation of Sales, and Dispositions of Lands, they said, they had been all made since the Seclusion, and they would not alter them, but rather mediate with the next Parliament, to pass on for their Confirmation, and for the time of their Sitting, they were contented it should determine in a Months time. Claverry urged the great Insecurity the Army and many of their Friends would be in, if their Publick Lands were not confirmed, which was the Price of their Blood; and though their not disturbling such Possessions in England, might be a little Satisfaction, yet the whole Nation of Ireland was unsettled, both as to Adventurers and Soldiers. To this it was replied, that they should not think themselves in a Capacity to pass any Acts at all, as being but one House; and to prevent all jealousy of their Allies, they would consent to be Limited to the Chief Heads of what they should consult, during the short time of their Continuance.

When the Conference ended, Report was made of the Substance of it to the General, and the rest of the Chief Officers, who approved of every thing proposed by the Secluded Members, except the not Confirmation of Publick Dispositions of Lands, and their refusing to pass any Acts of Parliament: As to that of Lands, which they would not be drawn to confirm, Clarges told the Officers, they could not answer it to the Kingdom, to break with them for that Consideration, thereby to obstruct the Settlement of it, out of respect to their own private Interests; he said the greatest part of his own Estate was in Ireland, and that it was acknowledged by all, the greatest Insecurity of Publick Estates was in that Kingdom; yet he would for his own part submit all his Concerns to the Determination of the next Parliament; rather than by opposing the Admission of these Gentlemen, contribute to the hazard of the Publick Peace. And as to that of Publick Acts, he told them, He doubted not, but they would alter their Opinions, because no Money could be raised, to supply the Necessities of the Government; nor could their own Dissolution be, but by an Act.

The General, upon hearing this, seemed very much satisfied; upon which, all the rest agreed. And it was agreed, that the Secluded Members, that were in Town, should, before their Admission, sign a Paper, to consent to confine their Consultations, chiefly to the Four Heads following.

1. To the settling the Conduct of the Armies, in the Three Nations, as might be most serviceable to the Peace of the Nations.

2. For the providing Maintenance for the Forces by Sea and Land, and Money for their Arrears, and the Contingencies of Government.

3. To the appointing a Council of State to settle the Civil Government and Judicatures in Scotland and Ireland, and to take care for the ensuing of Priests for the Summoning of a Parliament to meet at Westminster the 20th of April.

4. To their own Legal Dissolution.

This Subscription was willingly made, and on Tuesday following in the Morning, the General gave them a meeting at White-Hall. In Whence, after a short Speech to recommend to them the Settlement of the Nations, with that assurance, That he would impose nothing on them, they went to take their Places in the Parliament; being Conducted thither by Captain Miller who Commanded the Guards.

As soon as the Members were gone, the General Summoned all the Officers of the Army together that were then in and about London, to consider of a Letter to be sent to all the Regiments in England, Scotland, and Ireland, to have their Concurrence to what had been done concerning the Admission of the Secluded Members; which was referred to a Committee to be drawn up, with special Directions to satisfy them, That nothing was intended for alteration of Government, but that it should continue as a Free State and Common-wealth: This he did, in regard he knew it impossible, as Affairs stood, to keep the Army in Temper any other way. The Letter was in a little time prepared, and to many Clerks were employed, that Copies of it were that Night Signed and distributed to all the Regiments and Garrisons in England, and to the Commanders in Chief of the Armies in England, Scotland, and Ireland. It was penned in these Words:

Dear Brethren and Fellow Souldiers,

You cannot be Ignorant of the many Endearments and earnest Desires of many good Men, in these Nations to bring Us to a Settlement, which it both pleases God to disappoint us this Day, and leave Us as broken and divided People, what before was ready to run into Blood and Confusion; Which, by the Grace of God, we might prevent so great Calamities impending;
after our earnest seeking God for his Direction and Affiance, We find no Expedient so likely for the Satisfaction of the Good People, and the Quiet and Welfare of this Common-wealth, as the re-admission of the Secluded Members, in order to a Legal Dissolution of this Parliament by their own free Consent; and to Issue Writs for a future full Representative of the whole Common-wealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, under such Laws, as may secure our Country, to Convence on the Twentieth day of April next at Wealthinster, for the Dissolving of this Common-wealth upon the Foundation of Justice and true Freedom. And to take away all just Jealousies from you, We do assure you, That we shall join with you in the maintenance of those Ends, and do expect your Cheerful Concurrence with Us; having no Intentions or purposes to return to our old Bondage; But since the Providence of God hath made Us free at the cost of so much Blood, we hope we shall never be found so unfaithful as God and his People, as to lose so glorious a Cause; but We do rejoice with the Affiance of God, to adhere so long in the continuing of our dear-purchased Liberties, both Spiritual and Civil. The reason of Our preceding in this manner may seem strange, but if you duly consider the necessities of our Affairs, and the present State of things, you will certainly conclude nothing so safe to secure Publick Interest, and the Safety of the Nation peaceably to submit to a Free State, as the said Members having given us full assurance, that their Sess in Parliament shall be no longer than absolute necessity will require, to the putting the Government into Successive Parliaments, they not being free to stop all the old Writs, as when they shall be called upon a Common-wealth, accept: And it is the Opinion of the truest Friends to a Free State, That it cannot be inconsistent with the perpetual Sitting of these Members, being contrary to the nature of such a Government.

And as We are confident the present Parliament now Sitting, will not Repeal any of the Acts, Ordinances, or Orders of this present Parliament, for Sales, or publick Dispositions of Lands; so the Bill in our Station observe, and cause to be observed, all other Acts and Ordinances of this Parliament whatsoever, and humbly interpose with the next Succeeding Parliament, not only to pass a further ACT of Confirmation of all such Sales and Dispositions of Lands, here and in Scotland, but also of the Distributions and Dispositions of Lands and Houses in Ireland to the Secluded, Adventurers, or any other Person, made by or in pursuance of any of the Acts, Ordinances, or Orders of this present Parliament, or any pretended Parliamentary Authority. And We intreat you to send up an Officer to give to the Lord General Monk an Account of your Acquiescence with Us herein.

And if any disaffected persons shall take occasion to make disturbance of the Peace of the Common-wealth, either in favour of Charles Stuart, or any other pretended Authority, We desire you to secure them till the pleasure of the Parliament or Council of State be known in that behalf. You shall speedily receive Encouragement and Supplies of Money; and indeed it was not the least Motive to induce Us to this way of Compounding of Affairs, that we might facilitate the raising of Money for the Subsistence of the Army and Navy; which would not otherwise have been done (if at all) but with eflusion of Blood. We have nothing more at this time, but to assure you that We shall ever remain,

Zzzz 2. These
Thee Transactions were managed with so much secrecy, that the Members that were sitting in the House knew nothing of them, till they saw the Secluded Members come in and sit amongst them. Upon which they being surprised, were at first at a demur among themselves, whether they should keep their Seats, or quit the House; till at length the grand Sticklers of them for a Commonwealth, well knowing that it would not be in their power by playing, to make their Interest good against those who were now the major Party of the House, resolved, since they could not hinder them the partial possession thereof, to resign it intire unto them, while those of them that were the most moderate and well inclined stood behind, and took their Seats amongst the new admitted Members: Who in the first place applied themselves to vindicate the honour of their House, as far as in them lay, by nullifying and expunging out of the Journals all Votes whereby they were disabled from sitting as Members therein: Next, they Order Mr. Vincent and Mr. Bromfield, and the rest of those Citizens which were committed by the Council of States Orders, when the City Gates were broken, to be released; as also all others who were any where Imprisoned upon Sir George Booth’s Railing, or for making Addresses for the Admission of the Secluded Members: Moreover, they Constituted General Monk by ACT of Parliament, Captain General of all the Armies of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and repealed that ACT which made him only a Joint-Commissioner with Colonel Morley, Halford, Walton, and Allen, for government of the Army.

Some there were of these restored Members, who at the first admission, could not well be present, by reason of their far distant Habitations; of which number was Mr. William Morrice, whom Mr. Nicholas Monk, the General’s Brother, knowing him to have a Prudent Person, and well disposed for his Prince’s Service, and the good of his Country, wrote to Clarges to put the General in mind of sending for him, that being near him, he might be affiduous to him in his Counsels: To this the General was easily persuaded, having had long before by his Brothers report of him, a good Opinion of his Abilities and Worth; and the rather, for that by his Wife he was some what allied to him. Clarges acquainted Mr. Nicholas Monk with what he had done, and inclosed a Letter from the General to Mr. Morrice, to acquaint him with his admission of the Secluded Members, and to desire him to repair to the Parliament: Where he arrived whilst they were Sitting, and took his place in the House; wherein he appeared a most useful Instrument by his great Abilities, in promoting and carrying on of the General’s Affairs in relation to his Majesties Interest.

The Parliament repealed the ACT for the former Council of State, and the Oath of Abjuration; and passed an ACT for another Council to consist of One and thirty Persons: A new Council of State chosen.

Most of them Men of Integrity, and well affected to Kingly Government.

The General hearing that Colonel Rich was about St. Edw.’s Tower, and having actually despatch’d Two Troops, was endeavouring to corrupt the rest of his Regiment, he sent the Life Guard to reduce them, and gave a Commission to Colonel Inigo dey to Command the Regiment.

The Life-Guard had been lately in defection with the rest of the Troops under Lambert, and had not been mustered since the Reinstauration of the Parliament, nor had hitherto any Commander in Chief. And therefore the General thought fit at this time to model that Troop, and to give the Command thereof to Captain Philip Howard, making Mr. Robert Harley his Lieutenant, and his Kinman Mr. Henry Monk, Cornet; who were so active, that in six hours time they displaced all of whom they had any suspicion, and filled up the Troop with honest and gallant men; who immediately marched towards Suffolk, to execute the General’s Orders upon Colonel Rich; but he having notice of the marching of that Party towards him, retired privately, and The Life-Guard modelled, and conferred upon Capt. Philip Howard.
the Regiment quietly received Col. Inglis'd to Command them, who by the General's appointment put out all such Officers as were of foremost and sedued Points in Religion or Government.

And to reduce North-Water to a more settled Condition, than it was in at that present, the General gave Colonel Carver a Commission to be Governor of Beaumaris Castle, (the Souldiers whose在外 had been placed there by Colonel John Jones,) with authority to raise Forces to reduce Denbigh and Conway, which had been in very ill hands, and to settle that Country in quiet; which he did in a very short time; to the great satisfaction of all the Gentry and People in those Parts.

The late Common weels-Parliament before the admission of the Sceluded Members, had given Decleror's Regiment to Colonel Welton; but the General disposed of it to Colonel Charles Howard of Naworth, whom he also made Governor of Carlisle.

The Parliament passed an All of Affirm for a Hundred Thousand Pounds a Month for Six Months, and proceeded with much haste to settle the Militia both in the City and all other Parts of England and Wales, having vacated the former Act made before their admission, because most of the Commissioners and Officers all over England, were of Itefons of suspected Inclinations to the Government.

There being at this time an unusual Confluence of Officers of the Army in London, and some Troops and Companies drawing together in several Parts of the Kingdom; The Parliament by Proclamation Commanded all Officers to repair to their respective Charges, and not to depart from thence without special Order from the Lord General: And that all such Troops and Companies as had removed from their Quarters without the Lord General's Licence, should return forthwith to their last Quarters for merely Affignee, or to such others as should be Affigned them by directions from the Lord General.

But notwithstanding all this Care in the Parliament, Colonel Overton was designing to make Disturbances in Torkfshire. He drew up a Letter to Colonel Fairfax, Colonel Bethell, and Colonel Smithson, which he caused to be Subscribed by all his Officers; And therein signified to them;

That having received intimation from private hands, That the abandoned Interest of Charles Stuart doth seem so to shine in the face of Publick Transactions, that many Scoundrels and Diftatisfactions were created amongst their Brethren in the Army, who remained faithful to the true Cause they had contended for, insomuch, that (as it was represented to them) several Regiments had declared their disconcerne with these present Distractions; and their Resolutions in adhering to the Cause God had determined with Victory against all Monarchical Interests, they could not but judge it incumbens upon them to make in such a time, and to endeavour to be found in the discharge of that Duty which their Instruments Commanded from them; wherein as on the one hand they were unwilling to appear precipitate in their proceedings, so on the other they were afraid to fall short of a timely interposing of their Assistance against that old Bondage which was likely to break in anew upon them: And therefore they thought fit to expostulate that Intimation unto them, and desire to understand as well what was their Fences, as what was signified or imparted to them: That as they were equally engaged and concerned in one Publick Cause, so they might (if occasion required) be as conjunctively abating and affixing to the defence of it; which through the Assistance of God they were resolved to offer and maintain; (as the fruits of their Blood, the Nations Treasure, and the Prayers of the People of God against any design whatsoever which threatened the ruins of their Civil and Religious Rights.

Many Copies of this Letter were dispersed amongst the Souldiers before the Original was sent, and an Attestation added in these words, This is Overton's and the Officers of the Garrison of Hull's Letter: And it is hoped, will meet with the Conciourse of all our honest Fellow-Souldiers who have been engaged in the Good Old Cause against the Interest of a King and Single Person.

If Colonel Fairfax, Smithson, and Bethell had not been very Active, this practice had perverted many Souldiers; but they were vigilant to prevent it. Upon knowledge of this Letter, the General writ to Overton by Colonel Albred and Major Smith, to give him Satisfaction in his proceedings here; and the Council of State upon his Motion did the like, Major Smith was well known and beloved in Hull, and, the General having a Design to Remove Overton, he was privately to deal with some Officers and Souldiers under him who loved him not, to bring him to Reason, if upon Orders for his Remove, he should be disobedient to them; And as soon as they were gone, he sent private Orders to Colonel Fairfax, (to whom he gave a Commission to be Governor of Hull) to draw some Companies to Beverley, and Write to Overton to repair immediately to him, his Letter was sent to Colonel Fairfax open;
open, that he might see the Import of it. The Letter was in the following Words:

SIR,

I have seen a Letter from you and some others at Hull, dated from that Garrison on the 28th of February last, and directed to Colonel Fairfax, Colonel Bethell, and Colonel Smithson; wherein you Complain of the present Transactions of the Publick Affairs, as if they tended to the bringing in of the King and a Monarchical Bondage, which (you write) seem very likely to break in anew upon us, and threatens the ruine of our Civil and Religious Rights: All which, you say, is derived to you from private hands, which do not only intimate their Private jealousies, but inform you that several Regiments have declared their disaffection with the present Transactions. I must confess, I am a little surpriz'd at this your Letter and manner of Proceedings, having so lately sent to you from my Self and the greatest part of the Officers of the Army, a full Accomp of the necessities that induced us, to consent to the return of the Secluded Members to the Exercice of their Trusts; and our Resolutions to that Cause we have so long contended for, and to the Parliament in the prosecution of it: And (notwithstanding the Information you pretend to have received) I cannot in my own observation discern any Grounds for such apprehensions of Affairs here as you seem to entertain: nor has there appeared a discontent in any one Regiment of the Army, except part of Colonel Rich's Regiment, which is since reduced: wherefore (although you pretend not to be too precipitate in your proceedings) your dispersing Copies of your Letter before you sent it, may reasonably make me judge otherwise: And if you profess the matter further, I cannot but interpret your Action as sending to divide the Army, by withdrawing their Obedience from the Parliament, and consequently to involve the Nations in a new and bloody War. So that to avoid all occasions of this nature, I desire that within twenty four hours after this Letter comes to your hands, you set forward from Hull towards London, to give me an acco of the present posture of that Garrison; And that wishin Six hours after this comes to you, you signify to Colonel Fairfax, and Colonel Bethell, your Compliance herein, and the Day wherein you intend to begin your Journey, and be with me here, where I shall expect you within a Week after your departure from Hull, I have written to Colonel Fairfax more particularly concerning the Peace and Safety of the Northern Parts; and of the Garrison of Hull; and if he Communicates any Orders from me to you, I expect your obedience to them.

Yours,

George Monk.

Colonel Overton was surpriz'd at the receipt of this Letter, but finding himself in no Capacity to dispute the Order for his delivery up of Hull, he submitted to it; And sent to Colonel Fairfax to acquaint him with his Resolution; And himself at Eleven of the Clock, the same Night, began his Journey towards London to the General.

The General about the same time gave his Commission to Mr. Clarges to be Commissary General of the Mullets of England, Scotland, and Ire; and to Mr. Morris to be Governor of Plymouth; and to Major General Morgan to be Commander in Chief of the Army in Scotland.

Morgan was already upon the place, but wanted sufficient authority, till he had this Commission sent to him; and all the Army there submitted there to the General's Actions in Reference to the Secluded Members, except a Company in Garrison in the Isle of Orkney Commanded by one Wulfon, which was reduced by Captain Mann, and Wulfon and his Officers imprisioned, and his Company disbanded.

Many private Overtures were made to the General by some of the Peers that fate in the Lords House a little before the death of the late King, to be admitted to Sir; but he thought it inconvenient and hazardous, in regard the Army was already so Jealous upon the Siting of the Secluded Members, that he had difficulty enough to moderate them. Yet at the Request of the Earl of he sent Commissary General Clarges to Confer with him.

The Earl told him, The Siting of the Lords would be very advantageous to the good of the Kingdom; and to the Soldiers in particular; for that they would fore in an Act for the Confirmation of their Estates: And if it should be thought convenient for the good of the Kingdom to receive the King, he could not open any Conditions with so much Safety, he referred, as such as should be made by Act of Parliament.
To this Clarges Replied, That the General was very well satisfied, that the Parliament was Dissolved by the Death of the late King; and that the present Sitting of the Members, was a Constitution rather taken upon Necessity, than Right, which was but to make way for another Parliament; That one great Argument for the Admission of the Secluded Members, was their Content to a quick Dissolution; which could not be, if the Lords Should Sit: For they would then think themselves invested in that perpetuity which some fancy is of rights to this Parliament still. But that which was most convincing, was, That the Army was not yet in temper for it.

Every Post brought the General Addresses from all the Regiments in England, of their Consent to his Acting: And Sir Charles Cot in Ireland had with many other Officers upon the same day that the Secluded Members were admitted, declared at Dublin for them, and had secured Sir Harrods Walker, that had diffented from him.

Those of the former Members who flaid in the House after the admission of the Secluded Members, that they might engage the General against the King, promoted an Act for the settling of Hampton Court, with all the Parks and some other Lands upon him and his Heirs for ever; which troubled him, that he used all the Friends he had to divert it; and at last an Expedition was found out, by giving him, by All of Parliament, a Present of Twenty Thousand Pounds in Money, and the Custody or Stewardship of that House, and the Parks for his life; They also Conferred upon Commissary Clarges the Hampton Office: And about the 15th of March they Ordered, That the Engagement, appointed to be taken by each Member of Parliament, in these words, (viz.) I do declare and protest, That I will be true and faithful to the Common-wealth of England, as the same is now established without King or House of Lords, should be taken off the File and made null.

Set, Hebling, and some others, (whole names shall forbear to mention, because they are yet living, and have repented of the rashness of their former Proceedings) were much alarm'd at this proceeding, which they took to be an inevitable Prognostick of introducing the King; and though they so much affected Power, as to endure no Rivals in it, they chose rather to have the General take the Dominion of the Three Kingdoms upon himself than to have the King restored: They consulted privately with some of the Officers of the Army, whom they trusted most, and those approved to well of the Expedition, That the General was Treated with about it in White-Hall; Where Hebling told him, That many of his Friends were much troubled at the Parliaments Actions, which tended both to the ruine of him and all the good People of the Nation, since it was evident that by what they had Voted the day before, nothing was intended but the restitution of the King. His answer, they said, must needs succeed the admission of the King; for a Merit too great to be Rewarded, could have no recompence but death, whereof frequent Examples are to be found in all History, and in none more pregnant than our own, where it is Recorded, That the same Stanley who placed the Crown upon Henry the Seventh's Head, had his own Head struck off, upon a very frivolous pretence, when the reason was only excess of Merit. They told him likewise, They found a Commonwealth-Government not agreable with the disposition of the People, who are always but judges of what is left for themselves, and therefore since a Single Person was necessary, there could not be one fitter than he be that Office. To which they had very good grounds to believe all the good People of the Nation would concur with them.

The General told them, He himself was not well pleased at the late unnecessary Vote of Parliament concerning the Engagement; but many of the most different Members had been with him, and satisfied him, That they had no design in it, but to keep themselves free against the next Parliament; for in regard (they said) That he had conceived that the final determination of Government should be referred to that, they were unwilling to anticipate their (heirs) by determining it by that Engagement; which would be too great a Snare unto them: Still urging, That they knew not any case he should have of fear, for that they were as sure of Summons of the next Parliament, did sufficiently defend the Government, in restraining their Debates to it. As for the Government in his own Person, he said, The Experience of Cromwell's Fate gave him Reason to avoid the Rock on which that Family was split.

They Replied, That Oliver Cromwell usurped the Dominion against the Suffrage of the Army, and the Consent of all the good People, whereas he should have it by their unanimous consent, and under what Name and Title he pleased to accept it.

The General would by no means hear more of these Temptations, resolving not to lose the Honour derived to him from as Ancient a Stock of Gentry as any was in England, by so trescherous a Prostitution of it.

A little before these Men went to the General, Commissary Clerges had been tampered with by them, to the same purpose; and observing them to go from him to his Lordship, he deliberated how to extricate him from further applications of this kind, and punish the Insolency of these underakers.

The Council of State Sitting at the time of this private Conference, and within two Chambers of the place where it was Transefed; he went in to the Council to Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, and informed him of what he knew, and what he farther suspected: Upon which it was agreed, That a soon as the General should depart from them, and come into the Council, he should move, That all Clerks and Attendants, that were not Councillors, should withdraw, and the Doors be lock'd, and then declare, That he had had Information of a dangerous Design in some fidious persons who

The Engagement abrogated.

King CHARLES the Second.
who were contriving to make Disturbances in the Nation, and that they had proceeded so far as to make some indelict Overtures to him; of which he declared that the Council might receive a full discovery, that thereupon they might apply themselves to prevent the Consequences of it.

But the General being unwilling to expel those men to ruin, (though they deserved not his favor,) because his Purposes were designed to be effected by the most peaceable ways, told the Council, That there was not so much danger in agitation as they apprehended; but that it was true, some had been with him to be resolved in tempers concerning the present Transactions in Parliament, but they went away from him well satisfied.

Thus the goodness of the General was abused; for these unreasonable men, when they saw they could not allure him to their ends by the temptation of power, attempted to make a Mutiny in the Army; wherein they prevailed so far, as that the Officers had had one Meeting, and had appointed another. In their first, they were so heated, that a Declaration was immediately prepared, and brought by some of them to the General, to oblige him to his Army to declare for a Commonwealth, and engage against all them that should attempt the setting up of a Single Person; and that he should send to the Parliament to join with them in this Declaration.

Commissary Clerges and Mr. Clark, the General's Secretary, were with him when this was brought to him, and observing great trouble in his Countenance at the reading of it, moved, That he would defer the signing or giving any opinion of it till the next Morning, because the Officers of the Army were to have a General Council. This was done, that the General might have time to provide himself of Arguments against it, and prepare some of his Friends to join with him: One of the chief Motives that induced him to make Mr. Morris an Officer of the Army, was to have his aid in Conjunctions at such times as those: For there were frequent Meetings of Officers, and one of so good Judgment and Eloquence as he, could not but persuade much: So that he had been the fitter Person that could have been thought on, had not his being unacquainted with such Assemblies made him not care to be present at them.

The next Morning a great Concourse of Officers met at St. James's: And Colonel Key opened the Council, with a long Speech, of the fears they were in of an Invasion of Evils, breaking in upon them, to invade their Civil and Religious Liberties; and that if great Care was not used to prevent it, Charles Stuart would be introduced; And that the last Expeditions that could be thought of, was to send immediately to the Parliament, to oblige them to declare and engage for a Free-State and Common-wealth, without a King or House of Lords: And if they refused to do it, to take such a Revenge as God would put into their hearts to force the Nation from definition.

Commissary Clerges Answered, That he saw Commisary Clerges as he saw other Persons imployed to the matter.

They yet attempted to make a Mutiny in the Army.

A Declaration brought by the Officers to the General to Sign.

The General concluded, and told them, The time of this Parliament ending was so near, they could not do the ill's some of them (he hoped) causally feared; And that from the next Parliament he doubted not they would receive better Satisfaction than they had in this, since it was provided in the ACT for their Assembling, That none should be elected that had been against the Parliament since 1643. Withal, he confirmed what Commissary Clerges had said, That if by this violent proceeding they should make the Parliament hastily Dissolve themselves, and leave the Nation in Confusion, they must not expect he would take upon him the Government, which he had rather lose his life than accept.

After this, there was little moved by any of the Officers; Only one said, That nothing could be hoped from Qualifications for a new Parliament; for they themselves being to be Judges of them, it might so happen, that the major part might be of such as were not themselves Qualified.

The General knew this to be an unanswerable Argument, (and it was for this reason he preted for a new Parliament on any terms) but was unwilling to bear more discourse of this kind, and therefore told them, Nothing was more injurious to Discipline, than their meeting in Military Councils to interpose in Civil Things. And from that time he forbade them to assemble again; and within a few days after, these officers left. On the Seventeenth of March, the Parliament by Act dissolved it itself, having before summoned a Parliament to succeed them the 25th day of April following.
The Conference between Monsieur de Bordeaux, and Co-Commisary Charges.

Monsieur de Bordeaux, the French Embassador then resident in London, was very diligent to interfere Cardinal Mazarini, in this great Revo-lation of Government, and having had acquaintance with Charges, expected by him to discover all the Generals' Designs, and in order thereto, sent his Secretary to him. To detain him to move the General, to have License to give him a visit, and to confer about some overtakes he had to make to him.

Charges, upon this interview, went to the Embassador, who carried him into his Closet; and they two being alone, he told him, "That it was visible to all, that the General had some great Design, in projection, and that most wise men believed it was, either to advance himself to the Monarchy of those Nations, or introduce the King; and that in either of those, he had the advantage of being more servicable to him than any other; for, if he should use any Englishman in so important an intrigue, if he should not have success that would be brought in evidence against him to his distraction: Whereas if he as a stranger, and a public Minister could not be questioned. He further said, "What he propounded, was not only in reference to himself, but to England. He who would fail to have him, the honour of his friendship, afflit him faithfully in all his purposes. He laid moreover,
That he could not undertake to determine, Whether it was best for him to dignify his Family with the Empire of these Kingdoms, or to restore the King to them: They were both actions of much glory; and if the latter were as safe, the honour of it would be as great:
But that he might be confident of the Cardinal, he did assure him, that Oliver Cromwell kept so strict a League with him, that he did not allume
the government without his privy, and was directed step by step by him in the progress of that action: And therefore, if he recoived on that course, he should not only have the Cardinals friendship and Counsel in the attempt,
but a safe and honourable support in France, if he failed in it. Or if he would admit the King, and put the manner of it into the Cardinals hands, whatever he would desire for him, safely of Security, or honour from the Crown,
he would undertake to obtain, and in such a manner, that it should rather fecem by the Cardinals advice, then his particular Inclination;
and the King would gladly receive it, and France should be the place to which (if he agreed) the King should prefently retreat; where he should have a Train provided proportionable to his greatnes, that his People here might, with greater Reverence, apply themselves to him;
and by this way (he said) the General might not only oblige the King of England, but the King his Master also, by making him a Medi-stor and Instrument in his Restauration.
To this Charges answered, "That the matter was too deep for him to be involv'd in, in regard (as himself had acknowledged) of the danger of having such a secret known to any re-cond Perfon a Native of England.

But notwithstanding, to satisfy him, he assured him, That the General did not intend to take upon him the government, but submit all to the determination of the next Parliament.

He then replied, "That a Parliament in England was a kind of tumultuary Council, to various in their Debates, that no certain measure could be taken from them, and therefore for not taking this course which he advise'd, he might be hurried by their froward proceedings, and to some fudden Enterprise, neither for his himself, nor good for the people, and that with him, in any misfortune, all his Relations would be ruin'd.

To this Conference, Charges put an end, by telling him, "He would take a fudden occasion to found the Generals Inclinations; and though he would not directly tell him what had pass'd betwixt them, he should nevertheless guess, whether it might be fit for him to impart it to him; the only difficulty that remain'd, was the Generals want of the French Tongue,
Which the Embassador said, "Was not nec-Ssary, for that he had English enough to be understood, and to understand all that should be told him; and thus they parted.

Charges told all that pass'd to Mr. Morrice, and to the General himself, who absolutely re-fuse'd to have any Commerce with the Embasdator or the Cardinal; nevertheless, that he might appear well, he was contrived to receive his Visit, but on Condition, That he should not propose any thing to him in reference to the publick affairs of Government.

This was signified to the Embassador, and he came that Evening to compleat the General,
making great professions of his Services to him,
on all occasions, without defending to particular.

Much more successful was the Application made by Sir John Greenville, who being an active Agen for the King, and a near Kinman to the General, was therefore by his Majesty thought a fit person to be employed to him; but he knowing the wary temper of the General, was much troubled how to get access to him; till behinking himself of Mr. Morrice, his Neighbour in the General, he told him to a person whom conversing with the General, he concluded by his mediation to do it, and thereupon requested him to let the General know, he had something of great importance to impart to him, and desired he would give him the opportunity to do it.

When Mr. Morrice inform'd the General of this, he receiv'd it with much strangenes; for although Sir John was his near Relation; yet by reason of his youth, and the Generals long ab-ence from his Country, they had little acquaintance with each other, and therefore he told Mr.
Morrice, Except he would send him information by him, of the nature of his business, he could not admit of any intercource with him.

Mr. Morrice told him, He had already desired to know that, but Greenville refused it. The General in his mind, liked well of this referrefnes in Sir John, and bid Mr. Morrice acquaint him,
That if he came the next day at nine in the evening to St. James's, he would speak with him. And accordingly Greenville came to him, at the appointed time, which was the next evening, after the dissolution of the Parliament.

When he came, after he had requested Parton for the importunity of his vife; he defined his permission to deliver a Message he had to him Aaaa
from his Majesty. The Generall seem'd surpriz'd at this saying, but feeing that there was no body in the Room but Mr. Morris, and he at a good distance from them, he bid him say what he pleas'd.

He then prefented to him a Letter from the King, and told him, That his Majestie had great Confidence in his affections to him, and since he had complify'd so far with the desires of all the sober part of the Kingdom, for the admission of the Secluded Members, in order to a free Parliament; The confquences of that could not but give sufficient evidence of his Inclinations to his Majesties Service and Restitution, which would naturally flowe from his Endeavours, in Conjunction with their Councils.

The Generall replied, That he had long lamented the miserable distractions of his Native Country, and waited a fit occasion to contribute his affiance to the Redemption of it. And when Lambers and thohe with him had Interrupted the Parliament; Considering that the Army had been newly in a great measure by that Parliament model'd, he suppos'd by a Declaration for their Restitution he might gain a Pursuivance in his hands for better purpofes, and as the better to bring thofe his purpofes about, he resolve'd if by his Arms the Parliament should be restored, together, with thohe few Members which fate at their interruption, to admit thohe also who had been excluSe'd, intending to that end, by degrees, to put his Army into fuch hands as would favour his intentions, that it was well known to all, How he was disappointd in that design, and though what difficulties he arrived to the Station he was then in, nor was he even at that time feare of great danger of disappointments, if he should not manage his affairs with more then ordinary secrecy.

As to the Kings Majestie (he said) None wished him greater felicity than he, nor desired his Reformation with more passion, but if he were not cautious and attempted, it would be out of his Power to ferv them in it, since in Councils fo nice concurrence, there would not be room for two Errors. The People he told him, had been long feduc'd by feditious infinuations, and the Army in the hands of fuch, as had alwayes been againft his Royal Father, and many of them even againft Monarchy it self; but nevertheless, he hoped, if they might find the same security under his Majesties Government, as they had under the Ulurpers of it, he might not depair of their reafon to obedience. And to effect this, it was his humble advice, that his Majestie should prevent their fears, by declaring a free and general Pardon to all his Subjects, and engage himfelf to give it under the Great Seal, to all that should submit to his Authority, except fuch as should be exempted by the Parliament.

And that he would content to any Acts of Parliament, that should be prefented to him for the fettlement of publique Sales and Dispositions of Lands, to Officers, Soldiers, and others; and the payment of the Soldiers Arrears; As alfo for toleration of Liberty of Confcience to all his Subjects, And that none fhould be punifh'd for differences in matters of Religion, whofhould not disturb the publique Peace.

Sir John asked him, What he would give A further difcourfe between them, confirming the fuccefs of the Generall Intentions. If his Letter fhould be intercepted before he had compleated the Reforming the general Interes of Armies, it would be impoffible for him to keep them in temper, or hinder the fubversion of all he had hithefore done; Adding, That he fought not his own advantage in his Endeavours for the publique benefit of his Country; and that having with much hazard, brought matters near to a fair issue, in purfuit of the general suffrage of the Nations, he was unwilling by in- dication to venture a relapfe, but would choose to involve himself in the fame Condition with the generallity of the People, in expectation of what the next Parliament fhould bring forth, to the happiness of his Majestie, & all his Kingdoms.

Sir John Greenville writ down the faftance of this Discourse, and repeated it to the General, to be the better able to retain it in his Memory, but as soon as he had read it, he entreated him to tear it in pieces, and perfon whofver with their Conference except the King himfelf, and to requiff them also to conceaf it. But above all things, he inftreammed, To defire his Majestie from him, to go out of the King of Spain's Dominions, to Breda, or any other place under the Government of the States of the United Provinces, for that he had certain Intelligence, he would be detained by the King of Spain's Ministers, if he fray'd in his Dominions.

And at Sir John's parting from him, he told him, He was glad that this occasion of preffenting his Duty to the King, was an effect of his diligence, whom he was glad to find so intraduous and vigilant in his Majesties Service; of which he had before fame experience when his Brother Nicolas came from him into Scotland.

He promis'd to observe all the Generals Intentions, Sir John takes his Journey to Brussels, and when he arrived the 29th of March, he left the Generals to part with him in Writing, and diglised it in form, to be prefented to his Majestie. And in the Conduft of the whole affair, he was fo secret, that the Lord Mordant, who went over with him to his Majestie, knew nothing of it.

At Brussels he retir'd to a private house, To give his which his Majestie (upon intimation) very accurately repaired, and with great fatisfaction receiving the Intelligence he brought; but because he could not prosecute the Generals design (as to his removal) without advice for the manner of executing it, he confulted the Marquis of Orione, the Lord Chancellor, and Mr. Secretary Nicholas, being perfons in whom, from great reafon and experience, he had most intire confidence, by whom the affair was order'd, that in two or three days, he took his Journey to Breda; The King relieving them, where we shall leave his Majestie in Confultation, to return to the Transactions in England, of that buflime time.

The Council of State took care to have the Act put into speedy execution throughout England, for the Election of Members to serve in Parliament, and for putting the Militia into fober hands: And because many feditious People were endeavouring to debauch the Army, they publifhed a Proclamation to forbid all perfons whatsoever, to correspond with any of the Officers and Soldiers.
Souldiers of the Army in the way of agitating, or otherwise, whereby any dissatisfaction might be raised towards the present government, to endanger the peace of the Nation, giving power to all Officers, both Military and Civil, to seize upon any of all the Regiments as it were afield: And for the better encouragement of all whom it should concern, they declared, and promised to give to the discoverer of any such person, who should apprehend and secure such offenders, the sum of ten pounds. And this Proclamation was ordered to be published in the Head of every Regiment, Troop, and Company of the Army, to the intent, the same should be the better taken notice of, and put in more effectual execution: And the General sent it to every Regiment to be proclaimed accordingly. But this did not sufficiently prevent the ill humour amongst the Souldiers, which made Commiitary charges contest privately with the General, about some other more effectual course; he propos'd to frame an engagement for all to subscribe, to acquiesce in whatsoever the next Parliament should do, and to displace all that should refuse: His Lordship liked very well of this Proposition, but thought it very hard to lay such a scheme as it were, he encouraged him to go on, and that night he alone fram'd it, and immediately advis'd with Colonel Howard, Sir Anthony Ashley-Cooper, Mr. Asley, and Colonel Knight (who all of them with one content approved it, being all persons of great credit with the General,) about the putting it in execution; Colonel Knight undertook by the next day at noon, to get it signed by all the Officers of his own Regiment, and the Generals Regiment of Horfe, and the Life-guard; and Colonel Howard did the like for his Regiment which lay about Croydon, for he had to mould'd it, that it was sure of all his Officers; all which by the foresaid time, being accordingly effected, they met together, at Sir Anthony Ashley-Cooper's Lodging, and glad to fee their business was well advanced by the subscription of these three Regiments; they in the next place, thought it expedient to bring the Officers of the Regiments in London, to be summons'd to meet that Evening at St. James's, which was accordingly done, and they being all met, it was mov'd to them by Colonel Knight.

That at this time, when severall imputations lay upon the Army of Inconstancy, and that many dishonourable persons were endeavouring to divide them, it was requisite they should give some publick testimony of their Affections and inclinations; and in order thereto, some officers having favours done them as Adreasses, which they had fraudit to be praenit to the General, to testify their Resolution of obedience and duty, to the Powers God had placed over them; He could not but approve so well of it, as readily by himself, and all his Officers, to give their Association to it, and some more had done the like, being intended by those who first advit'd it, to be tendered to every Regiment of the Army; of which being a great part here, they had by the Generals Permission invited them thereto, to concur in what was done, and to define their Compliance with them in it.

Colonel Knight and Clerges had before prepar'd most of the Officers of the Regiments which came from Scotland, so that they made no difficulty of it, especially seeing a subscription of

Other Regiments to induce them; Moreover, it was intimated, That their Meeting was by the activity and paffion of the General, which Obligation they knew none would offer to oppose. The Address was immediately read, being in these words:

_W_ _E_ _t_ _he_ _Officers_ _of_ _the_ _Army_ _under_ _the_ _Form_ _of_ _your_ _Excellencies_ _Command_ _whofe_ _the_ _Arms in_ Names are heretofore written, being truly fefible of the _merciful_ and wonderful _Providenee_ of Almighty God, in bringing Us, after so many_ _Re_ _volutions_ _and_ _Changes_ _into_ _an_ _hopeful_ _way_ _of_ _Settlement_ _and_ _perceiving_ _to_ _our_ _great_ _grief, that there are too many, who seeking more their own private Interests, than the Publique Good, are endeavouring to reduce us again to our old Necessities and Contitutions; and that they have proceeded to far, as to cause Jealoufies in the Council of State, in whom the supreme Power and Truth, now, till the Meeting of the Parliament, is referring, Do hold it our Duties, for the preserving of all such advantages for the future, and for the strengthening of your Excellencies Hands, in the carrying on of this Good Work, in which it has pleased God to make you so highly instrumental, humbly to make this Address unto your Excellency, to the Name of our selves, and all the Souldiers under our Command, and to Declare, That We shall, according to our Duties, carry and believe our selves, as Officers of an Army instructed by your Example and Discipline, to obey, and not to displease the Orders of our Superiors, and shall freely and readily observe such Commands, as we shall receive from your Excellency, or the Council of State, or the Parliament when Assembled: And, in particular, we shall, according to the late Proclamation of the Council of State, of the 17th of March, decline any Meeting or Meetings, for the converting or carrying on any Declaration or Subscriptions, concerning Affairs of State, or Government, thereby avoiding those Mifconceptions, which made many lately in Arms, sojournably distress'd to the People, by making themselves a desired Interes from the rest of them, And we are the more willing to make this Address at this time, in order to give all the World an Integrity of our Obedience, because of the general resolution of the next Parliament, from whom we hope for a happy Settlement to all the Nations; And that they may have no ill Approbations of Us, We are resolv'd, as it becomes Us in Duty, to submit to whatsoever the Lord shall bring forth from their Consultations, knowing that Parliament only can secure Us in our Religious and Civil Rights: And forasmuch as many Representations hereunto made to Persons in Eminent Authority, have been too frequently conveyed in the Name of the Army, which were done rather in Formality, (As we perceive by the Event) that otherwise, We do solemnly declare, that this may be Recorded as a Testimony and Witness against Us, if ever We shall be guilty of any such Backslidings.

At that very time, this Engagement was signed by Lieutenant-Colonel Morgan, and all the Officers of the Generals Regiment of Foot; by Colonel Hibblethorn, and all the Officers of his Regiment; by Colonel Cabbery, Colonel Lydeast, Colonel Read, and the rest, with all the Forces under their their Officers; which made up in all, with those that had sign’d before, Ten Regiments of Horse and Foot, besides the Life-guard, and all the General-Officers. Also, Collonel Fairfax, and Collonel Bethel, who upon the first Constantial of this Matter had been sent unto, in four days had return’d the Subscriptions of themselves, and all their Officers; after which it was agreed, that Collonel Howard, with fourty Officers, should present it to the General; which was done at St. James’s the 9th Day of April, and was with much satisfaction and content received by him: It was also afterwards recommended to Major-General Morgan in Scotland, to have it subscribed by his Officers there, and likewise to all the Regiments in England, with an Accomplice of what had bin done in London, and the Names of all those Regiments that had concordit.

And because he heard that some disaffected Persons were tampering to seduce the Soldiery in Scotland, he sent another Regiment of Horse, and a Regiment of Foot thither, who were of such as Major-General Morgan might confide in, to affit him, if need were, to model the rest. In conclusion, this Address was subscribed by all the Regiments, and the Subscriptions return’d to the General; only some Officers refus’d it, and were immediately displace’d, and the General took that opportunity, of giving to the Lord, after the manner of the above-mentioned Addres to the General, Collonel Lambert having made an Escape out of the Tower, was conceal’d by some of that Party, that had been lately ingaged against General Monk, and some of others of Fanatique Principles: These held a Council in London, but were not to private in their Conflutations, but the General had from time to time intimation of much of their Proceedings. They sent some buffe men to all the Regiment in England, and those Officers that refus’d the Address, had retained the Arms of the Troops in their Hands, but such was the vigilance of the rest of the Officers, that there got not above Seven or Eight Troops of Horse in a Body to join with Lambert, but one Company of Foot.

The General takes great care for the suppreffing of Lambert.

On Wednesday the 18th of April, the General, upon Advice from Colonel Streeter, of Lamberts hovering in the North Parts, and of the want of Horse in his Quarters; sent for Colonel Ingoldsbey to him, and told him, He must be at Northampton with his Regiment on the Saturday following; and that he should receive Orders to take any of Collonel Koffter’s Troops to his Affilliance, which quartered in those Parts: He alfo told him, That Collonel Streeter, a Person whom he could Trull, was with some of his Companies at Northampton, whom he would find ready to join with him. The Collonel told him, That his Regiment was dispers’d in Norfolk and Suffolk, but he would do his endeavours to get them together. And he was so diligent herein, that by the Friday following he got his Regiment to Cambridge, and on Saturday in the Evening to Northampton.

The General also sent Collonel Howard with his Regiment, and some other select Troops, towards Warwick Shire, and Warwick Shire, to hinder any Detection of the Troops in those Parts, and to have an Eye towards Coventry, which Lambert had design’d to Garrison; and indeed he had done it, but not the Care of the General prevented it, by Ordering three Companies of Colonel Streeter’s Regiment to Quarter in that City: The Colonel also sending one Company more to strengthen that Place, who in their March met with a Party of Horse, among whom was one who having been Major to that Regiment, shew’d them Lamberts Orders, to march back again; But the Lieutenants that was Intrusted with the Command of that Company, observing the Collonel’s Orders, marched entire with great speed, stood upon his defence, and opposed them Twice in his march thither.

The Council of State by Proclamation, declared Lambert and his Adherents Traytors, and the General was careful the very next day after his getting out of Prifon, to give Notice of it to all the Regiments and Troops, to prevent their Design of reducing them, and to command them to seize on him: By which Diligence, and the sending thence Parties out, his Confederates were interrupted in their Endeavours. One Harvey, a Disaffected discontented Officer, of Collonel Smithson’s Regiment, had主意 fourty of Captain Feverell’s Troop to revolt, with Design to seize on Tork, but by the care of other Troops they were displace’d; and one Everard, and Captain Lockier, two discontented Officers, that had been lately in Custody, and releas’d upon their Engagement, not to act any thing in Disturbance of the Publicke Peace, did nevertheless march through Nottingham, with a Sedtious Troop of their Companions.

Whereof Captain Sherman of Collonel Sanders his Regiment, having notice, drew out his own Troop, and that of Captain Craddocks of Hackers Regiment, to engage them; but immediately Craddocks Troop joyn’d with the Enemy, which made Sherman (finding himself too weak for the purpose) to retreat to Nottingham, to secure that place, where the Aldermen and Gentry, gave him ready affilliance. This News made the General give Orders, That the late Address sign’d by the Officers, should be tendred to all the private Soldiery also, which made fo through a Reformation, that in many Regiments Thirty of a Troop disbanded, rather than they would confer to it, and many in the Foot Companies also left their Arms: But in all the General’s Regiments in London, that marched with him from Scotland, there were but two Dissenters.

On Eater-Eve, Collonel Ingoldsbey join’d with Collonel Streeter at Northampton, where he was at that time, and had been some days before, The Earl of Exeter who with several Loyal Gentlemen of that County, to the number of near near one hundred Horse, with much Resolution offered to assist Colonel Streeter: Likewise the Trained Bands of that Town were in Arms at the same time, in order to the securing thereof, in case of a Necessity of Colonel Streeter's attending Lamberts Motion: The Colonel purposing that Night, it should have been, to have mounted 400 Foot of his Regiment with the Horses that came into the Town that day (against the Fair on Monday following) and to have beaten up Lambert's Quarters.

On Easter Day early, Intelligence was brought to Colonel Ingoldsby and Colonel Streeter, That Lambert was at Devonport: upon which they marched towards him: When they came to Devonport, they heard Lambert was march'd two miles from thence, and therefore halted to meet him; which they did, in a plain Field, where a little Brook parted them; Lambert had with him, besides the Troops of Horse before-mentioned, thele Perfons, viz. Colonel Okney, Colonel Axell, Colonel Cobber, Lieutenant-Collonel Young, Major Creed, Captain Timothy Clare, Captain Gregory, Captain Spinage, besides divers private Souldiers, who were Aldermanists.

The two Parties faced one the other next four hours; during which time, Collonel Ingoldsby, and Collonel Streeter spent their time, partly in their vigilant Observation of the Intention of the Enemy, and partly in Encouraging of the Horse and Foot under their Command, whereby they beguiled a more than ordinary Resolution in both Horse and Foot: In the mean time, Lambert sent out several Scouts towards them, but Ingoldsby would not permit any of his to leave their Ranks, only he himself riding up towards them, had many Difcourfites with them: Ingoldsby was not known to the Scouts, but appearing to them as a private Souldier, dealt Effectually with them, by laying open the danger of their Action, that 25 Troopers, with a Quarter-Mater, came over to him. The Collonel difmounted and difarm'd them for the present, because they were unwilling to engage in his party but afterwards restored their Horses and Arms to them.

Lambert's delay in Engaging being observed by Col. Streeter, he Advised, that the both Horse and Foot should immediately advance, and put the Britons to an Issue, out of the Confidence he had of the Foot especially: And withal deified Coll. Ingoldsby, That if he should be Routted, he would Really with what Speed he could; For that he should be Confident to find the Foot to maintain their Ground. Collonel Streeter's Foot being about Five Hundred; two Complete Companies, the rest Commanded Men out of several Companies, mof Pikes, which in that Champion-ground would serve well to secure the Body against the Horse.

When the two Bodies came near, just as Col. Ingoldsby was going to Charge, Collonel Streeter Commanded six Files of Musqueteers to advance, one File gave fire, and hurt one or two of Lamberts Horse; his Drums beat, and in good Order he advanced, having given first Command that his Musqueteers should not give fire till they came as near as Path of Pike. But Lamberts men held the Noses of their Pifhons towards the ground, and Neither's Troop came off to Ingoldsby: Hazlitt's Troop having defeated him before; for Collonel Ingoldsby sending Captain Elsmore before him with a party, as he march'd to find Lambert, met Captain Hazlitt, and took him prisoner, but releas'd him upon his Parole, to tend his whole Troop over to Joyn with Ingoldsby, which he faithfully performed; fending it to them by his Quarter-Mater, but he retir'd himself: Collonel Ingoldsby told Lambert was his Prisoner: Whereupon Creed and the rest earnestly interceded him, to do what he pleased with them, but to permit Lamberts to escape; acquainting him, That his Life could be of no advantage to him; Which Ingoldsby absolutely refufed, telling them, He would not be treacherous to those that had commanded him by such an ungovernable Act: Lambers then turned about his Horse, and attempted to escape; but Ingoldsby pursued him so close, that he came quickly up to him, and would not p互利l him, if he did not immediately yield. Lambert, in great deprevation of spirit, twice pray'd him to let him escape; but when he faw he could not prevail, submitted, as all the rest did, except Okney, Axell, and Cleer, who escap'd.

General Mountrage, who had been some time before the General's advice, made one of the Generals-at-Sea, (General Monk being himself the other) and sent to take charge of the Fleet, sent an Accent to the Council of State, of the Condition of it, how that Vice-Admiral Lawes, and with him the whole Navy, had receiv'd him with great satisfaction, and were all fix'd in obedience to their Authority, with Resolutions to submit to the Determination of the next Parliament.

The Tuesday after this Defeat of Lambert, the militia of the City of London drew into Hide-Park; there were Six Trained-Band Regiments, the Red, the Whife, the Green, the Blew, the Yellow, and the Orange, besides several Regiments of Auxiliaries: The Red was commanded by Collonel Baeman Alderman, the White by Collonel Wale Alderman, the Green by Collonel John Robinson Alderman, the Blew by Collonel William Fincent, the Yellow by Collonel William Bromfield, and the Orange by Collonel Thomas Blowdworth, all men of courage and good Affections, to the Peace and Felicity of their Native Country. They made up in all twelve Thousand Men: The General, the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and a great concourse of Noble-men and Gentlemen, were present at the Appearance. And that Evening, Collonel Lamberts, Collonel Cobber, and Major Creed, were brought Prisoners to the Council of State, and committed to the Tower. And the next day the rest of the Prisoners were brought by Captain Parry to the General, and by him committed to the Marshall-General.

The Defeat of Lambert did not make the Phatisrequais leave the pursuit of their Militia, feve rally Seditious Pamphlets being published in Print, to deprave the Minds of the People, and Tickets were thrown into the Courts of Guard in the Night to debauch the Souldiers. But none of them appeared to have been pens'd with more virulency and malice, than that vile Supposititious Paper which they letter'd round, carrying in its Frontispiece, a Letter from Brinnell, &c. with which some of his Majesties most imputible Enemies, attempted to popify, or palliate the now high Expectations, and Impressions of
of his good Subjects: And it was in truth so fataliy tim'd, and so stubbly contiv'd, that it had like to have done a great deal of mischief amongst some, who not acquainted with the innate, and unparallel'd inclination of his Majesty to Clemency, began to apprehend their forwardness for his Restitution, and to remit of their former Zeal: But this Hydra was distractfully cut off by Mr. Evelyn, whom we formerly mention'd, in a Reply which was printed, to the entire satisfaction of all that read it. I take pleasure to mention the Particulars; because upon another occasion, long before, he publish'd, with no small hazard of his Life and Liberty, that his Apology to the Royal Party, in answer to that Reflection, Entituled the Plea of the Army, contiv'd and fet forth by that Phanatick Power, immediately upon their Dethroning of Richard as being it forms no longer able to support the common, but unjust Reproaches of his Majesties Cauce, by Arguments deriv'd from their ill Conduct, and Fatal Success of divers of his Suffering Party, and because I take it to be the boldest Piece (not excepting even the famous King's Answer; written, as we once learn'd, by Captain Titus) that ever durst (for the light in that raging Period; and for that it was no less than thrice re-printed (an Honour which the Pamphlets of that Age did seldom arrive to) and observ'd to have won more Prophylaxes to the King, and kept up the fervor of his then almost expiring Party, than any thing of that nature had done before it: which, was a Service the greatest that Conjuncture was capable of, and none of the least to his Majesties Advantage all along; as those who shall pleae to call to mind the Effects of those Paper-Weapons, must needs acknowledge, by warming and inspiriting the Hearts of a Languishing and almost despoothing People, in danger of being prey'd on by the perpetual Venomed of his Majesties Adversaries, whose Pens as well as Swords, were daily sharpen'd against him, but for such fearomeable Antidotes, as upon all occasions encountered their Labels, and insidiously Discourses, amongst which there were also several Letters sent to the General from unknown Hands, to subvert his Allegiance likewise; and to Clarify it was written, That notwithstanding his Practices, to introduce the King and his Family, all his Endeavours were blasts'd by Morrice, who had described himself alon the Reputation of that Service, and disjointed to all the Royal Party, that he had no Credit with the General, and therefore to him only Application should be made, as to one in whom the General repose'd his greatest Trust. But these, and all other Artifices were too poor to subvert the Loyalty of one, who valued not to whom the good of his Services was attributed, if the Effects he defir'd were produced by them: But nevertheless, these Practices, to divide the Generals Friends, made the Council of State, the General, and all his Officers, more watchful for the Publick Peace, and more diligent in their Duties: The Officers began more and more to be convinced of their former Errors, by several publick and private Discourses of the Clemency and other Royal Indommiss of his Majesty: That which they most apprehended, was from Rumours which had been dispers'd amongst them, of the impaleability of all those of his Party, of whom it was said, if they had Power they would show themselves full of Rancour and Revenge: against all that were ingaged in the late War against them: and observing that most of the Members of Parliament were such, notwithstanding all the Qualifications for their Elections, many strange Doubts possest them, and amongst other Effects of their Diseased Imaginations, they fanc'd, the Parliament (when meet) would rather hinder, than promote his Majesties Goodness and Mercy towards them: But whilst they were in the midst of these various Iniquities, the Royal Party, in all the Counties of England, published several excellent Declarations, which fully satisfied and appeas'd their Minds, wherein they Declared, That they refused to adhere to the largest Assurances of amicable Agreement with all Persons; and that they would never put any Difference between such as should now unite with them, and those who first engaged in the same Perfidious with themselves. Of all which, we shall only herein publish one, they being all to the same purpose: It was intituled,

A Declaration of the Nobility and Gentry, that adher'd to the late King in and about the City of London; which was expressed in these words:

After the Miseries of a Civil War, and the many unfruitful Attempts towards Settlement, upon several Interests, and imaginary Forms of Government, It having pleased Almighty him, God, by unexpected and wonderful means, to give these Nations a probable hope of being restored to those Laws and Priviledges, which have been transmitted to them from their Ancestors; We do Declare, That we are resolved, next to Divine Providence, to attribute this Glorious Work to his Excellency the Lord General Monk, who, as he had the Courage to offer the Publick Liberty, and the Prudence to carry it on against so many Difficulties, has also had the Happiness, to lead Us thus far through the Wilderness of Confusion, without passing the Red-Sea of Blood. And because the Enemies of the Publick Peace, have endeavoured to represent these of the Kings Party, as men implacable, and such as would sacrifice the Common Good to their own private Passions; We do sincerely profess, That we do reflect upon our past sufferings from the Hands of God, and therefore do not cherish any violent Thoughts or Indications, to have been any way Instrumental in them: And if the Indecision of any spirited Persons, transmits them to Expressions contrary to this our feast, we utterly disclaim them. And declare, that the Impatience may extend no further, than the folly of the Offenders. And we further Declare, That we intend by our quiet and peaceable Behaviour, to testify our submission to the present Power, as it now resides in the Council of State, in expectation of the future Parliament; upon whose Wisdom and Determinations, we truft God will give such a Blessing, as may produce a perfect Settlement, both in Church and State.
This and the other Declarations of the same nature, where wholesome Preparations to all their advisers, in the Parliament, which met at Westminster on the 25th day of April, The Lords chose the Earl of Manchester to be their Speaker, and the House of Commons Sir Hardwicke Grimstone; where after the appointment of the usual Committee for Privileges, and other essential matters usual at their first AsSEMBLY. They gave all due acknowledgements to General Morell, for his Eminent Services and great Wisdom in subduing his Enemies without Blood, magnifying the Mercies of God, That made him so Instrumental to keep up the Nations from sinking, when no way appeared but Deliverance should arise.

Sir Arthur Haslerigg was by the General suspected to have contributed towards the Interruption of Lambert, but upon notice thereof, he came to him, and gave him evident proofs to the contrary, and promised to live peaceably at home; having before quietly submitted his Regiments of Horse and Foot to the General's disposal, together with the Garrisons of Berwick, New-Castle, Carlisle, and Tyrnowth.

On the 27th of April, Sir John Greenhill attended the General, and presented to him a Letter from his Majesty, to be communicated to the several Officers of the Army, and the Council of State, with a Commission from his Majesty to Constitute him Captain General of all the Armies of Jely, and a Commissioner for the Province of Ireland; Informed him of his Majesty's resolution, that he had Letters from his Majesty to both Houses of Parliament, the City, and the Navy.

His Excellency received the Commission with all Humility and Respect; but in regard the Parliament was Adjourn'd for three days, advised him the next day to deliver that Letter, which was to be by him imparted to the Council of State, to the Council at their next Sitting, which he accordingly did, but they would not presume to open it without the Parliament's directions, and took Caution of Sir John Greenhill to attend the House at their next Sitting. At which time, by the General's advice, he went, without acquainting them, to the House of Lords, to inform them he had a Letter from the King; who being acquainted that Sir John Greenhill attentia at the Door with a Letter from his Majesty, The Earl of Manchester went down to the Clerk and received it. The Letter had a Declaration inclosed in it; which were both read in the House: The Letter first, which was in these words (Vis.)

And as his Excellency hath not chosen the Sandy Foundations of Self-government, but the firm Rock of National Interest, whereas to frame a Settlement, it is our Hope and Prayer that when the Building comes to be raised, it may not like Rome, have the beginning in the Blood of Brethren, nor like Babylon, be interrupted by the Confusion of Tongues: but that we may all speak one Language, and be of one Name; that all mention of Parties and Faction, and all Rancour and Animosity may be thrown in, and buried like Rubbish under the Foundation.

Lightly, Truthly, and Right Beloved Counsellors, and Truthly, Right Beloved Counsellors, and Truthly Right Beloved; We Greet you well. We cannot have a better reason to prostrate Our Self an end of Our Common Sufferings and Calamities, and that Our Own Just Power and Authority will with God's Blessing be restored to Us. Than that We bear You are again acknowledged to have that Authority and Jurisdiction which hath always belonged to you by your Birth, and the Fundamental Laws of the Land: And We have thought it very fit and safe for Us to call you for your help in the Compounding the Confounding Di- stiflings and Distractions of the Kingdom, in which your Sufferings are next to those We have undergone Our Self. And therefore you cannot but be the most proper Counsellors for removing these Mischiefs, and for preventing the like for the future. How great a Trust We repose in you, for the procuring and establishing a blessed Peace and Security for the Kingdom, will appear to you by Our inclosed Declaration; Which Trust, We are most confident you will discharge with what Justice and Wisdom that becomes you, and must always be expected from you; and that upon your experience, how one violation succeeds another, when the known Relations and Rules of Justice are once transgressed, you will be as jealous for the Rights of the Crown; and for the Honour of your King, as for your selves: And then you cannot but discharge your Trust with good success, and provide for, and establish the Peace, Happiness and Honour of King, Lords, and Commons, upon that Foundation which can only support it, and We shall be all happy in each other: And as the whole Kingdom will be lost God for you all, so We shall hold Our Self obliged in an especial manner to Thank you in particular, according to the affection you shall express towards Us. We need the left in large to you upon this Subject; because We have likewise wrote to the House of Commons, Which We suppose they will Communicate to you: And We pray God to bless your Royal Endeavours for the good of Us all. And so We bid you very heartily Farewell.

Given at Our Court at Breda, this 14 day of April, 1660. In the Twelfth Year of Our Reign.

The Declaration was next read, which was Inscribed,

His Majestie's gracious Declaration to all his loving Subjects.

Charles R.

Charles by the Grace of God, King of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c. To all Our Loving Subjects of what Degree or Quality ever, Greeting. If the general Distractions and Confusion which is spread over the whole Kingdom, doth not awake all men to a desire and longing, that those Wounds which have so many Years together been kept bleeding, may be bound up, all We can say will be no pur-
And because in the continued distractions and difturbances of many Years, and in many and great Revolutions, many Grants and Purchases of Estates have been made to and by many Officers, Soldiers, and others, who are now possessed of the same, and who may be liable to Actions at Law, upon several Titles; We are likewise willing that all such differences, and all things relating to the said Grants, Sales, and Purchases, shall be determined in Parliament, which can be not provided for the just satisfaction of all men who are concerned.

And we do further declare, that we will be ready to content to any All or Act of Parliament for the purposes aforesaid, And for the full satisfaction of all Arrears due to the Officers and Soldiers of the Army, under the Command of General Monk, and that they shall be received into our Service upon as good pay and Conditions as they now enjoy.

Given under our Sign Manual and Privy Seal at our Court at Breda this 14 day of April, 1660. in the twelfth Year of our Reign.

After the Reading of these, the Lords Ordered Thanks to be given to Sir John Greenwel for bringing that Gracious Declaration and Letter, and Resolved by Vote, That they do own and declare That according to the Ancients and Fundamental Laws of this Kingdom, the Government is, and ought to be, by King, Lords, and Commons.

Sir John Greenwel came then to the House of Commons, who were before his Coming acquainted with the Letter he delivered to the Council; upon Notice of his being at the Door, he was admitted, and presented a Letter to them from his Majestie. The Letter had in it a Duplicate of the fame Declaration which was inclosed in the Letter to the Lords: The Letter and it were both read, and the Letter was Supercribed.

To Our Truity and Wellbeloved, the Speaker of the House of Commons.

CHARLES R.

Truly and Wellbeloved, We Greet you well. In these great and insupportable Afflictions and Calamities under which the poor Nation hath been so long exercised, and by which it is so far exhausted, we cannot think of a more natural and proper Remedy, than to refer to those for Counsel and Advice, who have seen and observed the first beginning of our Miseries, the Progress from bad to worse, and the mistakes and mis-understandings which have produced and contributed to inconveniences which were not intended, and after so many Revolutions, and the observation of what hath attended them, are now trusted by our good Subjects to repair the Breaches which are made, and to provide proper Remedies for these Evils, and for the lasting Peace, Happines and Security of the Kingdom.

We do assure you upon our Royal Word, That none of our Predecessors have had a greater Eeem of Parliaments, than we have in our Judgement, as well as from Our Obligation; We do believe them to be so vital a part of the Constitution of the Kingdom, and so necessary for the Government of it, that We well know neither Prince nor People can be in any tolerable degree happy without them; And therefore you may be confident, That We shall always look upon their Counsels as the best we can receive, and shall be as tender of their Privileges, and as Careful to preserve and protect them, as of that which is most near to our own Self, and most necessary for Our Own Preservation.

And as this is Our Opinion of Parliaments, That their Authority is most necessary for the Government of the Kingdom; So We are most Confident, that You believe and find, that the preservation of the Kings Authority is as necessary for the preservation of Parliaments; and that it is not the Name but the right Constitution of them, which can prepare and apply proper Remedies for those Evils which are grievous to the People, and which can thereby establish their Peace and Security. And therefore We have not the least doubt, but that you will be as Tender in, and as Jealous of, any thing that may infringe Our Honour, or impair Our Authority, as of your own Liberty and Property; which is but preferred by preferring the other.

How far We have trusted You in this great Affair, and how much it is in your Power to repair the Nation to all that it hath lost, and to redeem it from any Infamy it hath undergone, and to make King and People as happy as they ought to be, You will find by Our inclosed Declaration, a Copy of which We have like-wise sent to the House of Peers, and you will easily believe that We would not voluntarily, and of Our Self have reposed so great a Trust in you, but upon an entire Confidence that you will not abuse it, and that you will proceed in such a manner, and with such due consideration of us who have trusted you, that We shall not be ashamed of declining other Affilliance (which We have assurance of) and repairing to you for more natural and proper Remedies for the Evils We would be freed from, nor forry that We have bound of Our Own Interest fo entirely with that of Our Subjects, as that We refer it to the fame Perfons to take care of Us, who are trusted to provide for them.

We look upon You as wise and dispassionate Men, and good Patriots, who will raise up those Banks and Fences which have been cut down, and who will most reasonably hope, that the fame Prosperity will again spring from those Roots from which it hath heretofore and always grown; Nor can We apprehend that you will propose any thing to Us, or expect any thing from Us, but that We are as ready to give, as you to receive.

If you desire the advancement and Propagation of the Protestant Religion, We have, by Our constant Profecion and Practice of it, given sufficient Testimony to the World, that neither the unkindnesses of the fame Faith towards Us, nor the Civilities and Obligations from those of a contrary Profecion, (of both which We have had abundant Evidence) could...
Charles R.

T Rufty and Welbeloved, VVe greet you well: It cannot be believ'd, but that We have been, are, and ever must be, as follicious as VVe can, by all endeavours to improve the affections of Our good Subjects at home, and to procure the affiance of Our Friends and Allies abroad, for the recovery of that right, which, by the Laws of God and Man is unquestionable, and of which VVe have been so long disposses'd by fuch force, and with fuch Circumstances, as VVe do not difeire to aggravate by any fharp expreffions, but rather with, that the memory of what is past, may be buried to the VVorld. That VVe have more endeavours to prepare, and to improve the Affections of Our Subjects at home, for Our Reftoration, than to procure Affiance from abroad, to invade Our City, Our Kingdoms, is as manifef: to the VVorld: And VVe cannot give a better Evi- dence, that VVe are fill of the fame minde, than in this Con junfture when common reafon must fatisfie all men, that VVe cannot be without our Affiance from abroad, VVe choose rather to fend to you, who have it in your own power to prevent that ruine and defolation which a WVarre would bring upon the Nation and to make the whole Kingdom owe the Peace, Happinefs, Security, and Glory it fhall enjoy to your Vertue; and to acknowledge that your Armies have complied with their Obligations for which they were firft rais'd, for the prefervation of the Prefsent Religion, the Honour and Dignity of the King, the Privileges of Parliament, the Liberty and Property of the Subject, and the fundamental Laws of the Land; and that you have vindicated the Truth, which others most perludiously abused and betray'd.

How much VVe defire and Resolve, to con- tribute to those good ends, will appear to you by Our enclosed Declaration, which VVe defire you to caufe to be published for the Information and Satisfaction of all good Subjects, who do not defire a further effusion of precious Chris- tian Blood, but to have their Peace and Security founded upon that which can only support it; an Unity of Affections amongst Our selves, an equal admifration of Justice to men, reflo- ring Parliaments to a full Capacity of providing for all that is amifs, and the Laws of the Land to their due veneration.

You have been your felves witnesses of fo many Revolutions, and have had fo much experience, how far any Power and Authority that is only affumed by Paffion and Appetite, and not supported by Justice, is from providing for the happines and peace of the People, or from receiving any obedience from them, without which no Government can provide for them; and that you may very reasonably be- lieve that God hath not been fo well pleas'd with the attempts that have been made, fince he hath uttily increafed the confusion, by giving all the succes that hath been defire'd, and brought

Given at Our Court at Breda, this 14. day of April, 1660. In the twelfth Year of Our Reign.

After the reading of this Letter and the Decla- ration, his Excellency the Lord General defir'd the Letter that was defir'd to him, to be Com- municated to the Council and the Army, might also be read, which was agreed. In that Letter there was also the former Declaration inclosed, and the Addrefs of the Letter was:

To our Trusty and Welbeloved General Monck, to be by him Communicated to the President and Council of State, and to the Officers of the Armies under his Command.
The Parliament present his Majesty; and his two Brothers, with the summe of £1000.

After the reading of these Letters, his Exellency deferyed their permission to anwer it, and to Communicate that his Majesties Declaration to the Officers of the Army; which was readily confented to.

And they then took into their Consideration, that his Majestie having been deprived of his Revenue, could not but be in want of Monies; and therefore Ordered, That the Summ of fifty Thousand Pounds should be presently raised and prefented to his Majestie from that Houfe, and ten Thousand Pounds to his Royal Highnes the Duke of Tork, and five Thousand Pounds to the Duke of Gloucefter.

The Lords lent down a Message to the Commons, with the Vote of Recognition formerly mentioned, which was agreed to, and each of the Houfes appointed Committees to draw up their feveral Answers to his Majesties Letters, and Resolv'd, that the Superfcription fhou'd be.

The humble Address of the Officers of your Excellencies Army, in the Name of themselves and their Brethren.

been our Brethren formerly engaged in the same Cause with Us. As also in our late Re monstrance and Addres to your Excellency, where in, as it becomes Us in Duty, we have solemnly declared to acquiesce in what the Lord shall bring forth from the Consullations of this present Parliament.

Yet in regard your Excellency hath been pleased to communicate to Us, a Letter and Declaration from the Kings Majesty, full of gracious Expressions; we cannot but acknowledge, that the matter of it gives a great measure of quiet to our minds, and more then ordinary expectations of the enjoyment of much tranquility and happiness under His Majesties Government.

The free and general Indemnity offered by his Majesty, with a liberty to tender Con sciences, satisfaction of Arrears, his readines to content to a Confirmation of Sales, and other Grants and Purchases of Estates to all Persons now in poſsession of the fame, is of that which cannot doubt of the real performance, being left by His Majesty to the Parliament determination, so we believe it is the most probable way to bring the Nations to their desired Settlement. And we hope to evince to his Majesty, and all the world, That we, and all those that have been Engaged in the Parliament's Calfe, are his Majesty's most Loyal Subjects, and that your Excellency, and the Armies under your Command, have Complied with the Obligations, for which they were first raised, for the preservation of the true Protestant Religion, the Honour and Dignity of the King, the Protection of Parliament, the Liberty and Prosperity of the Subject, and the Fundamental Laws of the Land.

In the morning, at the first fitting of the Commons-Houfe, the General acquainted them, that he had Communicated his Majesties Letter, and the Declaration in it enclofed, to the Officers of the Army; and that whereupon they had pre sented an Addres to him, which he defired they would be pleased to read, which was ordered, and after the reading, it was well approved of.

His Excellency then told them, He intended to prepare a Letter, to be sent to his Majesty, and to lay with their leave, purpose to send that Addres to him. That his Majesty might thereby perceive, the Armies were at his devotion: and desiring to send it by Commiffary Clergs, who was as well a Member of their Houfe, as an Officer of the Army, he required their permission for him to do it.

The Houfe then Ordered, he should have leave to go from his Excellency to the King; and they gave five hundred Pounds to Sir John Greenville, to buy him a Jewel, as a Testimony of the Respect of the Houfe to him.

After this, Alderman Robinson informed them, That the said Sir John Greenville, with the Lord Mordant, had presented a Letter from his Majesty, to the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, and they Commanded him to ask their leave to return an Answer to it. Which after the reading it in the Houfe, was granted; In that Letter also his Majesties Declaration was inclosed; The Letter itself was directed,

To Our Trusty and Well-beloved, the Lord Major, Aldermen, and the Common-Council of our City of London.

CHARLES R.

To Rasty and Well-beloved, We greet you well: His Majesties In these great Revolutions of late, happened in our Kingdom, to the wonder and Amazement of all the World, there is none that We have looked upon with more Comfort, than the frequent and publick manifestations of their Affections to Us in the City of London, which hath exceedingly raised Our spirits, and which no doubts proceeded from the spirits of God, and his extraordinary mercy to the Nation, which hath been encouraged by you, and your good Example, to assert that Government, under which it hath so many hundred years enjoyed at great felicity at any Nation in Europe, and to discontinue the Imagination of those, who would subject Our Subjects to a Government they have not yet devised; and to justify the Pride and Ambition of a few ill men, would introduce in the most arbitrary and tyrannical Power that was ever yet heard of. How long We have all suffered under those ill the like devices, all the World takes notice, to the no small reproach of the English Nation, which We hope is now providing for its own Security and Redemption, and will be no longer bewitch'd by those Inventions: How defects we are to contribute to the obtaining the Peace and Happy of our Subjects without effusion of blood; and how far We are from desiring to recover what belongs to Us by a Warr, if it can be otherwise done, will appear to you by the inclufed Declaration, which together with this Our Letter, We have intrusted Our Right Trusty and Well-beloved Cousin, the Lord Viscount Mordant, and Our Trusty and Well-beloved Servants, Sir John Greenville Knight, one of the Gentle men of our Bed-Chamber, to deliver to you; to the end, that you, and all the rest of Our good Subjects of that Our City of London (to whom we defire it should be published) may know how far We are from the desire of revenge, or that the Peace, Happiness, and Security of the Kingdom, should be rais'd upon any other Foundation than the affection and hearts of Our Subjects, and their own Confects. We have not the least doubt of your just sense of these our Commandments, or of your zeal to advance and promote the same good end, by disposing all men to meet Us with the same affectin and tenderness, in enforcing the Fundamental Laws to that Respectiveness is due to them, and upon the prefervation whereof all Our happiness depends. And you will have to remember, the joy of enjoying your full share in that happiness, and the improving it by Our particular Affection to you. It is very natural for all men to do all the good they can for their native Country, and to advance the Honour of it: And as we have that full affection for the Kingdom in general, so we would not be thought to be without some extraordinary Kindness for Our Native City in that particular, which We shall manifest on all occasions, not only by renewing their Charter, and confirming all those Privileges, which they have received from Our Predecessors, but by adding and granting any new Favour, which may advance the Trade, Wealth, and Honour, of our Native City, for which We will be so solicitous, that We doubt not but that it will in due time receive some Benefit and Advantage in all those respect, even from our Own Observation and Experience abroad. And We are most confident, We shall never be disappointed in Our Expectation, of all possible Service from your Affections; And so We bid you farewell. Given at Our Court at Breda, the 14. Day of April, 1660. in the Twelfth Year of Our Reign.

We must not omit to commemorate the City's joyful Refentment of this Letter, and the Declaration in it, expressed by the Grateful Duty of the Common-Council; who immediately upon the Reading of them, Ordered Ten Thousand Pounds to be prefixed to his Majefly's Thousand pounds to the Duke of York, and a Thousand Pounds to the Duke of Gloucester; And that Alderman Langham, Alderman Reynolds, Alderman Brown, Alderman Thompson, Alderman Frederic, Alderman Wall, Alderman Adams, Alderman Bateman, Alderman Robinson, Mr. Recorder Wild, Sir Nicholas Grisf, Sir Vincent, Mr. Bifolph, Mr. Foard, Mr. Bloodworth, Sir James Bunce, Mr. Lewis and Mr. William Bateman, should from that City attend his Majefly, with a Prefentment of their most Dutiful Acknowledgments, for their Gratitude and Goodnefs towards them. His Excellency took care, that the Aldermen preferred to him by the Officers, together with Copies of the Kings Letter and Declaration, should be sent to all the Regiments and Garrisons in England, Scotland, Ireland, and Dunkirk, requiring all to return their Subscriptions to him, and the Names of Diffenters (if any were) But it appeared by the Returns made, that the Army was so well purged by the Remonftrance that went before, that all readily and dutifully complied with this.

The Lords Houfe nominated the Earles of Oxfor, Warwick, and Middlefex, and the Lord Vifcount Herforf, the Lord Brook, and the Lord Birkley, to attend his Majefly from that Houfe; And the Commons appointed the Lord Fair, Lord Bruce, Lord Falkland, Lord Cariffon, Lord Eherter of Worcefter, Lord Mandonville, Sir Horatio Townfend, Sir Anthony Abdy, Cooper, Sir George Body, Sir John Holland, Sir Henry Cholney, and Denzil Holfe Efquire to attend his Majefly from that Houfe; Who were Ordered to make the quickest Preparation they could for their Journey, to defire his Majefly to make a speedy Return to his Parliament, to the Exercise of his Kingely Office.

His Majefly's Letter and Declaration to the Fleet, by the diligence of General Mansfarge, had the fame fuccefs there, as that in the Army, being Gratefully received by all the Commanders and Sea-men.

The Letter itfelf was in thefe Words:

CHARLES R.

Till encroaved those Mileries, to hear that the Fleet and Ships, which are the Walls of the Kingdom, are put under the Command of two Perfons so well difpofed to, and concern'd in, the Peace and Happines of the Kingdom, as we believe you to be, and that the Officers and Sea-men under your Command, are more inclined to return to their Duty to us, and put a period to thefe Diftempers and Diuifions, which have so impoverifhed and deftroyed the Nation, than to widen the Breach and to raise their Feet by Rapine and Violence. Which gives Us great encouragement and hope, that God Almighty will heal the Wounds, by the fame Piafier that made the Flefh Raw, that he will proceed in the fame method, in pouring his Blessings upon Us, which he was pleased to use when he began to afflict Us, and that the Manifeflation of the good Afection of the Fleet and Sea-men towards Us, and the Peace of the Nation, may be the Prologue to that Peace, which was ftrictly interrupted by the Mif-8Flake and Mifunderftanding of their Predecessors, which would be fuch a Bleffing upon Us all, that We fhould not be lefs delighted with the manner, than the matter of it: In this Hope and Confidence, We have fent the inclofed Declaration to You, by which you may difcern, how much We are willing to contribute towards the obtaining the General and Publike Peace: In which, as no man can be more, or fo much, concern'd, as no man can be more foli-citous for it. And We doearnily defire you, that you will caufe the faid Declaration to be published, to all the Officers and Sea-men of the Fleet; to the end, that they may plainly difcern, how much We have put it into their Power, to provide for the Peace and Happinefs of the Nation, who have been always under-flood by them, to be the bell and moft proper Counfellors for those good Ends: And You are likewife further to Declare to them, That We have the fame Gracious Purpofe towards them, which We have expreffed towards the Army at Land; and will be as readie to provide for the Payment of all Arrears due to them, and for rewarding them according to their ferval Merits, as We have expreffed to the others: and We will always take to particular Care of them, and their Condition, as shall manifest Our Kindnefs towards them. And fo depending upon Gods Bleffing, for infufing those good Resolutions into your and their Hearts, which are bleft for Us all, We bid you farewell. Given at Our Court at Breda, this 14. Day of April, 1660. in the Twelfth Year of Our Reign.

SUPERSEDED.

To Our Trufly and Vel-beloved General Monck, and General Mansfarge, Generals at Sea: To be Communicated to the Fleet.

Clarges on the Fifth Day of May began his General's Journey to his Majefly; and at his parting from the General, he gave him no other Instructions, but to gie the bell and moft of his Affurances of his Pledge to him, and his Resolutions to improve all his Opportunities to his Service, defiring him.
A Continuation of the

Philip Howard, very well mounted, and richly Cloth'd; after them a Clasf of Trumpets, and three Herald's; Then a Herald between the Ser-jeant to the Commons, and the Mace of the Council: Next, Rky King at Arms, in a Rich Coat of the Kings Arms, between Serjeant Norfalke, and Serjeant Middleton, after whom came the Usher of the Black-Rod, and Mr. Biph: Thafe, thus Ulurering the VVay, the Earl of Manchester followed in his Coach and Six Horses, the Speaker of the House of Commons in his, then his Excellency General Mowke in his; after which followed both Houses of Parliament in Coaches, and after them a Troop of Horse, in this manner
they came to White-Hall, where the Mayor Summon'd his Majesty a second time; and then proceeded to Temple-Bar, Where the Gates being Thur.
The King at Arms, with Trumpets before him,
knick'd, and demanded Entrance; The Lord Mayor appointed some to ask, Whoe it was that knock'd? The King at Arms Reply'd, That if they would open the Wicked, and let the Lord Mayor come thither, he would to him deliver his Message:
The Lord Mayor came then on Horfe-back rickily habited, in a Crimson-Velvet Crown, to the Gate, and then the Trumpets founded, and after silence being made, Alderman Baereman, by Order of the Lord Mayor, demanded of the Herald, Who he was, and what was his Message?
To which he answer'd, with his Hat on, We are the Heralds to Arms, appointed and commanded by the Lords and Commons assembled in Parliament, to demand Entrance into the Famous City of London, to Proclaim Charles the Second King of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, and we expect your speedy Answer to this Demand. To which, after a little Conflitution amongst themselves, Alderman Baereman Answer'd, Their Message was accepted, and the Gates should be immediately opened; which was done accordingly.

The King at Arms entred first, Trumpets founding before him, and was joyfully received by the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Sheriffs, and all the Officers of the City Militia gallantly accoutred, both sides of the Streets were lin'd by the Trained-Bands of London, from Temple-Bear to the Old-Exchange, who fiold all with their Swords drawn; The City Troop March'd next to the Life-Guard, then the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, af-fter whom the Heralds, and the retj, as before:
When they came to Cowcrey Lane End, they proclaimed his Majesty a third time; And from thence they March'd to Cheapside, where he was proclaim'd a fourth time; and from thence to the Old-Exchange, where he was again Proclaim'd. The Shouts and Acclamations of the People, at this gallant and orderly Proceed, were very great, and their Demonstrations of Joy, at the several Stations, when the Ceremony of Proclaiming was performing, not to be expres'd, sometimes they look upwards, and then pretently call their Eyes towards the General, as if they intended at one time to pay a Tribute of Thankfulnes to Heaven, and his Excellency, who had done an Action to Glorious and Tranfcendent, that this present Age commus enough admire, and our Policrity will with dif-iculty believe; and then again they cry'd our, God Save King Charles the Second; as if they acknowledged that Days Joy, as a Reconcipence,

The Solemn manner of Proclaiming his Majesty in London and Westminster.

him not to move any thing to his Majesty, either for himself, or him, or any other in his Company,
That his Majesty might see that both be, and those so nearly concern'd with him in his Restoration, sought more the Publick Good of their Country, than their own private Honour or Profit: which he did faithfully observe at that time and ever after. And three days after the Lords and Commons having agreed upon a Proclamation to that purpose, his Majesty was Proclaimed with great Solemness, in the Cities of London and Westminster, the Lords and Commons, and the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of London being present;
the manner was as followeth:
The Lords went out of their Houfe into the Painted-Chamber, where they continued till they were placed in Order; the Earl of Manchester first, then the Duke of Buckingham, the Earl of Oxford, &c. Thus they walked out along with the Heralds before them, through the Courts of Requesets, and Westminster-Hall, to the Pallace, where they laid before the Hall Gate, whilst Mr.
Sibb one of the Heralds, and Mr. Rylly that officiated as King at Arms, with a loud Voice, Proclaimed the King in these words:

A Lethg is it can no way be doubted, but that His Majeftry's Right and Title to His Crown and Kingdoms, is, and was every way compleat by the Death of His Most Royal Father of Glorious Memory, without the Ceremony or Solemnity of a Proclamation: Yet since Proclamations in fuch Cases have alwavs been used, to the end, that all good Subjects might, upon this occlam, tifer the Duty and Respect. And since the Armed Violence, and other the Calamities of many Years last past, have hither to depriv'd Us of any such Opportunity, wherein we might express our Loyalty and Allegiance to His Majesty, We therefore the Lords and Commons now Assembled in Parliament, together with the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common-Council of the City of London, and other Free-men of this Kingdom now present, do, according to Our Duty and Allegiance, heartily, joyfully, and unanimously, acknowledge and Proclaim, That upon the Deceafe of Our late Sovereign Lord King Charles, the Empirical Crown of the Realm of England, and of all the Kingdoms, Dominions, and Rights, belonging to the same, did by inherent Birth-Right, and lawful and undoubted Succcefion, defend and come to his most Excellent Majesty CHARLES the Second, as being Linearly Rightfully, and Lawfully next Heir of the Royal Blood of this Realm, And that by the Goodness and Providence of Almighty GOD.
He is of England, Scotland, France and Ireland,
the most Potent, Mighty, and Undoubted King:
And therefore we most humbly and faithfully do submit, and oblige Our Selves, our Heirs and Poffeffers.

The Proclamation being ended, the Lords and Commons took their Coaches, and proceeded in this Order; First, the Head-Bayliff of Westmin-fter, and his Servants, did ride along with White-Stailes to prepare the Way; Then followed a gallant Troop of the Officers of the Army, and other Gentlemen, with Trumpets before them;
Then the Life-Guard, commanded by Captain
The Guns from the Tower were all shot off, and all the Streets that Evening were fill'd with Bone-fires, and the Air with the Sound of Ringing of Bells; and all feem'd too little, to celebrate the content and Gratulation of the People, at that Days solemnity.

Commissary Charges made such feeps in his Journey to his Majesty, That on Tuesday the 8th of May, in the Morning, which was the Day after the happy making of this Proclamation, he arrived at Bergen-op-Zome in Holland, half a Days Journey from Breda; There the Governor gave him a very Honourable Reception, and accommodated him with his Coach and Six Horses to Breda, and a League before he came to the Town, the Lord Gerard met him with two Coaches and Six Horses, and accommodated him to his Majesty, who receiv'd him with most Gracious Expressions of Satisfaction, as well that he was the first authorized Meffenger, that came to him with the News of the late Subvention of his Kingdoms and Army to his Obedience: As for his Relation to that most Renowned General, from whose prudent Conduct and Courage, all that Happines was deriv'd to his Majesty, and his People.

He prefent'd to his Majesty, a Letter from the General in Answer to his Majesties, sent before to him; and in it was inclos'd the Address of the Officers of the Army.

May it please your Majesty,

The Generals Letter to his Majesty.

This Letter was dictated by his Excellence in the presence of many Officers of the Army, but he write another short Letter with his own hand: Wherein he acquainted his Majestie, That he chose to fend Mr. Charges to him, because he was the only Person he trusted in the nearest Conferences and Conclusions for his Recreation, as one to whom he design'd his Majesty to give Credit to what he should fay on that behalf.

After the reading of these Letters, and the Address inclin'd in the former of them, His Majestie Knighted him, and by many kind Exprefsions demonstrated his fnce of his Merit and Service to him; and after he had been about an Hour with his Majestie, he had his permission to attend his Royal Highness the Duke of York, and the Duke of Gloucester, who receiv'd him with that Advantage which was inherent in them, both the most accomplished and most Generous Princes in the World. From them he waited on the Princes of Orange, who express'd great Content at his Relation of the News he brought; and at his parting from her, the gave order he should with his whole Retinue be entertain'd at her Charge whilst he staid in Breda, and have a Coach and Six Horses of her Highness, with Equipage suitable, to wait on him when he should give order for it. He went then to Visit the Lord Chancellor, and from him the Princes of Orange, who treat'd him deferentially (next the Royal Family) in greatest Credit with his Majestie; both of them receiv'd him with that Respect as the import and relation of his Message and Person did deserve.

The Two Houses of Parliament having perfected the Instrutions for their Commissioners, and the Letter to his Majestie, they were deliver'd to them, and they began their Journey towards the Hague (at which place his Majestie intended to meet them) on the 11th of May, the time prefix'd in the Instrutions for their Journey.

Instrustions for Aubry Earl of Oxford, Charles Earl of Warwick, Lionel Earl of Middlesex, Lescorl Vilcount Hertford, George Lord Berkley, Robert Lord Brock, The Lord Herkens, the Lord Mandervil, the Lord Bruce, the Lord Caflletown, the Lord Falkland, the Lord Fairburn, Daniel Fllies Esquire, Sir Horatio Townfend, Sir John Holland, Sir Anthony Athley-Coooper, Sir George Booth, Sir Henry Chalhmey.

The Instrustions were thus, (Viz.)

You are to begin your Journey towards his Majesty on Friday next, and make a Species Instrustion to your Commissioners to their Colleges, who were to wait upon his Majesty.

May the 5th.

May it please your Majestie,
Your Majesties most humble and obedient Servant and Subject,

George Monck.
And that both Houses have Ordered, that all and every the Ministers throughout the Kingdoms of England and Ireland be enjoyned in their Publick Prayers to pray for His Majesty Excellent Majesty, and for the most Illustrious Prince James Duke of York, and the rest of the Royal Princes. And also have Ordered, That the aforesaid Arms of the late pretended Common-wealth, where ever they are landing, be taken down, and that his Majesties forces be set up instead thereof. And you are to Communicate to his Majesty the Resolution of both Houses relating to these Instructions. You are to acquaint his Majesty with the earnest Desire of both Houses, that his Majesties will be pleased to make a speedy Return to his Parliament, and to the Exercise of his Kingly Office; and that in order thereunto, both Houses have given Direction to General Mountague one of the Generals at Sea, and other Officers of the Fleet, to observe such commands as his Majesties shall please to give him or them for disporof of the Fleet in order to his Majesties Return; And you are to Communicate to his Majestie the Resolution of both Houses relating to this Instruction.

John Brown, Cl. Parl.

The House of Commons added one more Instruction to the Commissioners; which was, To beseech his Majesty, that the Parliament may know when he will put an end to the Navigation, and to Land at his coming over, that Preparations may be made for his Reception; and which of his Majesties Houses be intended to make use of at his first coming to London; And whether he will come all the Way by Land after he comes on Shore; or whether he will please to come by Water from Graves-End to London; And that his Majestie will declare in what manner he is pleased to be Received.

All these Commissioners in three days after their departure from London, arrived at the Hague. And on Wednesday the sixteenth of May, our sile, they had their several Audiences by his Majesty, who received them all with a sweet and serene Countenance, and a Heart full of Content and good Inclinations towards them: and all the City Commissioners were Knighted by him. He gave that Evening his Dispatch to Sir Thomas Clarges, and Commanded him to acquaint the General, He intended to take Ship at the Bay of Scheveling on Monday next, and to Sayl to Dover and Land there, from whence he would immediately go to Canterbury, and stay there some time to deter mine of the manner of his Entrance into London. The Fleet was some days before in pursuance of the Orders of both Houses in the said Bay.

On Thursday early in the Morning, Sir Thomas Clarges attempted by Boat from Scheveling, to get on Board the Admiral, but the Weather was so stormy he could not do it, till towards the Evening; And then General Mountague Ordered the Norwich Frigate for his Transportation; The Winds were so contrary, and the Weather so stormy, that the Pilot could not make any Land in England till Monday Morning, at which time he Landed at Alfoldough in Suffolk, and immediately from thence sent an Express to the General, and the Speaker of the House of Commons, with intimation of his Majesties Resolutions; Whereupon his Excellency with a great and gallant Company of the Cheifeft of the Nobility and Gentry of England, set forward from London the 22d of May; and for the more convenience ofQuartering to numerous a Company, he advis'd them to divide themselves into Troops according to the several Countries, and the interest of the Noblemen present.

As Rochester Sir Thomas Clarges met the General, and returned unto him his Majesties Letter, with Royal and most endeare'd assurances of Eftrem from the Belt of Kings, to the Worthieft and most deferving of Subjects. The Letter was dated the 26 of May. Directed,

To Our Trusty and Well-beloved General Monc, To be Communicated to the Officers of the Army.

CHARLES R.

T Ruly and Well-beloved, We Greet you His Majestie well. You will easily believe that your Letter to the Letter of the fifth of this Month, by Sir Tho- mas Clarges, was very Welcome to Us; And that, as We must alwaies acknowledge the infinite Mercy of God Almighty in disposing the Hearts of the Army in such an intire obedience to you, for the promoting and carrying on Our Service, and the Peace of the Kingdom; So We can never be without a Just Eftem of such a great and well Disciplin'd Army, upon which the Eyes of the World are so much fixed. We must desire you to return Our very hearty Thanks to the Officers and Soldiers for their affection and obedience to Us; and to assure them from Us, That We shall alwaies have an intire Confidence in them, and ever acknowledge them to be the great Instruments of Restor-ing Us, to Peace, and Happines, and Security to Us all: And therefore they may not only with all imaginable Confidence affirme themsefes, that We will punctually perform whatever We have promised to them in Our Declaration or Letter, but that We will take them into Our particular Care and Protection. And if the Licence and distemper of the time shall so far transport any men, as to presume upon memory of former Amoimities, and of what is past, to use any reproaches towards them, We will look upon such perfons as disturbers of the Peace and Security of the Kingdom, and shall cause them to be prosecuted accordingly. And towards this Settlement and Composure, and for the prevention of many inconveniencies which may fall out, We think nothing so necessary as Our presence with you, by which (in a very short time) every Member of the Army, who shall faithfully adhere to you in advancement of the Publicke Peace, shall with the blessing of God, find himself secure and protected for, to his satisfaction. And long for that Blessed time, We did you heartily farewell.

His Excellency being in his Journey, had no opportunity to communicate this Letter to any any more of his Officers than those that were present with him.

But the fame of his Majesties transcendent Virtues had prevented this written discovery of them, and made indelible impreffions of duty and affection in the Army.

The King intended to have taken shipping on Monday, but the Creenefs of the Winds forc'd him a little to defer it. His Royal Highnes the Duke of York, went on Monday and Tuesday to the Fleet, to take Charge thereof as Lord High Admiral: And on Wednesday the 23. his Sacred Majesty, the Queen of Bohemia, the Princes Royal of Orange, the Dukes of York and Gloucefier, and the Prince of Orange, went on board the Nufey, (which his Majesty now named the Royal Charles) where after a Re-paff, The Queen of Bohemia, the Princes Royal, and the Prince of Orange her Sonne, took leave of his Majesty, and then the Fleet fet fayl for England. His Royal Highnes the Duke of York came in the London; and the Duke of Gloucefier in the Swifftours, now called the Jannes.

During the time this Majesty had remain'd at the Hague, and all the way thither from Brede, the States of Holland entertain'd him with great Magnificence; and at his departure they prefented him with a rich Bed, of the Value of Seven Thousand pounds Sterling; and as much Linnen as was valued at a Thousand pounds.

On Friday about three of the Clock in the Morning, the Fleet was in fight of Dover, whereupon an Exprefs was fent to the General (then newly come to Canterbury) to hafe to Dover, which he prefently did, and about ten of the Clock came thither.

His Excellency before he came from Canterbury, advising with the Earl of Lincets, and fome of the other Noble-men that accompanied him, about the convenience of his Majesties stay at Dover, was informed that he could have no accommodation thither for a fourth part of his Train, and that he refolvd humbly to move him, and therefore he refolvd humbly to move him, to his Landing, to proceed on directly to Canterbury.

About One in the Afternoon, his Majefy Landed at the Beech near Dover-Pier, with the Duke of York, and the Duke of Gloucefter, and many Noble-men and Gentle-men. All that were prefent put themselves into a Paffage, to fee the Meeting of the King and the General: The Admires of Majesty, were Jealous on his Majesties Behalf, of too low Condefcenfion; and the Lovers of Duty fearfull on the other Side, of an Oblation of Merit: But fuch an humble Pro- fefion was made by the General, and fo generouf a Reception by his Majefty, killing and embracing him, that all Parties were fatisfied, to admiration. And his Excellency from that time received fo great an Impreffion of the marvellous Goodnefs of his Majefty, that he refolvd what before he had perform'd bounden Duty to his Liege Lord, ought to be for ever continued, with the fame obfervation, out of Great Affection to his Gracious Sovereign.

His Majefy walked from the Water-Side, towards the Town, with the General, a Canopy being carried over his Head, and a Chair of State by him; and upon his Excellencies Motion, for his going to Canterbury, for the Reasons before expressed, he hafted to his Coach, in his Pageage to which, he was met by the Mayor and Aldermen of the Town, with Mr. Reading their Mi- nifter, who prefented his Majefty with a large Bible, with Gold Claffs: At one end of the Coach next the King, the Duke of York, and at the other the Duke of Gloucefter, and the Gene- ral; and the Duke of Buckingham fate in the Boot. About two miles from Dover, his Majefy took Horse, his Royal Brothers rode on his right hand, and the General on his left: After whom the Duke of Buckingham, and several other Noble-men and Gentlemen follow'd in gallant Equipage.

At his Majesties Entrance into Canterbury, he was met by the Mayor and Aldermen, and Mr. at Canterbury, Lovelace the Recorder, who made an eloquent Speech to him; the Mayor also prefented him with a Tankard of Maffie Gold, and then conducted him to the Palace, where he remained till Monday.

The next Day after his Arrival at Canterbury, His Majefy his Majesties Dignified his Excellency with the Honor of the most Honorable Order of the Garter, upon the General, and the Ho- nor of Knighthood upon the Earl of Winchester, and the Lord Marlabout, who were both Knighted with him; and his Royal Highnes the Duke of York, and the Duke of Gloucefter, in great Testimony of Respect to them, alighted at the Ceremony, and put on the Garter, and the George, Mr. Morrice, was alfo Knighted, and Declared Secretary of State; and that Evening his Majefy went the General a Warrant to be Mafter of his Horse.

His Majefy likewise at Canterbury, confer'd the Honour of Knighthood on Major-General Mosley, Alderman Rofkinson, Mr. Daniel Harvey, Mr. Thomas Strenckley, Collonel Koffiter, Captain Philip Loward, and Mr. Robert Flajson; More- over, his Excellency the Earl of Southampton, and Mr. Secretary Morris, wereSworn of the Privy-Council.

On Monday following, his Majefy came into the City; and after he had been refrefh'd at his own Inn, he went to Chatham, to fea Mr. Reading, by Coll. Sovereign, and returned that Night to Collonde Gibbons, his Houfe, where he lay, and was by the Collonel prefented with a moft Dautyful and Loyal Address from him and his Regiment which was then Quarter'd in Rochester.

From thence his Majefy march'd to Black- Heath, where the Army was drawn up, and was much pleas'd with the fight of it; for indeed they feem'd all men of one age, and one mind, and were for their number, as gallant Troops as were to be feen in the World.

Collonel Knight there moft humbly prefented to his Majefy a Writing, which contained the most humble and obedient Declaration of the Armies Joy, for the Honour of his Majesties pre- fence amongst them, wherein after many duteouf expressions of exalted gladness for his Majesties Relaffion, they behou'd the King, Mr. Reading, and the Majefy would have come to the Council, about him, who had already given proof of their Loyalty and Wifdom both to his Majefy and all his People. They also declared, That as they had never been alter- nately infenfible in the Relaffion of his Sacred Royalty, to his Crown and Kingdom, and his People to their just Rights thereby, so they should for the future cheerfully sacrifice their lives, or whatsoever could be more dear to them, in the service of his Majesty, against all opposers whatsoever, and by a ready obedience to his Majesties Commands, express themselves better than in words.

When his Majesty came to St. George his Fields, the Lord Major and Aldermen humbly on their knees Reverenced him, and the Lord Major presented his Sword, which his Majesty gave back to him; and after a little Collation in a Tent, provided by the Lord Major, his Majesty went towards White-Hall in this manner.

All the streets were richly adorn’d with Tapisery, from London-Bridge to White-Hall; and as far as Temple-Barre, were equally ranked in good order, the Trained-Band Forces on the one side of the streets, and the several Companies in their Liveries on the other: From Temple-Barre to White-Hall, and the Trained-Bands of Westminster, and the parts adjacent on one side, and some Companies of the Army on the other, to whom was joy’d a gallant Company of the late King’s Officers, Commanded by Sir John Stowell.

The Procision was led by Major General Brown, who had a Troop of three hundred, all in Cloth of Silver Doublets; then followed twelve hundred in Velvet-Coats, with Foot-men and Liveries attending them in Purple; Then another Troop led by Alderman Robinson, in Buff-Coats, with Cloth of Silver-sleeves, and very rich Green Scarfs; and after these a Troop of about a hundred and fifty with Blew Liveries, laced with Silver Lace, with six Trumpeters, and seven Footmen in Sea-green and Silver: Then a Troop of two hundred and twenty, with thirty Foot-men in Gray and Silver Liveries, and four Trumpeters richly Cloath’d; Then another Troop of one hundred and five, with Gray Liveries, and six Trumpeters and another of seventy-five with five Trumpets: And then three Troops more, two of three hundred, and one of one hundred, all richly habited, and bravely mounted. After these came two Trumpeters with his Majesties Arms; The Serjeants men in red Cloaks richly Laced with Silver Lace, to the number of fourscore, with half Piks in their hands: then followed six hundred of the several Companies of London on Horseback, in black Velvet Coats, with Gold Chains, each Company having Footmen in Liveries attending.

After these came a Kettle-Drum, five Trumpets, and three Streamers, and many rich red Liveries with Silver Lace: After their twelve Ministers, and then another Kettle-Drum, and four Trumpets, and his Majesties Life-guard of Horse, Commanded by the Lord General; Then three Trumpets in rich Coats and Satin Doublets, and the City-Marshal, with eight Footmen in Frock Green, trim’d with Crimfon and White: the City Waits, and all the City Officers in order: Then the two Sheriffs, and all the Aldermen of London in Scarlet Gowns, and rich Trappings, with Footmen in Liveries, Red Coats Laced with Silver, and Cloth of Gold and Silver. The Heralds and Maces in rich Coats. Then the Lord Major carrying the Sword bare, and next to him the Duke of Buckingham, and the General, and then the King’s Majesty between the Dukes of York and Gloucester: Then followed a Troop of Horse with white colours, and after them, the Generals Life-guard, led by Sir Phillip Howard; Then five Regiments of the Army-Horse, led by Colonne Knight: And after them, two Troops of Noblemen and Gentlemen.

Thus was his Majesty conducted to his Royal Palace at White-Hall, on the nine and twentieth day of May, His Birthday: and with Him, Peace and Happiness return’d to His Kingdoms and People, which all good men desire may be for ever continued to them, under the happy Government of Him and His Pforterly.

When the Lord Mayor had taken leave of him, he went to the Lords, where he was entertained with a Grave but Eloquent Speech of the Earl of Macclesfield, and from thence to the Banquetting-House, where the whole House of Commons attending him, the Speaker in their Names expressed the Joyfull Sense they all had, to behold his Majesty returned in Safety, and thereby an end was put to that Tyranny and Slavery his good People had endured.

The King told them, He was so disorder’d by his Journey, and with the noisefulness in his Ear, (which nevertheless he confess’d was pleasing to him, because it expressed the Affections of his People) that he was thereby induc’d to make such a Reply as he design’d: But added, That he took no greater Satisfaction to himself in this his Change, than that he found his heart really set to endeavour by all means the restoring of these Nations to their Freedom and Happiness; which he hoped by the Advice of his Parliament to effect: And that, next to the Honour of God, from whom he chiefly owed the Restoration of his Crown, he would judge the Welfare of his People: and not only be a true Defender of the Earth, but a Just Assessor of the Laws and Liberties of his Subjects.

After the conclusion of these Ceremonies, he intended to go to Westminster-Abbey to offer up a Thanksgiving to GOD for all his Deliverances and Mercies towards him; but by the Wearinefs he had contracted through the Toil, (however grateful) of that Dayes Action, he was diverted from his intention of going thither; yet would he not for any consideration be withheld from his Devotion, and his Oblations of Thanks to God, which at that time he made in his Presence-Chamber, because his Chappel was not yet prepared for his Reception.

The next day the Dukes of York and Gloucester took their Places in the House of Peers, as did a while after several of other Peers who were made by his Majesty by the Sea, and Summoned the House of Lords, by Writ; (viz.) Henry Jermin Earl of St. Albans, and Baron of St. Edmondsbury; John Mordaunt, Viscount Mordaunt of Avon; Sir Marguard Langdale, Baron Langdale of Holm; Charles Crofts, Baron Crofts; Sir John Barkley, Baron Barkley.

In the first place after his Majesties Arrival, the chief Officers were appointed the chief Officers of State, and of the several Kingdoms, and his Majesties Houſhold, his Highness the Duke of York was invested with the Office of Lord hold. High Admiral of England, and Lord Warden of the Cinque-Ports: The Lord General Monk was continued Captain General of all the Forces of the Three Kingdoms, and made Master of the Horse to his Majesty, Sir Edward Hyde.
Hide (afterwards Earl of Clarendon) was constituted Lord High Chancellor of England: The Earl of Southampton Lord High Treasurer of England: Sir Edward Nicholas, and Sir William Morrice, Chief Secretaries of State. The Marquess of Ormond was appointed Lord Steward: and the Earl of Manchester, Lord Chamberlain of his Majesties Household; Sir Frederick Cornwallis, Treasurer of the Household; and Sir Charles Berkley, Comptroller: and Sir George Carteret, Vice-Chamberlain of the Household, and afterwards Treasurer of the Navy: Besides several others, who for their Eminent Loyalty and good Services, were advanced to Places of Highest Truth and Dignity in Court and Commonwealth. Moreover, his Majesties Privy Council consisted of these Persons following:

The Lords of his Majesties Privy Council,

The Duke of York.
Lord Chancellor.
Marquess of Ormond.
Marquess of Dorchester.
Earl of Clarendon.
Lord high Chamberlaine of England.
Earl of Berkeley.
Earl of Southampton.
Earl of Norwich.
Lord Say and Sele.
Lord Wentworth.
Lord Seymour.
Mr. Denzell Holles.
Sir Frederick Cornwallis, Treasurer of His Majesties Household.
Sir Edward Nicholas.
Sir George Carteret, Vice-Chamberlain to his Majesty.
Sir Anthony Ashley-Cooper.
Collonel Charles Howard.
The Duke of Gloucester.
Lord General Monk.
Marquess of Hertford.
Earl of Manchester, Lord Chamberlain of the Kings Household.
Earl of Northumberland.
Earl of St. Albans.
Earl of Leicesters.
Lord Culpeper.
Lord Roberts.
Mr. Arthur Aungier.
Sir Charles Berkley, Comptroller of his Majesties Household.
Sir William Morrice.
General Mountague.

The Clerks of the Privy Council were Sir Richard Brown Knight and Baronet, (who having been 19 Years Resident in the Court of France for his Majesties and his Royal Father, managed that Employment with extraordinary Prudence, Address and Integrity, and in whole Chappel at Paris the Liturgy of the Church of England had been solemnly kept up during its Eclipse at home) Sir Edward Walker Carter King of Arms.
John Nicholas Esq; Eldest Son to the Secretary of State; And Sir George Lane, Secretary to the Marques of Ormond.

In the next place, special Care was taken for the committting all Military Offices of Highest Truth, as well as the Civil already mentioned, into the hands of such Persons as were judged most faithful to the Kings Service; so that the Governments of all the most Important Castles, Fortresses, and Islands, and the first Commands of the several Regiments of the Army, were by the Lord General conferr'd upon such Lords and other Persons of Honour as the King was pleas'd to recommend unto him to that Effect, until such time as the Army could conveniently be disbanded. Likewise, for the farther settling of the Militia of the Nation, there were of the Chief Nobility of the Land Constituted Lord-Lieutenants of the several Counties each having under them, as Deputy-Lieutenants, such Gentlemen of the fame Counties as had most eminently shewn their affections to his Majesty.

The House of Commons in the mean time, applied themselves to the perfecting of an Act of General Pardon, which was read Twice in the House the One and the Thirtieth of this Month, thereby complying with that great Clemency and indulgence of his Majesty to his People, expressed in his most gracious Letter from Breda. They had in his last Despatch of this Act, designed to except from Pardon several of the Judges of the late King, and others instrumenal in the perpetration of that horrid Treason: of which they had in Culleydigh Eight Persons, (viz.) Harrison, Carew, Clement, and Jones, of the Judges; Cook who was the Professor, Hatcher Captain of the Halberdeers, and Collonel Axtell, also Hugh Peters the Minifier, a virulent Incendiary in the action, who for a while had been fakling up and down in fecret, was at length taken in Southwark. There were others that had been fuced into that Treason, (viz.) Collonel Richard Ingoldsby, Francis Leflies, and John Hutchinson; but fo much was laid in the House in their favours, that they were not made culpable with the rest. As for Ingoldsby, it was made to appear that Oliver Cromwell, without his consent, fet his hand and fign'd to the Vow for Execution of the King: Besides that, by many Actions of his Loyalty since, and his Engagement in Sir George Booth's bullines, and againft Lamport, (as before related) he had given eminent testimony of his abhorrence of fo fould a Crime. Leflies had never been in the High Court of Justice, and but once at any meeting with them, and at that time he declared his diftinc to their proceedings. And Hutchinson had been a very early Convert, and appeared much againft that execrable Oath of Abjuration of the King's Perfon and Polftery, in that part of the Parliament which fate at the time of General Monet's March into London.

This Act of General Pardon had to many particulars in it of different nature, that it took up very much time; but nevertheless, the Parliament omitted not to perfect some necessary Laws for the Safety of the Government. On the second of June, the Parliament having the day before intimated to the King, that they had prepared Three Bills for him, his Majesties came to the House of Lords, and having sent to the House of Commons to attend him, there gave his Royal Assent to them; (viz.) To an ACT for Confirmation of an Ordinance made by the Lords and Commons in his absence of the raising of Seventy Thousand Pounds a Month for Three Months. An ACT for Confirmation of the present Parliament.
And, An ACT for the Continuance of Process in Judicial Proceedings. Which last, was for avoiding of Discontinuances in the Courts of Writs, because the first four Returns of Enquiry, Term could not be conveniently kept, and to prevent the abatement of Writs that were not issued in the Kings Name before his Return to the exercise of Government.

His Majesty also pref'd them (as well by his particular Charge, as by the Lord Chancellor's Speech) to halt their pafling of the Bill of Indemnity, which (as well as all other Bills of Publick Concernment) he was ready to Sign, where- upon this Bill was from thenceforth the grand Business of both Houses until it was finis'd; Nor could it be finis'd till after some consider- able time, and many large and serious Confulta- tions. In the mean time, the Two Houses them- selves desired to lay hold upon this Annexe in the Name of the Whole Nobility and Common- nalty of the Nation: which being easily granted by the King, the Ceremony was performed in the Banqueting-House, where they waited upon his Majesty to that end.

About this time came forth a Proclamation, whereby it was declared, That all such of the late Kings Judges as did not render themselves, should be excepted out of the General pardon: And thereupon Adrian Straw, and Nineteen others of them conceal'd in several parts, presented them- selves to the Speaker of the House of Commons, and were committed to Custody. The Lord Grey of Groby, and Four and twenty more were dead; and Thomas Scott, and Nineteen others escaped beyond the Seas, but were attained by Act of Parliament, as shall be hereafter express'd; And Scott was, shortly after his Escape, taken at Brussels, and by the diligence of the Kings Agent there sent into England, and sent to the Tower.

On the 4th of June, the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance to the King were render'd to all the Members of both Houses of Parliament, with the Kings Servants and Officers of his Household, by the Lord Steward, and the Lord Cham- berlain: And by Order of Parliament, of the 4th of the same Month, the Lord General was desir'd to take an effectual Care that the same Oaths should be administered to all the Officers and Soldiery of the Armies under his Command; And the Lord Chancellor to that end was also desir'd to issue forth Commission under the Great Seal of England, to such persons as the Lord General shall nominate and appoint, for administering the said Oaths to the Officers and Soldiery accordingly. This Order was with all imaginable Care executed both by the General and the Chancellor: And to settle the Army so as it might be most serviceable to his Majesty, he removed several Colonels and other Officers, and placed divers of the Loyal Nobility and Gentry in their places.

As the generality of the people had a little before, upon the conclusion of his Majesties Ad- mission into his Dominions, and his preparation to come over, given great demonstrations of their affection and Loyalty to him, by their universal alicracy in proclaiming him throughout the Three Nations, So likewise, immediately after he was come, they were no less forward to ma-
Brede. Which made him fend a Message to the House of Commons by Sir William Marriage, to quicken their Debates about the Act of General Pardon and Indemnity, as that which would best quiet the Minds of his Subjects.

He told them, 'He had too ample a manifef tation of their Affections and Duty towards him, they good Effects of which was notorious to the World, to make the least doubt of the continuance and improvement thereof, or in the least degree to dislike what they had done, or to Complain of what they had left undone:
And that he knew well the Weight of those Af-Affairs, which depended upon their Counsels, and the time that must unavoidably be spent,
where there must be naturally difference of Opinions and Judgments amongst those whose delivers of the Publick Peace and Safety were the fame. And that neither he nor they must be over-much troubled, if they found their good Intention and unwearyed pains, taken to reduce thofe good Intentions into real Acts for the Quiet and Security of the Nation, mis-represented, and mis-interpreted, by thofe who are in truth affifted to fee the publick Distractions, by Gods Blessing, fo near an end; and by others upon whom Weakness, Fears and Jealoufies, the activity and cunning of thofe till men hath too great an Influence.

That how wonderful and miraculous forever
the great harmony of affections between him and his Subjects is, (it being fo visible to the World, that there scarce appears the view of any Cloud to overshadow or disturb it) yet it is not to be thought that God Almighty had rought the Miracle to that degree, that a Nation fo miraculously divided for fo many Years, would be fo soon and entirely united in their Affections and Endeavours as were to be wilfed, but that the Evil Consequences of many continued so awake for mischief, they would not be willing to take reft themselves, or suffer others to take it: And that they all had too fad Experience of the unhappy Effects of Fears and Jealoufies, how groundles and unreasonable forever not to think it very neceffary to apply all timely and proper Remedies to thofe Diftemers, and to prevent the Inconveniences and Mischiefs which fo naturally flow from thence.

That he well forefaw, That the great violation which the Laws of the Land had for fo many years sustained, had fill'd the hearts of the People with a terrible apprehension of infe-curity to themselves, if all they had faid and done should be liable to be examined and punished
by thofe Laws which had been fo violated:
And that nothing could eftablih the Security of King and People, but a full Proclamation that the returning to the reverence and obedience of the Law (which is good for all,) should not turn the ruin of any who were willing and fit to receive that Protection hereafter from the Law, and to pay that Subjection to it, which were just and necessary; and therefore, he faid, he made a free Offer of a General Pardon in fuch a manner as was exprefied in his Declaration, and how ready and defirous he was to make good the fame, appeared by his Proclamation
riffed out upon and according to their defire:
However, it was evident, that all he had offec-ed or did offer, did not enough Compose the Minds of his People; Nor in their Opinions could their Security be provided for, till the Act of Indemnity and Oblivion were pass'd.
He faid, He found great industry used, by thofe who did not with that Peace to the Kingdom they ought to do) to perfuade his good Subjects that he had no mind to make good his Promiffes, which he defired to perform for his own fake, as well as theirs. And that therefore he did very earnestly recommend it to them, that all expedition might be used in the paffing That much necessary Act, whereby his good Subjects generally would be fatisfied, that great Security would be provided for their future Actions, and that they were free for all past, and for all the endeavours of ill men would be disappointed, who would perfuade them not to do well now, because they had 't done amifs hereofore. And that he was the more engaged to this his Recommendation, because upon the refLECTION of their eminent Zeal and Affection for his Service, and hearty Concurrence with him in all things defired from them, men were apt to perfuade others (though not believing it themfelves,) that the paffing of this Act was therefore not defired, because he did not enough perf the dispatch of it; which he did defire from his heart, and was confident they would be the sooner do it, upon his earnest recommendation.

This Message did so much quicken their Debates, that they perfh'd the Bill in a very fhort ime, and fent it up to the Lords, and the Peo-lies Minds were much Composed thereby, and the more, for that his Majesty by a Proclamation after it, did declare a kind of impatience for the delay thereof.

About the beginning of July, General Monck was by Letters Patents under the Great Seal of created Duke England made Duke of Albemarle, Earl of Torrington, Baron Monk of Potheridge, Beauchampe, and Teyes, and Summoned by Writ to the House of Peers. The Titles of Albemarle and Bea-champe were confer'd on him, because he was deferted from Margaret, one of the Daughters and Co-heirs of Richard Beauchampe Earl of Al-bernard and Warrick, who was married to the Famous Warrious John Talbott Earl of Shrewsbury, well known in France, whose Son John had ony Daughter married to Edward Grey Vifcount Lifle, whose Daughter and Hei Elizaabeth Grey was married to Arthur Plantagenet, a natural Son of King Edward the Fourth, who was in her right Vifcount Lifle, and France one of the Daughters and Co-heirs of the said Vifcount Lifle, was married to Sir Thomas Monk, great Grand-father to the preuent Duke of Al-bernard.

And a few days after, Mr. Edward Mount-guage, one of the Generals at Sea, was made a Knight of the Order of the Garter, and by Letters Patent dignified with the Honours of Earl of Sandwich, Vifcount Montagne of Hitchinbridge and Baron of St. Needs. And the Marquess of Ormond was made Earl of Brecknock, and Baron Ormond,

The
The Lords in Parliament were in Confultation to except all from Pardon that had been Judges in any High Court of Justice, which was no more than such men deferved, who could so maliciously contribute to the Subversion of the good Laws and Government of their native Country. But the Kings Clemency extended to all who were not guilty of his Father's Murder; and observing those Debates to obstruct much the speedy perfecuting that Bill he so earnestly defired to have fin'd. On the 25th of July he went to the said House, in a handborne and most gracious Speech, expressed his Zeal for it in the following words:

My Lords,

When I came first hither to you, which was within two or three days after I came to White-Hall, I did wish with as much earnestness as I could, both by my Self, and the Chamberlains, recommend to You and the House of Commons, the speedy dispatch of the Act of Indemnity, as a necessary Foundation of that Security. We all pray for; and since, by a particular Message to the House of Commons, a-gain press them to hasten that Important Work.

And did likewise by a Proclamation, publish to all the Kingdom, That I did with impatience expect that that Act would be prentised to me for my Affent, as the most reasonable and salutary Foundation of that Peace, Hapiness, and Security. I hope and pray for to my Self and all my Subjects, that they may not deny it to you. I thought the House of Commons too long about that Work, and therefore now it is come up to You, I would not have you guilty of the fame delay. I thank God, I have the same Intentions and Resolutions now I am here with You, which I had at Breda, and believe that I owe my being here, to Gods blessing upon the Intentions and Resolutions I then expressed to have. I will read to you what I then said:

And to the end that the fear of Punishment may not engage any, Conscious to themselves of what is palled, to a perfeverance in Guilt for the future, by exposing the quiet and happiness of their Country, in the Restoration of both of King, Peers, and People, to their Just, Ancient, and Fundamental Rights; We do by these Prefents declare, That We do grant a Free and General Pardon, which We are ready upon demand, to passe under Our Great Seal of England, to all Our Subjects of what Degree or Quality ever, who within Four and twenty days after the publishing hereof, shall lay hold upon this Our Grace and Favour, and shall by any publice Act declare their doing so; and that they return to the Loyalty and Obedience of good Subjects (excepting only such Persons as shall hereafter be excepted by Parliament),

"Tho' only excepted, let all Our Loving Subjects, how faulty soever, rely upon the Word of a King solemnly given by this present Declaration, That no Crime whatsoever committed against Us or Our Royal Father, before the Publication of this, shall ever lie in Judgement, or be brought in Question against any of them to the least endangerment of them, either in their Lives, Liberties, or Estates, or (as far forth as lies in Our Power) so much as to the prejudice of their Reputations, by any reproach or term of distincion from the rest of Our bel Sujetts: We Desiring and Ordering, That henceforward all Notes of Dis- cord, Separation, and Difference of Parties be utterly abolisht among all Our Subjects, whom We Invite and Conjure to a perfect Union among themselves under Our Protection, for the Re-settlement of Our Just Rights, and Theirs, in a Free Parliament; By which, upon the Word of a King, We will be Advised.

"My Lords, if you do not joynt with Me in extinguishing on this Feare, which keeps the hearts of men awake, and apprehensive of Safety and Security; You keep Me from performing My Promises, which if I had not made, I am per- fomed neither I, nor You had been now here; I pray let Us not deceive those who brought, or permitted Us to come together. I knew well there were some Men who could neither forgive themselves, nor be forgiven by Us; and I thank you for your Justice towards those, I immediatly Murtherers of my Father: And I will deal truly with you, I never thought of excepting any other. I pray think well upon what I have offered, and the benefite you and I have receivd from that offer; and encourage and oblige all other pretenstions, by nor excluding them from the benefit of this Act. This Mercy and indul- gence is the best way to bring them to a true repentance, and to make them more fervor to serve their Country, and their Company; for them. It will make them good Subjects to me, and good Friends and Neighbours to you, and We have then all Our end, and you shall find this the secrete Expedient to prevent future mischief. Therefore I do earnestly desire and Conjure you, to depart from all particular a-nimosties and Revenge, or memory of past provoycations, and that you will passe this Act without other Exceptions, than of those who were immediately guilty of that Murther of my Father.

"My Lords, I have told you my Opinion, and I hope you will be of the same. If any pers- ons appear of such dangerous and ob linende Principles, that the Peace of the Kingdom cannot be preserved whilst they have Liberty in it, some other course may be taken, that they shall not be able to do hurt, and I affure you, there is nothing can enable them to do so much harm, as the deferring the passing this Act.

"I hope I need say nothing of Ireland, and that they alone shall not be without the benefit of My Mercy: They have shewed much affiction to me abroad, and you will have a care of my Honour, and of what I have promised to them.

"I do again conjure you, that you will use all expedi- tion in the dispatch of this Bill.

This Speech did not only expedite the passing of this Act in the House of Peers, but give a general Satisfaction to the People, who were exceedingly quieted in their Minds with the Kings refolute Care on the behalf of all his Subjects; nor was his Mind so intent on this necessary Act, as to neglect the other Concerns of Government; But observing, that the late Diffe- rences of his People had created many Animo-
His Majesty's Proclamation against Fighting of Duels.

A Committee of Estates convened in Scotland, and the Chief Ministers of State continued in Scotland.

The Committee of Estates being assembled, made it their first care to keep all things in peace and quiet, and obedience to the present Government, for notwithstanding the late unanimous concurrence of the People at Edinborough (as well as other places) in the publick Proclamation of his Majesty, yet after a short while, there began to discover it self a spirit of discontent among certain Scotch Ministers, who were of the principal Sticklers of the Kirk-party, as appear'd by their meeting together at a place appointed, for the drawing up of a Remonstrance concerning certain things wherein they thought themselves aggrieved, which the Committee of Estates having notice of, sent forthwith to apprehend them, and clapt them up in prison; and for the prevention of the like disturbances for the future, set forth a Proclamation against all unlawful Meetings, and Seditious Papers.

And the same thing that befell these Ministers, The Marquess hapned also to their Country-man the Marquess of Argyle and others sent to Court with others of the Nobility and Gentry of London, of Scotland, upon pretence of tendering his Service to his Majesty, yet he had not its terms carried himself Blamefully, but that sufficient care was found for the laying of High Treason against his Charge, and committing him thereupon a Prisoner to the Tower; and together with him were committed the Marquess of Antrim, Sir Henry Vane, and Sir Arthur Haslerry, besides several others that follow'd soon after.

In Ireland the Convention that had assembled there upon the Change of Government, as soon as they had taken order for the settling of things in that Nation, in Conformity to the King's Authority, (Col. Eyres, who endeavour'd to raise a Party in opposition to it, being reduc'd by Sir Charles Coote) and had appointed from among them certain Commissioners to wait upon his Majesty with their Gratulations and Delires, thought fit to dissolve themselves, in expectation of the Kings Pleasure for the Calling of a full Parliament, and to make way for the Ancient Constitution of the Government by a Lord Lieutenant, as had been determin'd by the King and Council.

The Act of Indemnity was sent from the Lords to the Commons with several alterations to which the Commons were very unwilling to agree; for they had subjected Twenty that were not the Kings Judges, to be liable to such Pains and Penalties not extending to life, as should be inflicted by another Act to be pass'd in this Parliament. Whereas the Lords finding the King's Inclination to tend towards the Pardoning of all such as were his Fathers Judges, or other-wise Actors in his Murder, they disapproved of that part of the Act, as to all those named by the Commons, except Sir Arthur Haslerry, Sir Henry Vane, and COLONEL John Lambert, who were clemcntly to be so maliciously active in opposition to his Majesties Government, as to be excepted from any Conditions of Pardon: The Commons for some time adhered to their first Resolution, but after several Conferences, they agreed with the Lords to agree to these few alterations to their frame of the Act. Vane and Lambert were excepted, but Haslerry remained liable to such Pains, Penalties and Forfeitures, as should be inflicted on him, not extending to life; and the rest of those put under the same Qualification by the Commons, that were not of the King's Judges, were made only with others incapable of Offices, as shall be hereafter shown, when we come to write of the parts of that Act.

That which put Sir Arthur Haslerry under Sir Arthur Haslerry, for a favora ble Qualification, was an Engagement made to him by the Duke of Albemarle for the Revolution, which being known when he receiv'd the Revolution haffen towards the Restoration.
A Continuation of the 1660.

An Influence of His Majesty's affection to his People.

The King and his Government, he expounded with him about it, in reference to the security of his own Condition: The Duke was unwilling to make him desirous, for he had at that time a Regiment of Horse, because he had a Regiment of Foot in the Garrisons of New-Castle, Lincoln, Berwick, and Carlisle, under his Government; which (if he had opposed) could not have been reduced to obedience without the effusion of Blood, which his Excellency much endeavoured to avoid in all the progress of his Actions; and therefore told him, if he would quietly give up his command, and retire to his House, he would endeavour to secure him in his Life and Estate, and doubt not to effect it. This being made known at a Conference by the House of Commons, was published with great modesty by the Duke in his House of Peers, and his Life was thereupon pardoned in the Act, and a small time after, his Estate also was, at the mediation of the Duke, granted to his Heir, a man averse to his Fathers diabolical Principles: (Sir Arthur himself), a while after his Imprisonment, dying of a Fever in the Tower.

At this last Conference of the Lords and Commons, the Lord Chancellor took occasion to speak of the Kings affection to his People, by a very remarkable Influence, saying, That he being employed in an Embassy to Spain, had it directly given him in charge by his Majesty to woe and declare, That the bidded Murther of his Royal Father was not the Act of the Parliament or People of England, but of a very wretched and little company of Miserables in the Kingdom. Which was so pleasing to the House of Commons, that upon the report of it to them, they ordered such of the Privy Council as were Members of that Houfe, to present to his Majesty the humble and thankfull Sense they had of his Justice and Favour for that just Defence he had been graciously pleased to make in behalf of the Parliament and People of England.

A few days after this, that is to say, the 10th of August, the King had Notice that there were Five Acts prepared for his Royal Affent, and he therefore repaired to the Lords Houfe, and sent for the Commons to him, where he allented to them. The Acts were:

2. An Act for a speedy Provision of Money to pay off and discharge all the Forces of this Kingdom both by Sea and Land.
3. An Act for the restraining the taking of Excessive Uury.
5. An Act for a perpetual Anniversary Thanksgiving on the Twenty Ninth day of May, (the day of his Majesties Nativity and Reformation.)

At the passing of which Acts, he expressed himself in these words:

My Lords, and Gentlemen of the House of Commons.

I have been here sometimes before with you, but never with more unwillingness, than I am at this time. And there be few men in the Kingdom, who have longer more impatiently to have those Bills passed, than I have done to pass them; and I hope they will be the Foundation of much Security and Happiness to Us all. I do very willingly pardon all that is pardoned by this Act of Indemnity, to that time which is mentioned in the Bill; Nay, I will tell you, That from that time to this day, I will not use great Severity, except in such Cases where the Malice is notorious, and the Publique Peace exceedingly concern'd: But for the time to come, the same Discretion and Conscience which disposed me to the Clemency I have expressed, which is most agreeable to my Nature, will oblige me to all Rigour and Severity, how contrary soever it be to my Nature, towards those who shall not now acquit, but continue to manifest their faction and dislike of the Government, either to Actions or Words.

And I must conjure you all (my Lords and Gentlemen) to concur with Me in this just and necessary severity, and that you will in your several Stationes be so jealous of the Publique Peace, and of my particular Honour, that you will cause exemplary Justice to be done upon those who are guilty of Sedicious Speeches or Writings, as well as those who break out into seditious Actions: And that you will believe those who delight in reproaching and traducing My Person, not to be well affected to You and the Publique Peace.

Never King valued himself more upon the affections of his people than I do; Nor do I know a better way to make My Self sure of your Affections, than by being just and Kind to you all: And whilst I am so, I pray let the World see that I am possessed of your Affections.

For your Pole-Bill, I do thank you as much as if the Money were to come into my own Coffers: and wish with all my heart that it may amount to as great a Summe as you reckon upon. If the Work be well and orderly done to which it is designed, I am sure I shall be the richer by it in the end; and upon My Word, if I had wherewith, I would My Self help you, so much I desire the Baffrons done.

I pray very earnestly, as fast as Money comes in, to discharge that great burthen of the Navy, and disband the Army as fast as you can; and till you can disband the rest, make a provision for their support. I do conjure you, as you love Me, let Me not hear the noise of Free-Quarter, which will be imputed to My want of Care and Government, how Innocent soever I am, and therefore be sure you prevent it.

I am so confident of your Affections, that I will not move you in any thing that immediately relates to My Self; and yet I must tell you, I am not richer, that is, I have not formed Money in my Purse as when I came to you: The truth is, I have lived principally ever since upon what I brought with Me, which was indeed Your Money, for you sent it to Me, and I thank you for it. The Weekly expence of the Navy, eats up all you have given Me by the Bill of Tonnage and Poundage. Nor have I been able to give my Brothers one Shilling since I came into England, nor to keep any Table in my House but what I eat my self. And that which troubles Me most, is, to see so many of you come to Me in White-Hall, and to think you might go somewhere else to seek your Dinner.

I do not mention this to you, as any thing that troubles Me, do but take care of the Publique, and for for what is necessary for the Peace and Quiet of the Kingdom, and take your own time for My Own Particular, which I am sure you will provide for with as much affection and frankness as I can desire.

The ACT for Confirmation of Judicial Proceedings, was as necessary at this Juncture, as the Act of General Pardon, since without this, besides many other Inconveniences, to great a Confrontion would have been in most men Eftates as would have made them subject to perpetual Inconveniencies.

1. By this Law, All Proceedings in Law or Equity in all or any of the Courts at Wembly, or in Water, or in the County Palatine, or Duchi of Lancaster, or Berwick, or other inferior Courts, and all things done by the Judges and Officers in pursuance thereof, or of the Court of Admiralties, Delegates, Jufitives of Affize, Nift Friars, Commission of Sewers, Bankrupts, or Charitable Ules, and all proceedings thereupon had in England since the First of May, 1642. were Confirmd, notwithstanding any defect of Legal Power, or difference in Style or Title.

2. All Fines Levied without paying the Kings Silver, or without entry of Money given for the Concord, or before one Judge only, were made good and effectual. And all Fines, Recoveries, Judicial Proceedings in the Commonwealth, since the death of the late King, of Lands in Demife, were Confirmd.

3. Whereas since the First of May, 1641. and before the 20th of Auguft, 1660. divers who had been indicted for Treafon, and others also who had adhersd to his Majesty or his Father, were impeached in like manner: All such Indictments and Proceedings thereupon, and Grants made of any Lands forfeited by reason thereof, and Title to the mean profits claimed in that respect were heretofore discharged, and restitution to be made to the respective persons and their heirs.

4. All Recognizances, Bonds, and Securities made in the late Keepers, or Procuretor, not pardoned or discharged, were to be prosecuted in the name and to the use of his Majesty his Heirs and Successors.

To the fourth Branch, such Securities were excepted as had been given to the late Powers by any for their adherence to the King or his Father, or relating to the late Troubles, which was by this Act made void; as likewise were all Obligations, Bonds, and Securities by Order of any Council of State, Committee of Safety, Major General, Deemators, or any other Military Power.

5. After the 8th of May, 1660, no Judges at Wembly, Sergeants at Law, Commissioners of Sewers, or of Bankrupts, or of Charitable Ules, Confirmed by any of the late Upheld Powers were to be continued.

6. No none claim upon or after any Fine by this Act confirmed, shall extend to barre any Person or their Heirs (other than the Parties to the said Fines, and their Heirs and Trustees) for such Rights as they had by colour of any Act or pretended Ordinance of Parliament, since the first of May, 1642. and before the 25th of April, 1660, of Church-Lands, or as the Lands of any Person for adhering to the King, or his Father, or in relation to the late Troubles, to such persons and their Heirs pursue their Claymings by Actions or Entry within 5 years after the 25th of May, 1660.

7. The Name and Styles of the Upheld Power and Authorities were declared to be Rebellious.

8. All Proceedings of High Treafon for Levying War against Oliver Cromwell, or any other late Upheld Power, were made void; as likewise all Affurances, Recognizances, and Judgments for Debt, or Damages hereafter had or suffered by any person whole Conviction, Outlawry, or Attainder, was by this Act discharged.

This Act of Confirmation was nevertheless not to extend to confirm any illegal proceedings of the late High Courts of Justice, nor to confirm any Sales or Eftates made by any pretended Act of Parliament since the first of May, 1642. nor to debar any person grieved, from having a Writ of Error, or Bill of Review, in such manner as formerly, Except such Errors and defects as were not by this Act remedied.

The Act for Provision of Money to Pay the Armies and Navy, was by Poll, and was a very great Tax, because many orders of Men were included in it, which were not mentioned in any former Act of the like kind.

The Act for a Perpetual Annuity does not

The ACT for Observation of a perpetual Annuity
The King after the Paffing these Acts, gave the Parliament notice, That on the 13th of September, he would have them to Adjourn to the Sixth of November following; whereupon they were very diligent to compleat some Bills under Consideration. That which was of most Importance for the Peace of the Kingdom, was a Bill for the speedy Disbanding the Army and Garrisons, which they were very earnest in. The King intended to have made it a Sejfions by Prorogation; but upon application made to him, to shew the inconvenience thereof at that time, because of many Bills and other matters of great Concernment depending, which would thereby be vacated, he assented to an Adjournment.

The Parliament having taken notice of the King's Views insinuated in his last Speech at the Paffing of the forementioned Acts, and provided for his Supply; In the next place they likewise took Care that the Army should be supplied with Pay till they were Disbanded; Which was another of the Particulas of that Speech.

And now all things being ready for an Adjournment, the King on the 13th of September, which was the day appointed, came to the House of Lords, and there gave his Royall Assent to Fourteen Private, and Eight Publice Acts of Parliament.

The Private were:

1. An Act for the restoring the Marquess of Hertford to the Dukeedom of Someret.
3. An Act to restore the Earl of Inchiquin all his Estates and Lands in Ireland.
4. An Act for the restoration of William Marques of Newcastle, all his Estates whereof he was in possession the 20th of May 1642, or at any time since.
5. An Act for settling the Priory of Watton, and other Lands in Yorkshire belonging to the Earl of Wincelset, in the hands of Truftees, to pay his Debts.
6. An Act for the restoring of Sir George Lane to the Manors of Ralchline and Lisdurl, and other Lands in Ireland.
7. An Act to restore Charles Lord Gerard Baron of Brandon, to all his Estates whereof he was in possession the 20th of May 1642, or at any time since.
8. An Act for the restoring to the Lord Culpeper Baron of Thorway, all the Estates whereof his Father was possessed on the 20th of May 1642, or at any time after, which have not been since sold or aliened by his said Father by Acts and Affurances to which himself was party and conferring.

11. An Act for enabling Sir George Booth Baronet, to make Leaves and Sales of part of his Estate.
12. An Act for Regulating of the Trade of Bay-making in the Dutch Bay-Hall in Colchester.
13. The other Two private Bills were one of them to Naturalize Dorothy Elena Countess of Derby; Emilia Countess of Offory; Margaret Lady Culpeper; And a Son and a Daughter of Katherine Stanhopp Countess of Chelseafield, by John Kirkhoven Lord of Henflit in Holland.
14. And the other for Naturalizing Peter de la Pierre alias Peters, and John de la Pierre alias Peter.

Of these Acts; we think it unnecessary to name more than the Titles, as being not of Publice Concernment: and every of the Titles are not here exactly inferred, it being sufficient for Publice Use, to describe so much of them as may inform Politeness of their tendency, and that such Acts were then passed; whereby those that are concerned, may be directed to a more curious search.

The Publice ACTS were:

1. An Act for the speedy Disbanding of the Army and Garrisons.

The Title of this Act does so much express the Use of it, that We shall omit to mention more of it here; and the rather, because it was in a few Months fully Executed.

2. An Act for the supplying and explaining certain defects in an Act for the speedy Provision of Money for Disbanding, and Paying off the Forces of this Kingdom both by Sea and Land.

We have already given you an abbreviation of that Act, whereof this is explanatory, (which was the Full Bill lately described) and to which this being only relating in reference to the supply of some of its defects, We shall not need to enlarge thereon.

3. An Act for raising Seventeen thousand Pounds for the complete Disbanding of the Army.

The Parliament finding the Poll-Bill to rise much short of expectation, from the failure of a due an Exact execution of it; They paied this Act, which ordered the Money to be raised in Two Months from the First of November 1663, (viz.) 7000l. per Moneth.

4. An Act for the speedy raising of 70000l. for the present supply of his Majesty.

This Money was to be paid in one Month from the 29th of September following.

5. An Act to prevent Frauds and Concealments of his Majesties Customs and Subsidies.

This Act was but to continue in force till the end of the first Session of the next Parliament.

6. An Act for the Confoming and reforming of Minif ters.

This Act flapt the Clamours of many Eccle fical persons that had defective Titles to their Cures; and the goodness of the King was very much celebrated by his Consent to it. Where-
A Continuation of the 1660.

An Act for Confenting and Confirming of Ministers.

It Enacts, That every Ecclesiastical person or Minifter Ordained by any Ecclesiastical persons before December the 25th last past, being 24 years of age, having not renounced his Ordination, who hath been since January the first, 1642, placed in, and in Actual possession of any Ecclesiastical Benefice, with Care of Souls, in England, Wales, or Berwick upon Tweed, which hath been void by death, or any other avoidance, since that time, and before the 25th of December last past, and was then in possession, and received the Profits being in the King's gift, or of his Farther, or of any Arch-Bishop, Bishop, Dean and Chapter, Prebendar, Arch-Deacon, Body Politique or Corporate, or other person, other than such hereby restored, is declared lawful Incumbent.

Every voluntary Resignation of a Benefice to the Patron or any pretended Power since the said fifth day of January, to be good, as if made to the Competent Ordinary.

No Presentation is to be confirmed to be an Imposition in Law, to the prejudice of any that shall have right to Present.

Every Ecclesiastical person formerly Sequestred or Ejected after lawful Presentation and perception of the profits, that hath not subscribed any Petition to bring the late King to Tryall, or by any enticed or or deaved or justified the Murder of the said King, or declared his judgment against Infant-Baptism, by Preaching, Writing, Printing, or constant vsiful to Baptize, shall be restored to the possession thereof, at or before the 25th day of December next ensuing; and every Ecclesiastical person to be removed, may enjoy the Profits to that day.

There be many other Clauses and Provisions in this Bill, too long to be here inferred; and so much the less important, in regard by some subsequent ravages, the greatest part of the whole was in a manner repealed.

7. An Act for Encouraging Shipping and Navigation: Wherein it is Enabled, That from the First of December 1660. no Commodities shall be Imported or Exported out of any Lands, Islands, Plantations or Territories, belonging unto, or which may belong to, his Majesty, his Heirs and Successors, in Asia, Africa, or America, in any other Vessel but such as belong unto the People of England, Ireland, Wales, or Berwick, or of them built, or do belong to them as the right Owners, and whereas the Majesty and three fourths of the Mariners are English, under penalty of the loss of all the Goods imported or Exported in other Vessels, as also of the Vessels, with all its Guns, Furniture, Tackle, Ammunition and Apparel, one third to his Majesty, his Heirs and Successors; one third to the Governor of such Lands, Islands, Plantations or Territories, in case the ship or Goods be there seized, and the other third part sent him that shall seize, inform'd, or sue for the same, in any Court of Record, by Bill, Information, PLAINT or ADJUCTION, wherein no Evasion, Pretension, or Wafer of Law shall be allowed. And all Captains, and Commanders at Sea, by Commission from the King or his Successors, are required to bring in all Ships and Vessels so offending, and deliver them to the Court of Admiralty to be proceeded against; and in case of Condemnation, One Majesty is to be divided to the Use of the Admiral and Commander, and their Company, according to the Rules in Case of Prize, and the other to the King and his Successors. With many other Clauses and Provisions tending much to the advancement of the English Manufacture.

8. The Eighth Publick Act was, An Act for enabling Souldiers of the Army to exercise Trades. A very grateful Law to many of the inferior Officers and Souldiers, and a good preparatory to their Disbanding; for many of them had been Apprentices, and, without some such Provision, might have been left without any way of subsistence, when Arms were out of their hands.

The King made a short Speech to both Houses of Parliament at the passing of these Bills, full of Sweetnefs, according to the affilable temper of his Nature.

He thanked them for their general Care of the Publick, and other Particular refpects to him, Speech to the in that for his Satisfaction they had made Provifion for the Army to give the休假 to the Army whilst they were Disbanding, whereby to prevent fresh Quarrels. Adding, That though he kindly accepted their Provifion of Money, he would not stipulate any of it for the supply of his own Occafions, till he should be affured the Publicke had no need of it. As likewise took notice of the Bill concerning the Duke of Somerset, who, he said, had merited as much of the King, his Father, and himself, as a Subject could do, and that he was none of those who think that Subjects by performing their Duties in any extraordinary manner, do not oblige their Princes to reward them in an extraordinary manner. Nevertheless, he said, it seemed to be of an extraordinary nature, and indeed we do not remember any President in Story of the like: But the King was pleased to add, That he had no man would envy this Duke, because he had done what a good Majesty should do, to such a Servant.

After which, his Majesty refer'd to the Chancellor to speak of many other things which he had to Recommend to them: For in this time of their Reces, the Army was to be Disbanding, whereof many Discourses had been spread abroad by disaffected persons. Some said the King would keep them up; And others, That they would not suffer themselves to be disbanded. And though he had pass'd an ACT to Confirm Ministers, yet farther order was to be taken in reference to Church-Government; and particularly in respect to tender Confidences: as likewise about Purchases and Sales of Publick Lands, which had without any issue much taken up the time of both Houses; and therefore since the Parliament Adjournd before any thing in these Affairs was effected, it was expedient to satisfy the People with the Kings Intentions therein: Of which, and many other Matters of great Concernment to the Good and Quiet of the Kingdom, the Chancellor in a most Excellent Speech expressed himself as followeth.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

T HE King tells you, He hath Commanded me to say many Particulars to You: and Chancellor's Speech to the Lord Henry, that the truth is, he hath charg'd me with so many,
King CHARLES the Second.

that I have great reason to fear, that I shall stand in much need of his Mercy: for omitting many things he hath given me in Command, at least, for delivering them in more disorder and confusion, than matters of such Moment and Importance ought to be to such an Assembly, for which the King himself hath even a kind of Reverence, as well as an extraordinary Kindness.

I am to mention some things he hath done already, and many things he intends to do during this Reign, that you may see how well content ever he is, that you should have Ease, and Pleasure, and Honour, and, he hath designd Work enough for himself.

The King hath thanked you for the Provision you have made, that there may be no Free Quarter during the time the Army shall be Disbanding; and hath told you what he will do with that Money you have given him, if there should want wherewith to disbnd it: And now I hope you will all believe that his Majestie will content to the Disbanding. He will do so; And yet he doth not take it unkindly at their hands, who have thought that his Majestie would not disband this Army. It was a sober and rational Jealousie: No other Prince in Europe would be willing to Disband such an Army: An Army to which Victory is enrayd, and which, manly speaking, could hardly fail of conquest wherever he should lead it: And it GOD had not restored his Majestie to that rare felicity as to be without apprehension of danger at home or from abroad, and without an ambition of taking from his Neighbours what they are possessed of, Himself would never disband this Army: An Army whose whole Order and Discipline, whose Sobriety and Manners, whose Courage and Success, hath made it Famous and Terrible over the whole World: An Army of which the King and his Two Royal Brothers may say, as the Noble Grecian said of Ancus,---

Stertamus tela affer verba contra Contumeliosique manus: exporto credit, quanta La Cypriae afferant, qua turbare turpe saeculum.

They have all Three, in several Countries, found themselves engaged in the midst of their Troops, in the heat and rage of Battle, and if any Common Soldier (as no doubt many may) will demand the old Roman Privilege for having encountered Princes singly, upon my Conscience, he will find both Favour and Preference. They have all Three observed the Discipline, and felt and admired and loved the Courage of this Army, when they were the worst for it; And I have seen them in a season when there was little else of Comfort in their view, refresh themselves with Joy that the English had done the greatest Work, the English had got the day, and then please themselves with the Imagination what Wonders they should perform in the Head of such an Army.

And therefore when his Majestie is so entirely poiffified of the Affection and Obedience of this Army, and when it hath merited so much from him, can it be believed or imagined, that he can without some regret part with them? No. My Lords and Gentlemen, he will never part with them, and the only way never to part with them, is to Disband them; Should it be otherwife, they must be exposed to the daily Importance of his great Neighbours and Allies; and how could he refuse to lend them his Troops, of which he hath no need himself? His Majestie knows they are too good Englishmen, to wish that a standing Army should be kept up in the Bovels of their own Country, that they who did but in Bella Pacis gerere Negatum, and who, whilst an Army liv'd like good Husbandmen in the Country, and good Citizens in the City, will now become really such, and take delight in the benefit of that Peace they have so honestly and worthily brought in, the King will part with them as the most indulgent Parents part with their Children for their Education; and for their Preference; he will prefer them to Disbanding, and prefer them by Disbanding; and will always retain such a Kindness for them, and such a memory of the Service they have done him, that both Officers and Soldiers, after they are disbanded, shall always find such Countenance, Favour, and Reward from his Majestie, that he doubts not, but if he should have occasion to use their Service, they will again resort to him with the same alacrity, as if they had never been Disbanded: And if there be any fo ill amongst them (as there can be but very few, if any) who will forfeit the Favour and Protection they may have from him, by any witholding his Majesties Commands, and the full and declared Sense of the Kindness, his Majestie is Confident they will be as ready to those Companions, as they can be to any other honest men.

My Lords and Gentlemen, I am in the next place by the King's Command, to put you in mind of the Act of Indemnity, nut of any Grants or Concessions, or felace he made to you in that Act: I have nothing of that in Charge: No Prince hath so excellent a memory to forget the Favours he doth; Bar of what he hath done against you in that Act, how you may be undone by that Act, if you are not very careful to perform the Obligations he hath laid upon you in it: The Clauze I am to put you in mind of is this; And to the intent and purpose that all names and parts of definition may likewise be put into utter Oblivion; Be it further Enthd by the Authority afeforeaid, That if any person or persons within the space of Three Years next ensuing, shall prelate any new law or statute, or cause against any other person, or any name or names, or other words of reproach, any word leading to revive the memory of the late differences, or the occasion thereof, that every such person so, as aforesaid, offending, shall forfeit &c.: It is no matter for the Penalty, it is too cheap a one, the King wishes it had been greater, and therefore hath by his Jult Prerogative (and this well for Us he hath such a Prerogative) added another Penalty more inapprouvable, even his high displeasure against all who shall suffer from this Clauze in the Act: Give me leave to tell you, That as any name or names, or other words of reproach, are expressly against the Letter, and punishable accordingly; so evil and envious Looks, murmuring and discontented hearts, are as directly against the Equity of this Statute, a direct breach of the Act of Indemnity, and and ought to be punished too, and I believe they may be so. You know Kings are in some sense called Gods, and so they may in some degree take to look into men's hearts; and God hath given us a King, who can look as far into men's hearts as any Prince alive; and he hath great skill in Philognomy too; you would wonder what Calculations he hath made from these:
and no doubt if he be provoked by evil Looks to make a further inquiry into men's hearts, and finds those corrupted with the Passions of Envy and Uncharitableness, he will never choose those hearts to trust and rely upon. He hath given Us a Noble and Princey Example, by opening and stretching his Arms to all who are worthy to be his Subjects, worthy to be thought Englisthmen, by extending his Heart with a Pious and grateful Joy to find all his Subjects at once in his Arms, and himself in theirs; and shall We fold our Arms towards another, and contract our hearts with Envy and Malice to each other, by any sharp memory of what hath been ungracious or unjustly done heretofore?
What is this but to Rebel against the Person of the King, against the excellent Example and Virtue of the King, against the known Law of the Land, this blessed All of Oblivion?

My Lords and Gentlemen, The King is a Suitor to you, makes his Suit very heartily,
That you will Join with him in restoring the whole Nation to its Primitive temper, and Integrity, to its old good Manners, its old good Humour, and its old good Nature; Good Nature, a Virtue so peculiar to you, so appropriated by God Almighty to this Nation, that it can be Translated into no other Language, hardly practis'd by any other People, And that you will by your Example, by the Candor of your Conversation, by your Precepts, and by your Practice, and by all your Interest, teach your Neighbours and your Friends, how to pay a full obedience to his Clause of the Statute, how to learn this Excellent Art of Forgetfulness.

Let them remember, and let Us all remember how ungracious, how indecent, how ugly the influence and fierce notes, the bruithness of their Enemies appeared to them; and we may ploufly and reasonably believe, that Gods Indignation against them, for their want of Bowells, for their not being Engl sniffen, (for they had the hearts of Pagan and Infidels) lent a Whirlwind in a moment to blow them out of the World, that is, out of a Capacity to do more imchief in the World; Except we practive their Vices, and do that our selves, which We presume we are desirous to shun.

Let us not be too much ashamed, as if what had been done amiss, proceeded from the Hammour, and the Temper, and the Nature of our Nation. The Astrologers have made Us a fair Excuse, and truly I hope a true one, All the Nations of these last Twenty Years have been annex'd, and have proceeded from the Evil infuence of a Malignant Star; And let Us not too much despise the Influence of the Stars. And the fame Astrologers allure Us, That the Malignity of the Star is expired, the good Genius of this Kingdom is become Superior, and hath mattered that Malignity, and our own good old Stars govern us again; and their influence is so strong,
that with our help they will repair in a year what hath been decaying in Twenty: And they only shall have to excuse from the Stars, who continue this Malignity, and own all the ill that is past to be their own, by continuing it, and improving it for time to come.

If any body here, or anywhere else, be too much exalted with what he hath done, or what he hath suffered, and from thence thinks himself Warranted to reproach others, let him remember the Story of Nicaephorus, it is an excellent Story, and very applicable to such disfamers; he was a Pious and Religious man, and for his Piety and Religion was Condemned to the Fire; When he was led to Execution, and when an old Friend who had done him injury enough, fell at his feet and asked his pardon, the Poor man was so elated with the Triumph he was going unto, with the Glory of Martyrdom, that he refused to be reconcilated with him upon which he was disappointed of his end, for the Uncharitableness, the Spirit of God immediately fortook him, and he apostatized from the Faith.

Let all those who are too proud of having been, as they think, lelr faulty than other men, and so unwilling to be reconciled to those who have offended them, take heed of the A-postacy of Nicaephorus, and that those fumes of Envy and Uncharitableness, and Murmuring, do not so far transport and intoxicate them, that they fall into those very Crimes, they value themselves for having hitherto declin'd.

But, my Lords and Gentlemen, whilst we confide together to execute faithfully this part of the Bill, to put all old Names and Terms of distinction into utter Oblivion, let Us not find new Names and Terms to keep up the same, or a worse distinction: If the old re-proaches of Carculier, and Royal head, and Me-lignant, be committed to the grave, let Us not find more significant and better words, to signifie worse things; let not Piety and Godliness grow into tears of reproach, and distinguish between the Court, and the City, and the Country; and let not Piety and Godliness be measur'd by a morality in manners.

An affection of Gulle, a new mode and tone of speaking, at least, let not our Contributions and Complexions make Us be thought of a contrary party, and because we have not an affected austerity in our looks, that we have no piety in our hearts, very merry men have been very godly men; and if a good Confidence be a continual Earl, there is no reason but men may be left to show it.

You Mr. Speaker, you have this day made a Noble Preface to the King; do you think, that if you is your and your worthy Companions, had brought it up with folded Arms, down-caft looks, with flights and other infinities of deprecation, it would not have been a very melancholick Prefent?
Have you not your Frank and Difultful expressions, that cheerfulness and vivacity in your looks,
render'd it much more acceptable, much more valuable?

No Prince in Chriftendom loves a cheerful giver so well as God Almighty does, and he of all gifts a Chearful heart, and therefore pr pray let not the only or the best sign of Piety and Devotion in the heart.

I must ask you pardon for misplacing much of this Discourse, which I should have mentioned when I came to speak of the Ministers Bill

They, I hope, will endeavour to remove those new marks of distinction and Reproaches, and keep their Authors from being imposed upon by such Characters and descriptions. The King hath paffed this Act very willingly, and done much to the end of this Act before, yet hath willingly admitted you to be Sharers and Partners with him in the Obligation: I may say confidently, his Majesty hath never denied his Confirmation to any man in possession who hath asked it, and they have all had the effect of it, except such who, upon examination and inquiry, appeared not worthy of it, and such who, though they are Pardoned, cannot yet think themselves worthy to be preferr'd. His Majesty well knows, that by this Act he hath gratified and obliged many worthy and Pious men who have contributed much to his Restauration, and who shall always receive newes evidences of his Majesties Favour and Kindness; but he is not sure that he may likewise have gratified some who did neither contribute to his coming in, nor are yet glad he is in; how comes it else to pass, that he receives such frequent Information of Seditious Sermons in the City and in the Country, in which all Industry is used to alienate the affections of the People, and to incite Jealousies into them of the King and his Government, they talk of introducing Popery, of Evil Counfellours, and such other old Calumnies as are pardon'd by this Act of Indemnity.

His Majesty told you, when he was last here, That Rigour and Severity he will hereafter use, how contrary feever it is to his Nature in those cafes, and conjured you, My Lords and Gentlemen, to concurre with him in this just and Necessary Severity; which I am sure you will do with your utmost Vigilance;
and that you will believe that too much ill cannot befal those who do the beft they can to corrupt his Majesty's Nature, and to extinguish his Mercy.

My Lords and Gentlemen, I told you I was to acquaint you with some things his Majesty intends to do during this Recess, that you may fee he will give no intermission to his own Thoughts for the Publicke good, though for a time he dispenses with your assistance.

He doth consider the infinite importance the improvement of Trade must be to this Kingdom;
and therefore his Majesty intends to establish a Council for Trade, consisting of some Principal Merchants of the several Companies, to which he will add some Gentlemen of Quality and Experience: And for their greater Honour and Encouragement, some of my Lords of his own Privy Council.

In the next place, his Majesty hopes, that by a well settled Peace, and God's great Bless-upon him and You, this Nation will in a short time flourish to that degree that the Land of Canaan did, when Esaus found it necessary to part from his Brother, For their Riches were more than that they might dwell together, and the Land wherein they were could not bear them, because of their Cattle. We have been our selves very near this Pinacle of Happines:
and the hope and contemplation that we may be so again, disposes the King to be very folllicitous for the Improvement and Prosperity of his Plantations abroad, where there is such large room for the Industry and Reception of such who shall desire to go thither. And therefore his Majesty intends likewise to Erect and Establish a Council for those Plantations in which persons well qualified, shall be wholly ter, that upon the good and advancement of those Plantations.

There are two other Particulars which I am commanded to mention, which were both mentioned and recommended to You by his Majesty in his Declaration: Thoone, for the confirmation of Sales, or other recompence for Purchasers: The other, for the Compounding those differences and dissenter's in Religion which have too much disturbed the Peace of the Kingdom. Two very weighty Particulars, in in which his Majesty knows you have spent much time, and concerning which he should have heard from you before this time, if you had not met with great difficulties in the disquisition of either.

For the First, his Majesty hath not been without much thought upon the Argument, and that hath been done much towards the accommodation of many particular persons; and you shall not be at your Journeys end, before his Majesty will put that busines concerning Sales into such a way of dispatch, that he doubts not, you will find a good progress made in it before your together again; and I believe the persons concerned will be from much to blame if they are not good satisfaction: and some of you, who stay in Town, shall be advised and concluded with, in that Settlement.

The other of Religion, is a sad Argument indeed, it is a consideration that must make every Religious heart to bleed, to see Religion, which should be the strongest Obligation and Ciment of Affection, and Brotherly Kindness and Compassion, made now, by the perverfe wranglings of passionat and furward men, the ground of all Animosity, hatred, malice and Revenge. And this unruly and unmanly passion (which no Question the Divine Nature exceedingly abhorres) sometimes, and I fear too frequently, transports those who are in the right, as well as those who are in the wrong, and leaves the latter more execetable than the former, when men, who find their Manners and Dispositions very conformable in all the necessary obligations of humane Nature, avoid one another's conversation, and grow first unfociable, and then uncharitable to each other, because they cannot think as the other doth: And from this separatation We entitle God to the Patronage of, and cornerment in, our fancies and distincions, and purely for his fake hate one another heartily.

It was not so of old, when one of the most Ancient Fathers of the Chuch tells Us, That Love and Charity was so signal and eminent in the Primitive Chrillians, that it even drew admiratiun and envy from their adversaries.
Vide (cinguint) ut invicem se diligam! Their Adversaries, in that in which they most agreed in their very prosecution of them, had their passions and animosities amongst themselves; they were only Christians that Loved, and cherished, and Comforted, and were ready to die for one another. Quid non illi Dicent Christiani, si non videtem temporis? says the Incomparsable Gratian: How would they look upon our sharp and virulent Contentions in the Debates of Christian Religion, and the bloody Wars that have proceeded from those Contentions, whilst ever one pretended to all the marks which are to attend upon the true Church except only that which is inseparable from it, Charity to one another.

My Lords and Gentlemen, this Disquisition hath cost the King many a Sigh, many a sad hour, when he had considered the almost irreparable reproach the Pretendit Religion hath undergone from the Divisions and Disunions which have been so notorious within this Kingdom. What pains he hath taken to compose them, after several Difficourses with Learned and Pious men of different persuasions, you will shortly see by a Declaration he will publish upon that occasion; by which you will see his great indulgence, to those who can have any Protection from Conscience to differ with their Brethren. And I hope God will enable the Candidate of his Majesty in the Conferences he makes, that the Church as well as the State will return to that Unity and Unanimity, which will make both King and People as happy as they can hope to be in this World.

My Lords and Gentlemen, I shall conclude with the King's hearty Thanks to you, not only for what you have done towards him, which hath been very Signals, but for what you have done towards each other; for the Excellent Correspondence you have maintaied, for the very laudable difference and concordance you have had between each other, which will restore Parliaments to the veneration they ought to have. And since his Majesty knows that you all desire to please him, you have given him ample evidence that you do so. He hath appointed me to give you a sure receipt to attain that good end; it is a Receipt of his own prescribing, and therefore it is not like to fail.

Be but pleased your selves, and persuade others to be so; contrive all the ways imaginable for your own Happiness, and you will make Him the most pleased and the most happy Prince in the World.

After this Speech the King retired, and both Houses of Parliament Adjourned themselves to the Sixth of November.

In the ACT for the speedy Disbanding of the Army and Garrisons, That Affair was committed to Twelve Commissioners, (Six whereof were Lords, and Six Commoners) or to any Three of them, whereof one of the Commissioners named by the Lords, and one named by the Commons, were to be Two: And that they might not go far about for the Money, The Treasurers at War, and Treasurer named in the Act for the speedy Provision of Money for for Disbanding the Army, were to lodge Money upon their Warrain.

All the Regiments and Garrisons were Disbanded by Acts except Four Companies in Hull, four in Berwick, and four in Carlisle, which were referred to be last reduced: And the Regiments belonging to the Dukes of York and Gloucester, and the Lord General, were not to be Disbanded till after all the other Regiments and Garrisons, except the Three before mentioned. There were Disbanded in England and Wales, Eighteen Regiments of Foot, confiting of a Thousand Souldiers in each Regiment, besides Officers, and thirteen Regiments of Horse, having five hundred Souldiers in each Regiment besides Officers, together with the General's Lifeguard of Horse, confiting of Two Hundred, and about Fifty Garrisons which had not in them less than 5000 Souldiers, besides Officers. And in Scotland Three Regiments and Two Companies of Foot, and Two Regiments, except one Troop of Horse, and about Thirteen Garrisons; but most of these Garrisons were not under particular Establishment, as those in England, but were manned by Companies out of the respective Regiments. The King, out of his own Bounty, gave a Weeks Pay over and above their full Arrests to all the Troops and Companies disbanded; Which was very thankfully accepted by them.

Moreover, he was so well satisfied with the Services of many of his Subjects in Ireland, who Joyned with the Duke of Albermarle for his Restauration, that he Conferred Rewards and Honour upon many of them according to the report of their merits, amongst these, Sir Charles Coxe was made Earl of Monmouth; Roger Lord Bregshick advanced to the Dignity of Earl of Orery; Connel Richard Come; a Brother to the Earl of Monmouth, was created Baron of Colovney; and Sir John King, Baron of Kingston; and shortly after, Sir John Clowdworth was made Viscount of Lisburn.

Beside the many Addresses that were made to the King the King by his own Subjects generally from all the Embassadours and Embassadors from several of the greatest Princes and States of Europe, to Complement his Majesty in the Name of their Masters, touching his happy Restauration to his Royal Dignity and Government: From the Marquess of Brandenburg came the Baron of Pelzig, Master of the Horse to his Highness. From Frederick, Prince Palatine of the Rhine, Cozen-German to his Majesty of England, came Christopher Clof of Kieenberg, Captain of his Guards. From the King of Denmark came the Lord Frederick von Alfeld, Deputy-Governour of the Dukedoms of Sleswick and Holstein. But never did any Embassador arrive in England in a more Splendid and gallant Equipage than the Prince of Ligne, who being sent Embassador to our King from the King of Spain, seems to have come only upon a Granularoy and Complemental Address, in regard there needed no Negotiation about any Peace between England and Spain, forasmuch as upon the coming in of his present Majesty, there follow'd by consequence a reviving of that Peaceful and Friendly Correspondence which had formerly been between these Two Crowns.
Grows in the time of the late King. And to this purpose his Majesty set forth a Proclamation, Requiring that (whereas the King of Spain had Commanded throughout his Dominions a Cessation from all Hostilities towards this Crown, and had propos'd, that the Publication thereof might be on both sides agree on by a fixt day) all Acts of Hostility should likewise cease on our parts, toward the Subjects of that Crown, which Cessation was to be reckoned as taking beginning from the day of his Majestie's Arrival in England, being the 25th of May, and that all Goods and Merchandizes which had been taken from that time, should be restored.

As the occasion of the Prince de Ligne's coming over was only Grantulatory and Complemental, so his stay here was but short, and after his Departure, there remain'd here as the King of Spain's Lieger or Embassador in Ordinary, the Baron of Battrail. In the same manner? on the part of the French was the Count of Souvain, succeeded by the Count of Monville, who had been long here, and is, at an Occasion happen'd, which manifest'd, that the late concluded Peace between these two Kings had not any whit left'd the Jealousie of Honour between them, and their old pretenotions in point of Precedence. Many trouble-some Contests there have formerly been between the Embassadors of these Two Crowns in the Courts of Forrain Princes and States, when they have chance'd to be Reelid together at the same place; but none more remarkable than that upon Tower-Hill, at the Landing of an Embassador from Sweden, on the 30th of September, Which since it was to prepar'd and premeditated a Buisine on both sides, that his Majesty foreseeing it would come to a Quarrel, and out of his accout'd Civillity willing to carry himself with an equal and impartial Indifference toward them both, and so far to gratify their Intentions, as to permit them to put their Retinue into such a posture as they should think fittest, and most becoming their respective pretensions: Yet in the mean time taking order for strict Guards to be kept upon the place, for the preventing, as much as might be, of all disturbances; and severely prohibiting any of his own Subjects to intermeddle in the difference, or to take part with either side; was pleas'd to Command, that the formerly mention'd Mr. Evelyn should, after diligent Enquiry made concerning the Carriage and Success of that whole Affair, render him a particular Account thereof, by drawing up a full Narrative of every Circumstance of that Occurrence: Which being a matter of so rare a kind, and great Importance, We have here thought meet to infer from that Gentleman's more felicul and ample Collection, as it was by him prefented to his Majesty in this following relation:

Upon Monday last, being the 30th of September, about ten in the morning, the Spanish Embassadors Coach (in which were his Chal'len, with some of his Gentlemen attend'd by about Forty more of his own Servants in Live-ries) was sent down to the Tower-Wharf, and there place'd, it fell near about the Point, where the Ranks of Ordinance determine towards the Cate leading into the Bulwark. Next after him came the Dutch, and (Twelve a Clock pull) the Spanish Coach of Honour, disporting of themselves according to their places. About two hours after this (in company with his Majestie's CoachRoyal), appeared that of the French Embassador, which was the Monsieur de Stred., Son to the French Embassador, with several more of his Gentlemen, and as, might be supposed, near an Hundred and fifty in Train, whereof above Fourty were Horsemen well appointed with Pistols, and (some of them) with Carabines, Musquetoons or Fuzies: In this Purtude and Equipage they expelling upon the Wharf, and as near as might be, approaching to his Majestie's Coach, which was opposite to the flaires. About Three in the Afternoon, the Spanish Embassador being Landed, and receiv'd into his Majestie's Coach, (which mov'd leisurely before the rest, and was follow'd by that of the Swedes.) The French Embassador's Coach endeavour'd to go the next, driving as close as possibily they could, and advancing their Party with their Swords draw'n, to force the Spanish's from their Guard of their own Coach, which were also putting in for Precedency next the King's. His Majestie's Coach now pull, the Spaniards (who held as yet their Rapiers undrawn in their hands) stepping nimbly on either side of the hind-most Wheels of their Master's Coach, drew their Weapons, and shouted, which caus'd the French Coach-horses to make a Pause: But, when they observ'd the advantage, which by this, the Spanish Embassador's Coach had gain'd, being now in file after the Swedes, they came up very near to the Spaniards, and at once, pouring in their shot upon them, together with their Foot (then got before their Coach) fell to it with their Swords, both which the Spanish receiv'd, without removing one jot from their stations.

During this Demaje, (in which the French received some repulse, and were put to a second stand) a bold and dextrous Fellow, and (as most affirm) with a particular Instrument, as well as address, slipping under the belles of the French Embassador's Coach-Horses, cut the ham-strings of two of them, and wounded a third; which immediately falling, the Coach for the present was disabled from advancing farther, the Coachman forced out of his Box, and the Postillion mortally wounded, who falling into the arms of an English Gentleman that stepped in to his succour, was by a Spaniard pierced through his Thigh. This disorder (wherein several were wounded, and some killed) caused those in the French to alights, and so enraged their Party, that it occasion'd a second brisk Assalt both of Horse and Foot, which being receiv'd with extraordinary Gallantry, many of their Horse retreated, and wheel'd off to S. Katherine's.

It was in this Skirmish that some Brick-bats were thrown from the edge of the Wharf, which (by a mistake) are said to have been prov'd by the Spanish Embassador's Order the day before: But that they were not call'd by any of the English, is attested by the general consent of all the Spectators.

In this interim then (which was near half an hour) the Spanish Coach went forward after his Majestie's, with about Twenty of his Retinue following, who still kept their Countenances towards the French, as long as they abode on the Wharf and that narrow Passage of the Bulwarke, (where the Consett was very fierce) without disorder: So as the first which appeared on Tower-Hill (where now they were entering) was his Majesty's Coach, follow'd by the Swedish Ambadassador's, and next, by that of Spain, with about Two hundred or Thirty of his Lovers, still fill deputing it with a less number of French, who came after them in the Rear.

And here (beside what was flain with Bullets on the Wharf, and near the Bulwarke, WHERE of one was a Vade de Chambre of the Spanish Ambassador's, and six more, amongst which a poor English Plaister, and near forty wounded)
fell one of the French, who was kill'd just before his Highness's Life-Guard; no one person of the numerous Spectators intermeddling, or, so much as making the least noife, or tumult,People or Soldiers, whereof there were Three Companies of Foot, which stood opposite on the Hill to the Guards of Horse, with whom the Antagony's lightly skirmish'd, some freth Parties of French coming out of several places, and pressing by the English, whereby his Yound fother, till the Spanish Ambassador's Coach having gain'd, and pass'd the Chain which leads into Crochet-Friers, they delisted, and gave them over.

What ever disadvantage the French came off with in this Encounter, wherein, except one man that fought among the Spaniards with a Half Pike, not any of the English were seen to act any thing that might contribute to the success of one side more than another, till a few of the multitude which flung on that side of the Wharf, being enrag'd by the Wounds which they received from the shot that came in amongst them,
and whereas 'tis said, some of them after wards died, were force'd to defend themselves with what they found at hand: For so Careful was Sir Charles Eversey, Captain of his Royal Highness's Life-Guard, to put in execution what he had in strict Charge from his Majesty, that not a man of the Spectators was suffer'd with impunity, so much as with a Switch in his hand. The French King, from this occasion, gain'd an advantage to the Prerogative he flung upon, greater than if this Consett had not happen'd: For whereas this bufl-ness of Precedence had been hitherto in Contro-versie between him and Spain, in so much that to prevent all Inconveniences, an Accord had been lately made here between the Spanish Embadassador and the Count of Sainfons, That they should affift at no Publick Ceremonies, but upon all such casual Encounters, pass on their way as they forto'd to meet: The King of France countermand-ing this Agreement, and sending positive Charge to de Stroede, not to abate any thing of those Pretenfions formerly flung upon; and hearing what enfued upon his Embassador's executing of his Injunctions, was so Incendi'ere threat, that the Quarrel had proceeded to an absolute Breach of the late concluded Peace between the two Kingdoms, had not the King of Spain condefended to agree, That thenceforward Precedence should be yielded to the French upon all such like occasions, without any dispute.

On the 23 of this Month, the Prince's Royal of Great Britain having recommended the Interests of her Son the Prince of Orange to the care of the Lords States of the Netherlands (who now at length had agreed among them selves to accept this Young Prince to the same Dignity and Trick which his Auncellours formerly held in that Commonwealth, of which they had so highly merited,) came over into England; invited by his Majesty; and willing once again to see her Native Country from which she had so many years been absent: But her Joy to see the King her Brother peaceably. Inthron'd, was very much allay'd by her Sorrow for the los of her Third Brother, Henry of Oulands Duke of Gloucefter, who in the 25 year of his age (to the great Grief of the King his Brother, and all those that know-ning and admiring the Princely Vertues of his Youth, had promis'd Wonders to the World from the hopes of his Elder age) departed this Life on the 15th of September, being the fame day the Parliament adjourn'd, which was near the space of four Month after his Arrival in England; so that he surviv'd little longer than fit to attend upon his Brother to his Throne. He was a Prince Excellently accomplished, Religious, Learned, Valiant, Wife, and Affectionate Brother, a Wife Counsellor, a Good Matter, and a True Friend. And as if Fate had to prov'd, that being himself of the most Noble, she should also in death be accompany'd by the most Noble, there died much about the same time, two of the same Order with himself, and next him in Quality, Edin Duke of Lenox, and Richmond, and William Marques of Hertford, who was also not long before his death restored by his now Majesty to the Ancient Dignity of his Auncellours, being created Duke of Somer, and Norwich, and also to the Honour he had meried in the time of his late Majesty, of being Lord Chan-cellour of the University of Oxford: In which last Dignity he is succeed'd by Sir Edward Hide, Lord high Chancellor of England.

Commissions having been appoint'd by the Commissioners of the Parliament to Pay off and Disband the Army and Navy, a speedie and effectual Course having been by them taken, as hath been already mention'd, for the Paying off and Disbanding the feveral Regiments and Ships as fast as Money came in by the Act of Poll-Money and the other Acts of Discharges made to that end by the Parliament before their Adjourment: In lieu of these Dis-band'd Forces, all the several Counties of the Nation under the Conduct of certain Noblemen, who were constituted the King's Lieutenant over them, according to the Ancient Custum;
were Armed with their own Militia or Train'd The Militia Bands; Not so much in any apprehension of quiet from the Soldiers, for they had so good Officers placed over them by the Lord General, that there was no fear of disorder from them, but left any feditious persons might think themselves capable of making disturbance, if no Armed force should be ready to prevent their Murphies.

And by this means, the Country was both setteld into such a Posture of Military Defence, as to be able at a short warning to appear in Arms, and also freed from the continual Charge of maintaining a flanding Army, whereof there would be no appearance, except in case of Emergent Danger.

As matters of Civil, so likewise those of Ecclesiatical concernment were had in serious regard regard by his Majesty, who judging the Form of Church-Government which had been established in England from the time of the Reformation, till the late Troubles, to be the most Ancient and Decent way of Worship and Discipline, and most tending to Uniformity in Religion, made it one of his first busineses to restore the late extirpated Episcopacy to the Dignity and Authority they formerly exercised in the Church of England. To which end, he speedily proceeded to the nomination of such Persons as were approv'd to be of the most eminent for Learning and Piety, for the supplying of those Bishop's See's, which were become vacant since the first time of the Abrogation of their power.

In the Moneth of October, Owen Rowe, Augustine Garland, and 27 more of the Regicides, Murderers of the late King, excepted out of the Act of Indemnity and Oblivion, were arraigned at the Old Bailey upon a Commission of Oyer and Terminer, directed to Thomas Allen Knight and Baronet, Lord Mayor of London, Sir Edward Hyde, Lord Chancellor of England.

The Earl of Southampton, the Duke of Monmouth, the Duke of Albemarle, the Lord High Steward, the Earl of Leicester, Earl of Manchester, Earl of Dorset, Earl of Barkshire, Earl of Sandwich, Lord Roberts, the Lord Finch, Denzel Halter, Esquire, Sir Frederick Cornwalls, Knight and Baronet, Sir Charles Barkley, Knight; Mr. Secretary Nichols, Mr. Secretary Morris, Sir Anthony Afley-Coooper, Arthur Atmeyly Esquire, Sir Orlando Bridgman, Lord Chief Baron, Mr. Justice Foster, Mr. Justice Addler, Mr. Justice Hider, Mr. Baron Atkins, Mr. Justice Twifden, Mr. Justice Terrell, Mr. Baron Turner, Sir Horatius Grimstone Knight and Baronet, Sir William Wild Knight and Baronet, Recorder of London, Mr. Serjeant Brown, Mr. Serjeant Hale, John Howell Esquire.

The Procurators on behalf of his Majesty, were Sir Jeffery Palmer, his Majestie's Attorney General, Sir Henrage Finch, his Majestie's Solicitor General, Sir Edward Turner, Attorney to his Highness the Duke of York, and Wadham Windiam Esquire, Edward Sheldon, Esquire attended the Clerk of the Crown.

The Prisoners being called, they all pleaded Not Guilty, Except Sir Hardresa Waller, and Mr. George Fleetwood, who pleaded Guilty: But the Crimes were so odious, and the Proofs so clear, that the Judges scarce ever went from the Bar to deliberate, but found all Guilty; and Ten of them were Executed, viz. Harrison, Carew, Scott, Clement, Jones, Scrrop, Cook, and Peter, at Charing Cross, and Hacker and Astell at Tyburn: William Hater (who was also found Guilty, being accused to be one of those in a Frock and Vizard affiliated in the horrid Execution of the King, and therefore excepted from Pardon, though not by name) in regard that the Evidence feem'd not so clear to the Court, upon their report to the King, he had his Reprieve; and all the rest were relipect, till the King and Parliament should order their Execution according to the direction in the Act of Indemnity in that behalf.

The King thought it high time to fettle the Peace of Scotland, as well as that of other Dominions, and in order thereunto he summoned a Parliament to meet at Edinburgh the 12th day of December: And by his Proclamation in that Kingdom, signified to all, that He relied to much on the Loyalty, Prudence, and Care of his Parliament, as absolutely to commit to them the Tying and Judging of the Carriage of his Subjects during the late Troubles, concerning which he would receive Addresss and Informations only from his Parliament or Committees of Eflates.

To whom in the mean time he recommended the ordering and preparing of that affair, and to whom alone any of his People that were interrefed, might freely and should only make their applications, assuring them, that his own Honour once vindicated, and the ancient Prerogatives of the Crown afferced, he would grant such a full and free Pardon, an Act of Indemnity, as might winces, that he defired nothing more than that his People should be fettled with abundance of Happines, Peace, and Plenty, under his Government.

For the Government of Ireland, he made Sir New Officers, Maurice Elysauk Knight, Lord Chellaneur of Ireland, Roger Exel of Great Britain, Lord President of Ireland, Sir Nicholas and Charles Earl of Montrose, Lord President of Connaught to be Justices, who Government, and Affairs there with great Candor and Madoration.

The Sitting again of the Parliament of England, drew very near, in the Interm whereunto, the King to manifest his vigilance for the good of his Subjects, according to his Promise at their Ad- tainment the latter end of October, published his Declaration concerning Ecclesiastical Affairs, fill'd with many gracious Concessions to allay the Discontenters in Religion of that time, which be- cause it was but temporary, till the Parliament should offer something further to him in reference to those matters, We forbear to mention the particular thereof. Helikewise a few days after emitted a Commission under the Great Seal of England, to several Persons of great Honour and Integrity, to Treat with all Purchasers of Court and Church Lands, that none of his People might want any satisfaction which in reason could be allowed them.

The Two Housies of Parliament met the Sixth day of November, and applied themselves to the making of several Laws for the augmentation of the King's Revenue, and other Matters of great Consideration, in which they were the more diligent and speedy, for that they received intimation from the King, that he intended to dissolve them on the 29th day of December: In the mean time, they Ordered, That the several Bodies of Oliver Cromwell, John Brad, and Henry Ireton, and Thomas Pride, should be taken out of their Graves, and drawn on an Harpole to Tyburn, to buried under the Gallows: And on Christmas Eve, the King went to the House of Lords, and there gave his Royal Allent to Two Acts of Parliament, viz. To an Act for a Grant of certain Impositions upon Beer, Ale, and other Liquors, for the increace of his Majesty's Revenue, and, an Act for the taking away the Court of Wards and Liveries, and Tenures in Capite, and by Knights Service, and Purveyance, and for setting a Revenue upon his MAJESTIE's in Lien thereof. The Act for a Grant of certain Impostions, &c. is by several Rates as Excise, upon Beer, Ale, Sider, Petty, Metherglin, Strong-Water or Aquis.

The King Favour to this Gentleman, grounded upon so notable a foundation of merit, as is before related, did oblige the Parliament in this and many other occasions, to throw their respect to him.

The Act for raising and establishing a Post-Office, brought a Revenue of One and Twenty Thousand
And ill should We deserve this Happy Day,
If no acknowledgment we pay,
To You Great Patriots of the Two Molt truly other Hous.es now;
Who have redempted from Infame and from Shame,
A Parliament's once Venerable Name,
And now the Title of a House restore
To that which was but Slaughter-House before;
If my advice, Ye Worthies, might be taken,
Within those Reverend Places
Which now your Living Preceence graces,
Your Worthy Statues always should remain,
To keep alive your useful Memory,
And to your Successors the Example be
Of Truth, Religion, Reason, Loyalty;
For though a firmly settled Peace
May shortly make your Publick Labours cease,
The greatfull Nation, will with joy confess,
That in this Sense, you should be laid (Though yet the Name founds with some dread)
To be The Long, the Endless Parliament.

Of all the manifold Sects, and Separations, The Infirthat sprung up from the licence of the late War, and the Anarchy that reigned from that time, till the time of his Majestie's Restoration, there were scarce any that dreaded not the Name of Monarchy, as apprehending the Consequence thereof to be a tendency to Uniformity in Church and State; And therefore no marvial if they who heretofore were profess'd Enemies to the King and his Right of Government, were, after his Coming in, agitated with a reliefs spirit of Impatience and Dif-satisfaction, which forborne not several times to manifest it self in such At-temps, as, had not a timely flop been put unto them, by the Prudent Foresight and Vigilant Care of his Majesty and his Council, might very much have Endanger'd the Improving of the Nation in a new Civil War. The first Alarm that was given, was by the Fifth-Mo-naire-men, (they at least were the only hardy men that openly appear'd) a generation of people who, however they intended, the more to Assert the Enemies to the Ancient settled Monarchy of the Nation, of all the whole Hydra, Of these about 50 or 60 mad persons, resolving to venture Neck or nothing, broke forth into open Hostility and Rebellion, under the Conduit of one Thomas Ventor, a Cooper, that had lived for some time in New England, and was of the principle of the Fifth-Monarchy, and a Preacher to a Conventicle of those of that Opinion, who usually met in Coleman-street. That which first gave him and his partakers a pretence to their Treacon, was the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, (which all good Subjects are oblig'd by the Law to take) exclaiming not only against them in particular, but against all Oaths in general; And when some amongst them, more ingenious than the rest, advised their Company's not to dispute what was Commanded by their Superiors, since fulfilion was naturally due to those Powers from whence they expected protection; They were answered by the Seditious, That they had no protection in the exercise of their Religion, but were for the practice thereof expected to all manner of Contemps and Miferies. As if a Just Restraint from Extravagancies in Divine Worship, were to be citem'd Oppression. The
The madness of these Men extended so far, as to believe they and the rest of their Judgment were called by GOD to Reform the World, and make all the Earthly Powers (which they called Babylon) subervient to the Kingdom of King Jefus; and in order thereunto, never to šheat their Sword, till the carnal Powers of the World became a hilling and a Curle: And by a misguided Zeal, they were so confident in their undertaking, that they were taught and believed one should subdue a Thousand, making account when they had led captive Captivity in England, go into France, Spain, Germany, and other parts of the World, there to prosecute their holy defigns.

The place where they consulted and continued their Conspiracie, was the Meeting-place for their Devotion, and thither they had at several times conveyed Arms. On Sunday the Sixth of January, which was the day before their Excursion (his Majesty at that time being gone to accompany his Royal Mother the Queen-Dowager of Great Britain, and his Siller the Princess Henrietta Maria, part of their Journey toward France,) they were very late at their Assembly, which made one Martin, the Landlord of the Houfe, but not of their Party, somewhat inquisitive after their doing; and as he was going into the Chamber to them, he met Venner, who seeing him troubled, told him, He perceived the thought their fery too long, and that in half an hours space after they had fought God in their Prayers, they would difperfe Martin's jealousy of their actions, made him Confult with a Friend about their infinite Wednesday of all their good things; he was advised to listen at their Door, or peep through some Chinks to hear or fee what they were about; Which he did, and found them Arming themselves with Back, Breast, and Head-Piece; and thereupon he immediately gave Notice thereof to some of the next Officers: But within half an hour of this, they came down, and being met by the Militrefs of the Houfe great with Child, who in amazement would have flut the Door upon them, they offer'd to floot her with a Mufquet; upon which in great terror the left them. The Rebels firft march'd to St. Thomas Apostles, to call some of their party, and from thence to Bishopsgate, and after to White-Crofs-street. Sir Richard Brown, the Lord Mayor, having notice of their being abroad, got together some Files of the Trained Bands, but not fufficient, as was fuppofed, to make any imprefion upon them, they being imagind more numerous then they were; by which means they had opportunity to escape to St. John Wood, and from thence to Cane-Wood, betwixt High-Gate and Hampstead.

By this time the Alarum being come to White-Hall, and the General's Regiment drawn up the Duke of York and he, with the Earl of Oxford, and some others, and some of the Guards, march'd into London, where they were informed all the Rebels were difpofed, except a party of them that were feen to go towards Cane-Wood, whither Sir Thomas Sandys was fent with fome of the Guards, and a Company of Foot: But by the darknefs of the Night they got away, and on Wednesday morning came again into London, and divided themselves into two Parties, one whereof about 5 and 6 in the morning appear'd about Leaden-Hall, and from thence march'd to Little Ealchep, where they fought obliquely enough, but were difpofed by the Train'd Bands. Venner and another Party came to my Lord Mayor's Houfe, thinking to have taken him Prisoner; but misfiring, they march'd into Wood-street, where they were met by Colonel Corbet, and about twenty Horfe; Corbet and nine of his party charged through the Rebels, and broke them, whereby the Train'd Band Foot that reconducred them, had little more to do, than to pursue them. They fought with courage to admiration: and if they had not been hindered by the care of the Lord Mayor from increasing their numbers, a Thousand men for refolv'd, might have caused fuch a disturbance in the City, as might have had an influence much further. Venner himself was very much wounded before he was taken, and about five or six kill'd that refolved quarter, of which some of them were fo obscure, that their Names were not known. And about eight or ten days after, Venner with about sixteen or seventeen of the most notorious, were arraigned at Justice-Hall in the Old-Baily, found guilty, and executed in several parts of London.

Thus ended this desperate Enterprise of a formidable Army of three-four men, who were infenibled to that height of Enthusiazme Valour, that they thought themselves strong enough to encounter the whole Armed force of one of the Greatest and most Populous Cities of the World; The Princess Guards, the General's Troops, the City Train'd Bands, were all array'd up in Confequency, by these men of Mickle Might, and Little Wit; and I have heard they were fo Infatuated with their golden Dreams, and fo Cock-fure of Succefs, that they had promised to themselves the Partage of the whole Empire of the World among them, Thirty being designd for the Subdiviion of the Eastern Parts, and thirty of the Western: But we have seen what disaster they met with by the Way.

With the Suppression of this Insurrection, and the bringing the Authors thereof to exemplary punishment, together with the decease of Sir Arthur Huylerigg in the Tower, who is thought to have died with very Anguilh of Mind, to fee all his great Dignifys in an Inshtant brought to nothing, and himself at the Mercy of a Pow'r or he which had fo long Triumph'd: We shall conclude this Year, as with the Solemn Coronation of his Majefly, our present Hillary not thinking it enough to have feen him refund'd to his Throne and rightful Inheritance, without feeing him also involved with thofe Enligns, and Formalities of Regal Dignity, by which all his Predeceffors were confirm'd and eftablifh'd Kings of England.

The Pomp and Proceedings whereof, in regard they may very well be conceiv'd to have exceeded the Magnificences of all former Coronations, as being perfom'd for a Prince fo miraculousl refund'd to his People, We judge not impertinent to be here Inferted; following herein the Observations and Collection (according to the Original unmutated Copy fet forth by himself, and with his own Name prefix'd to the Title) of Elias Ashdoyle Esq, Windsor Herald at Arms, a most Judicious and Curious Inquirer into all Antiquities of this Nature, and exactly vers'd

Which Knights of the Bath, were first dubbed Knights Bachelor, were Knighted by the King with the Sword of State, and then every one of them was adorned with the Red Ribbon of Knight-hood of the Bath, with a Medal adjoining unto it of Three Crowns, with an Inscription about it of Tria juncta in uno, which words till King James's Coronation were Tria juncta in uno, from The Holy Trinity, but at that time the word Numina was left out, which is supposed to be that from that time it might be look on to be an order of Knight-hood in allusion unto the union of the Three Kingdoms of England.

* Son of that Sir Robert D'Arcy, who, in the dangerous times of difficulty and trial, chose rather to contract the Envy of his Brethren, than to recede from those Principles of Allegiance which inspired him to adjudge God and Cæsar their Duke.
England, Scotland, and Ireland, as Tris Regna juncta in uno.

The Commissioners appointed for the calling together of these peers to be Knighted were the Duke of Ormond, the Earls of Northumberland, Suffolk, Lindsey, and Manchester.

The Twelve Peers advanced unto the Titles of Earls and Barons, were Edward Baron Hyde of Hindon, Lord High Chancellor of England, created Earl of Clarendon, Arthur Baron Capell, created Earl of Effex, Thomas Baron Bradenell, Earl of Cardigan, Arthur Viscount Valencia, Earl of Anglesey, Sir John Greenwell Knight, Gentleman of his Majesty's Bed-Chamber, Earl of Bath, Charles Howard, Earl of Carlisle, Dennis Holles Esquire, Baron Holles of Sield, Sir Frederick Cornwallis Knight and Baronet, Baron Cornwallis of Eye in Suffolk, Sir George Booth Baronet, Baron de la Mare of Dunham Maffy, Sir Horatio Townend Baronet, Baron Townend of Lyn Regis, Sir Anthony Ably-Cooper Baronet, Baron Ably of Wimton St. Giles, John Crew Esq, Baron Crew of Stene. Who were so created Earls and Barons on Saturday in the Afternoon, the 20. of April, 1661, in the Banqueting-Room in White-Hall, three days before the King's Coronation.

On Monday the 22d of April, his Majesty, according to the Ancient Custome, made his Caval-Cade from the Tower to Westminster, in such a glorious and splendid manner, that it seem'd to out-vie whatever had been seen before at Galantry and Riches, the gorgeousness of Apparel, the Sparkling of Gems, the Luster of Gold, in a continued Train to dazzling the Spectator's Eye, as if both the Indies had been summon'd over to attend at that Day's Triumph: In preparation to which, Four very Stately and Magnificent Triumphal Arches had been erected by the City, (according as their Charter obligeth them upon such an occasion) for his Majesty to pass through to his Coronation.

The first in Leaden-Hall street, near Lime-street End, made after the Dorick Order, representing his Majesty's happy Arrival in England. The second, being a Naval Representation, was near the Exchange in Cornhill.

The third, consisting of the Corinthian and composite Order, and representing the Temple of Concord, was plac'd in Chapfide, near Wood-street End.

The fourth, consisting of the Dorick and Ionick Orders, and representing the Garden of Plenty, stood in Fleet-street, near White-Friers.

All Four of them being describ'd at large in a Treatise particularly let forth to that purpose by Mr. John Ogilby.

The Proceeding of his Majesty from the Tower to Westminster, was in the following Order:

Marquefles. Dukes.

Equerries, and Footmen next his Majesty. Gentlemen, and Pensioners without them. The Master of the Horse leading a spare Horse. The Vice-Chamberlain to the King. Captain of the Pensioners. Captain of the Guard. The Guard. The King's Horse-Guard. The General's Horse-Guard.
The Proceedings on the day of his Majestie's Coronation, were as followeth:

Upon Tuesday the 23rd of April being St. George's day, about half an hour after seven in the morning, the King entered into His Rich Barge, took Water from the Privy-Stairs at White-Hall, and landed at the Parliament-Stairs: From whence He proceeded up to the Room behind the Lords-House, called the Princess Lodgings, where, after He had repose Himself for a while, He was arrayed in His Royal Robes of Crimson Velvet, fur'd with Ermine: By which time the Nobility, being assembled, robed themselves in the Lords-House, and Painted Chamber.

The Judges also, with those of the Long-Robe, the Knights of the Bath, and Gentlemen of the Privy-Chamber, met in the Court of Requests.

After some space, the King, Herald, and Pursuivants, began to set the Proceeding in Order, each of them taking his share assigned in Chapter, (held at the Herald's-Office the evening before,) and thence directed all the before-mentioned Degrees (except the Nobility) down into Westminster-Hall, where the rest of the Proceeding attended, and from whence the March began.

About half an hour after Nine, the Nobility (having been first called over in the Painted-Chamber) proceeded each according to his Rank, and Dignity, in their Robes, and Coronets, before the King, through the Court of Requests, into Westminster-Hall, ascended up to the Stage, which was raised at the West-end, and placed themselves upon each side thereof.

His Majesty being set in his Chair, under a rich Cloth of State: First, Sir Gilbert Talbot, the Master of the Jewel-House, presented the Sceftre, as also the Sword called Curtana, and two other Swords, to the Lord High-Constable, who took and delivered them to the Lord High-Chamberlain, and he (having drawn the last) laid them upon the Table before the King.

The said Master of the Jewel-House delivered likewise the Sword to the Lord High-Constable; and he again the same to the Lord High-Chamberlain, who also placed them upon the Table.

Immediately after the Dean and Prebends of Westminster, (by whom the Regalia had been brought in Procession from the Abbey-Church unto Westminster-Hall) being vested in rich Copes, proceeded from the lower end thereof, in manner following:— The Sergeant of the Vestry, in a Scarlet Mantle.
The Children of the King's Chappel, being twelve in number, in Scarlet Mantles.
The Quire of Westminster in Surplices.
The Gentlemen of the King's Chappel, being thirty three in number, in Scarlet Mantles.
The Pursuivants, Herald, and Provincial Kings.
The Dean, carrying St. Edward's Crown:—
The Dean of Hereford, the Sceftre with the Cross.
The Dean of Exeter, the Cross, and the Dee.
The Dean of Salisbury, the Cross with the Dee.
The Dean of Worcester, the Cross with the Dee.
The Dean of Chester, the Cross, and the Dee.
The Dean of Lincoln, the Chain, and the Patena.
The Dean of Wakefield, the Spoon.
The Dean of Bath, the Ampulla.

All standing towards the lower end of the Hall, ready to proceed, they made their first Reference together; then coming to the middle of the said Hall, there they made a second Time, and thence going a little further, both the Quire fell off, and stood on either side, through which Lane, the Pursuivants, Herald, and Kings paling, fell likewise off on either side, the Seniors still placing themselves uppermost towards the Throne; after whom, the Dean and Prebends proceeded, and arrived at the foot of the Stone-steps, ascending to the Throne, where they made another Reverence.

This being done, the Dean and Prebends, with Garter, Principal King of Arms before them, (he having waited their coming thither) ascended the Steps, and approaching near to the Table before the King, made their last Reverence.

The Dean first presented the Crown, which was by the Lord High-Constable, and Lord Great-Chamberlain, let upon the Table; who afterwards took from each of the Prebends that part of the Regalia, which they carried, and laid them also by the Crown: which done, they retired.

Then, the Lord Great-Chamberlain presenting the Regalia severally to the King, His Majesty thereupon disposed of them unto the Noble-men hereafter named, to be carried by them in the Proceeding to the Abbey-Church, viz.

St. Edward's Staff to the Earl of Sandwich.
The Spurs to the Earl of Pembroke and Montgomery.
The Sceftre with the Cross to the Earl of Bedford.
The Painted Sword (born on the left hand of Curtana) to the Earl of Derby.
The Painted Sword (born on the right hand thereof) to the Earl of Shrewsbury.
The Sword called Curtana to the Earl of Oxford.
The Sword of State to the Earl of Manchester.
The Sceftre with the Dee to the Duke of Albemarle
The Orb, with the Cross to the Duke of Buckingham.

The Patena to the Bishop of Exeter: And lastly, The Chalice to the Bishop of London.

And because the Spoon and Ampulla were not to be borne in the Proceeding, and therefore ought not to have been brought thither, but placed upon the High Altar, in the Abbey-Church, there to lie in readiness, they were not presented to the King, but commanded to be sent back thither, and laid thereon.

All things being thus prepared, and it being about ten a clock, the Proceeding began from out the said Hall into the Palace Yard, through the Gate-Steps, and the end of King's Street, thence along the Great Stairway, and to the West end of the Abbey-Church, all upon Bleur Cloth, which was spread upon the Ground, from the Throne in Westminster-Hall, to the great Steps in the Abbey-Church, by Sir George Carteret Knight, Vice-Chamberlain, appointed by the King to be his Almoner for this Day.
The Proceeding to the Coronation, was in this following Order.

Captain of the Pensioners.

The Yeomen of the Guard.

When the Proceeding had entered the Abbey-Church, all passed through the Quire, and thence went up the Stairs toward the great Stage, and, as they arrived at the top thereof, were disposed
King CHARLES the Second.

1661. diposed by the heralds into two Galleries, built on either side the upper end of the Quire.

That, on the North-side, received the Aldermen of London, the Judge, and Gentlemen of the Long-Robe, the Quire of Westminster, the Gentlemen and Children of the King's Chapel, (excepting twelve Gentlemen, four Children, and one Organist, who went into a Gallery, railed on the South-side of the Upper Quire, peculiarly appointed for them:) and, in the Gallery, on the South-side, were seated the Knights of the Bath, and Gentlemen of the Privy-Chamber.

The King, being entered the West Door of the Abbey-Church, was received with an Anthem, begun by the Quire of Westminster, who, with the Dean, and Prebends, had before fallen off from the Proceeding, a little on the left hand of the middle life, and stayed there to attend his coming, where also a Fald-stool, and Caffions were laid ready for his Majesty to kneel at.

The Anthem sung was the first, fourth, fifth, and sixth Verses of the 122d Psalm:

I was glad when they said unto me, We will go into the House of the Lord, &c.

The King, arriving at the Fald-stool, kneeled down, and used some private Executions; which being finished, He thence proceeded into, and through the Quire, up to the great Theatre (erected close to the four high Pillars, standing between the Quire and the Altar) upon which the Throne of Efjate was placed, (being a Square railed on five Degrees) at the Entrance whereof were set a Chair, Fald-stool, and Caffions, covered with Cloth of Gold, wherein he repose himself.

Immediately after the Bishop of London (who was appointed to officiate, in part, that Day, for the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, whose age and weakness renders him incapable of performing his whole Duty at the Coronation) having the Lord High-Constable, the Earl of Marfsat, the Lord Great Chamberlain, the Lord High Chancellor, and Lord Chamberlain of the Households before him, went first to the South, next to the West, and lastly, to the North-side of the Theatre; and at every of the said three sides, acquainted the People, That he presented to them King C H A R L E S, the rightful inheirour of the Crown of this Realm; and asked them, If they were willing to do their Homage, Sootice, and Bounden Duty to Him.

As this was doing, the King rofe up, and stood by the aforesaid Chair, turning His Face still to that side of the Stage, where the said Bishop stood, when he spake to the People; who signified their willingsnefs, by loud Shouts, and Acclamations.

The same Question was likewise put by the said Bishop to all the Nobility present.

Immediately after, this following Anthem was sung by the Gentlemen of the King's Chappel:

Let thy Hand be strengthened, and thy right Hand be exalted. Let Justice and Judgment be the Preparation of thy Seat, and Mercy and Truth go before thy Face.

In which time, a large Carpe was spread by a Groom and Page of the removing Wardrobe, from the Altar, down below the half-Paces thereof, and over that a Silk Carpe, and Caffion, laid by the Gentleman-Offier of the Black-Rod, and Mr. Knirleyse: whereupon the Bishop of London went down from the Stage towards the Altar, and having made his Reverence, placed himself at the North-side thereof.

Then the King descended from His Throne, and proceeded towards the Altar; being supported by the Bishops of Duresme, and Bath and Wells, with the Four Swords, the grand Officers, the Noblemen, and Bishops, that carried the Regalia before him, the Dean of Westminster also attending. Being arrived at the Steps of the Altar, He kneeled down upon the Cushion, there laid ready for him, having first offered the Pall, (which was of Cloth of Gold, and born by the Earl of Sandwich) as also a Wedge of Gold of a pound weight (prefented unto His Hands by the Lord Cornw Liths, Treasurer of His Household) both which were received from the King by the Bishop of London, who laid them reverently upon the Altar. Immediately after, his Majesty retired to a Chair of State, set on the South-side of the Altar, a little below the Traversell of Crimmon Taffety.

After this, the Bishops, and Noble-men, that carried the Regalia, drew near to the Altar, and presented every particular to the said Bishop of London, who placed them also upon the Altar; and having done so, they retired to their Seats. Whereupon the King kneeled at a Fald-stool (set on the right side of his Chair of State) whilf the Bishop of London said this Prayer.

O God, which doft visit thofe, that are humble, and doft comfort us by thy Holy Spirit, send down thy Grace upon them thy Servant CHARLES, that by Him we may feel thy Presence among us, through Jesus Christ, Amen.

This Prayer ended, the Bishop of Wercfler went up into the Pulpit, placed on the North-side of the Altar, opposite to the King, and began his SERMON, the Text being taken out of the 28th Chapter of the Proverbs, and the second Verse.

From the beginning of the aforesaid Offering to this time the KING was bare, but now He put on His Cap, made of Crimfon Velvet, turn'd up with Ermines: with which He fate covered all the Sermon-time.

On the King's right hand stood the Bishop of Duresme, and beyond him the Noble-men, that carried the Swords, who held them nacked, and erected the Duke of York, on his left hand; next to whom stood the Bishop of Bath and Wells, together with the Lord Great Chamberlain.

The Lord High Chancellor, and Lord High Treasurer, fate on a Form behind the Duke of York, and behind them, in a Gallery, fate the Dutchefles of York.

In the fame Gallery also were placed Baron Batteville, Ordinary Ambaffador from Spain.

Then the Bishop of Rochester read the Bishop's Petition to the King; the Prayer whereof was,
That He would preserve unto them, and the Churches committed to their Charge, all Canonical Privileges, due Law, and Justice, and protect, and defend Them, and the Churches under their Government: Which his Majesty most graciously by a large Answer (which repeated the words of the Petition) granted, and promised to perform.

Afterwards the King, assisted by the Bishops of Duresme, and Bath and Wells, was led from his Chair up to the Altar (the Sword of State being born before Him, and the Lord Great Chamberlain attending) where He took an Oath to perform, and keep what He had promised. Which Oath being taken, the King was led in like manner back to His Chair of State, and immediately the Bishop of London began the Hymn, Come Holy Ghost, eternal God, &c. the Quires singing the rest of it.

And a little before the ending thereof, the Fald-stool was set again at the King's right Hand, whereby (as soon as the Hymn was finished) He kneeled, the Bishop of London standing before him, and saying the following Prayer.

We beseech thee, O Lord, Holy Father, Almighty, and everlastings God, for Thyself, Ser vant Charles, &c.

The Prayer ended, the Bishop of London went to the North-side of the Altar, the King still kneeling, and forthwith the Bishops of Peterbrough, and Gloucester, went, and kneeled on the upper height-pace of the Altar, where they began the Litany, the Quires singing the Ref-petition, the Dean of Westminster kneeling all the while at the King's left Hand.

After the Litany followed three Prayers, said by the Bishop of London at the North-side of the Altar: and, a little before the last of them was ended, the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury came out at the North-door of St. Edward's Chappel, veiled in a rich ancient cope.

At the ending of the third Prayer, the said Arch-Bishop standing before the Altar, began the Psalms, Lift up your Hearts.

Resp.

We lift them up to the Lord.

Arch-Bishop.

Let us give thanks unto the Lord our God.

Resp.

It is meet and right so to do.

Arch-Bishop.

It is very meet, and right, and our bounden duty, that we should at all times, and in all places, give thanks unto thee, O Lord, Holy Father, &c.

This Preface being finished, the King arose from before the Fald-stool, and went to the Altar, supported by the aforesaid Bishops of Duresme, and Bath and Wells: where He was disrobed by the Lord Great Chamberlain of His Royal Robes, which were immediately carried thence into the Trauerse erected in St. Edward's Chappel.

While this was in doing, the Chant, that was before placed at the entrance of the Stage, was was removed, and set on the North-side of the Altar, betwixt it, and St. Edward's Chair, whereunto the King came, sat down, and was annointed by the said Arch-Bishop, (while the Dean of Wellsminster held the Ampulla, and poured the Oyl out into the Spoon) first in the Palms of both his hands, in manner of a Cross, the Arch-Bishop as he annointed him, pronouncing these words,

Let these Hands be annointed with Holy Oyl, as Kings and Prophets have been annointed, and as Samuel did annoint David to be King; that Thou mayst be blest, and established KING, in this Kingdom, and this People, whom the Lord Thy God hath given Thee to rule over:
whereby which, and the Holy Ghost, Three in Person, and One in Unity, be blest, and praised, now, and for evermore. Amen.

After which the Quire sung this Anthem,
Sadoc the Priest, and Nathan the Prophet annointed Solomon King, and all the People rejoiced, and said, God save the KING.

At the end of which Anthem, the Arch-Bishop said this Prayer, Look down, Almighty God, with thy favourable countenance upon this Glorious KING, &c.

And then proceeded with his annointing the King's Breast, between His Shoulders, on both His Shoulders, the two bowings of His Arms, and on the Crown of His Head, in manner aforesaid.

Which being done, the Annointing was dried up with fine Linen, and the Loops of His Shirt closed up by the Dean of Wellsminster, and then the Arch-Bishop said these two Prayers,

God, the Son of God, Christ Jesus our Lord, who art annointed of His Father with the oyl of Gladness above His fellows, &c. God, which are the Glory of the Righteous, and the Mercy of Sinners, &c.

During the time of Unction, a rich Pall of Cloth of Gold (brought from the great Wardrobe by Mr. Rumball) was held over the King's Head by the Dukes of Buckingham and Albemarle, the Earls of Berks and Sandwich, as Knights of the most Noble Order of the Garter.

After these Prayers, the Lord Great Chamberlain delivered the Coff to the Arch-Bishop, who put it on the King's Head, and immediately after, the Dean of Wellsminster put the Coff, with the Colobium Spondonis, or Surplice upon the King: whereupon the Arch-Bishop said this short Prayer.

O God, the King of Kings, and Lord of Lords, by whom Kings do reign, and Lawgivers do make good Laws, vouchsafe us, we beseech thee, in thy favour, to blest this Kingly Ornament, and Grant, that thy Servant Charles, our King, who shall wear it, may shine in thy sight with the Ornament of a good Life, and holy Actions; and, after this life ended, He may for ever enjoy that Life, and Glory, which hath no end; through Christ our Lord, Amen.

This said, the Dean of Wellsminster having like-wise fetched the Tisser-Hose and Sandals from the Altar, he arrayed the King therewith; as also with the Super-tunica, or close Pall of Cloth of Gold, and girded the same about Him.

But the Taffety red Shirt was not made use of at all.

After all this, the said Dean took the Spurs from off the Altar, and delivered them to the Lord Great Chamberlain, who touched the King's Heels therewith, and forthwith fent them back to the Altar.

Then the Arch-Bishop received the Sword of State in the Scabbard from the Lord Chamberlain of the Hothould, and laid it upon the Altar, saying this Prayer,

Hear our Prayers, we beseech thee, O Lord, and vouchsafe by thy right hand of Majesty, to blest, and sanctifie this Sword, wherewith thy Servant Charles deserveth to be girded, that it may be a Defence and Protection of Churches, Widows and Orphans, and all the Servants of God, against the savage cruelty of Pagans, and Infidels, and that it may be a Fear and Terror to all the King's Subjects, that it be not wanted to do mischief, through Christ our Lord. Amen.

This Prayer finisht, the Arch-Bishop and Bishops afflicting, delivered the Sword back to the King, saying, Accept gladium per manus Episcoporum.

Whereupon the Lord Great Chamberlain girt it about the King, and the Arch-Bishop said,

Receive this kingly Sword, which is belovved for the defence of the Holy Church, and delivered unto thee by the hands of the Bishops, though unworthy, yet consecrated by the authority of the holy Apostles, &c.

After this, the Dean of Wellsminster took the Crown, made of Cloth of Tissu, (brought from Armilis from thither by Mr. Rumball, on the behalf of the Earl of Sandwich, Master of the great Wardrobe,) and put it about the King's Neck, and tied it to the bowings of His Arms, the Arch-Bishop standing before the King, with the Bishop of London, on crown dependents, in right Token of God's embracing, whereby all thy works commen, may be defended against thine Enemies, both bodily and ghostly, through Christ our Lord.

Next the Mantle or open Pall, being made of Cloth of Gold, and lined with red Taffety, was put upon him by the said Dean; the Arch-Bishop likewise using the words of Signification, viz.

Receive this Pall, which is formed with four Corners, to let This understand, that the four Corners of the World are subject to the Power of God; and that no Man can happily reign upon the Earth, who hath not received his authority from Heaven.

In the next place, the Arch-Bishop took Saint Edwards Crown, and blessed it, saying,

God, the Crown of the Ethнич, &c. blest, and sanctifie this Crown, that as the same is adorned with divers precious Stones, so This thy Servant, that weareth it, may be filled with thy manifold Graces of all precious Virtues, through the King eternal, thy Son our Lord. Amen.
In the mean time, St. Edward's Chair was removed into the middle of the Ile, and set right over against the Altar; whither the King went, and face down in it, and then the Arch-Bishop brought St. Edward's Crown from the Altar, and put it upon his Head.

Whereupon, all the People, with loud and repeated shouts, cried God save the King; and, by a Signal then given, the great Ordinances from the Tower were also that off.

At the ceased of these Acclamations, the Arch-Bishop went on, saying,

God crown thee with a Crown of Glory, and Righteousness, with the honour and work of Fortitude, that often by thy Ministrs, having a Right Faith and manifold fruit of good Works, mayst obtain the Crown of an everlasting Kingdom, by the gift of him, whose Kingdom endureth for ever. Amen.

Adding thereunto this Prayer,

O God of Eternity, &c. Blest this thy Servant, who boweth his Head into thy Majesty, &c.

After the Prayer, the Arch-Bishop read the Confratube, Be strong, and of a good courage, and observe the Commandments of the Lord, to walk in his ways, &c.

In the mean while, the Laires sung this Anthem,

The King shall rejoice in thy strength, O Lord. Exceeding glad shall be of thy Salvation, &c.

Upon this, the Dukes, Marqueftes, Earls, and Vizcounts put on their Coronets; the Barons their Caps; and divers of them came and stood about the King, who fell fane in St. Edward's Chair.

Mr. Carter and the Provincial Kings put on their Crowns also.

Then the Master of the Jewel-Houfe delivered to the Arch-Bishop the King, who confequated it, after this manner, saying.

Blef, O Lord, and punifie this King, that thy Servant, wearing it, may be fated with the King of Faith, and by the Power of the Highft be preferved from sin, and let all the Befings, which are found in Holy Scripture, plentifully descend upon him, that whatsoever he fhall punifie, may be holy, and whatsoever he blefeth, may be bleffed. Amen.

After which, he put it upon the fourth Finger of the King's right Hand, and said,

Receive this Ring of Kingly Dignity, and by it the Seal of Catholick Faith, that as this Day thou art adorned the Head and Prince of this Kingdom, and People, fo thou mayst preserve as the Author, and Etablifier of Chriftiinity, and the Chirriffian Faith, that being rich in Faith, and happy in Works, Thou mayst reign with him, that is King of Kings; to whom be Honour, and Glory, for ever and ever. Amen.

And then began this Prayer,

O God, to whom belongeth all Power, and Dignity, give unto thy Servant Charles the Fruit of his Dignity, wherein great be may long continue, and fear thee always, and always labour to please thee, through Chrift our Lord. Amen.

When this Prayer was finifhed, the linen Gloves were delivered to the King by the Lord Great Chamberlain; who, going to the Altar, ungird his Sword, and offered it at the Altar in the Scabbard, which being redeemed by the Lord Chamberlai3n of the Houfhold, was drawn out of the Scabbard, and carried naked by him all the fpeech on the Order of the Solemnity.

Then the Arch-Bishop took the Scepter, with the Crofe, from off the Altar, and delivered it into the King's right Hand, saying,

Receive this Scepter, the Sign of Kingly Power, the Rod of Kingdoms, the Rod of Virtue, that thou govern thy Self right, and defend the Holy Church, and Christian People committed by God unto thy Charge, punish the Wicked, and protect the Righteous, and lead them in the ways of Righteousness, and that from this Temporal Kingdom thou mayft be advanced to an Eternal Kingdom, by his Goodnesse whose Kingdom is everlasting. Amen.

Whilft this was pronounced by the Arch-Bishop, Mr. Henry Howard delivered to the King a rich Glove, which he put on his right hand, and then received the Scepter. And after that, the Arch-Bishop faid this Prayer,

O Lord, the Fountain of all good things, &c. Grant, we beseech thee, to thy Servant Charles, that he may order aright the Dignity, which he hath obtained, &c.

During which time, the faid Mr. Howard perforimed the service of supporting the King's Right Arm, according it was adjudged to him by the Court of Claims, by virtue of holding the Manner of Workes in the County of Nottingham.

Next of all, the Arch-Bishop took the Scepter with the Dove, and gave it into the King's Hand also, saying,

Receive the Rod of Virtue, and Equity, learn to make much of the Godly, and to reverence the Wicked, and beware the way to thofe that go astray, after thy hand to thofe that fall, reprove the proud, lift up the lowly, that our Lord Jefus Chrift may open to thee the Door, who faith of himself, 'I am the Door, by me if any man enter, he fhall be safe. And let him be thy help, who is the Key of David,' and the Scepter of the Houfe of Izaac, 'who openeth, and no man shutteth, who shutteth, and no man openeth; who bringeth the Captive out of Prison where he fate in darkenes, and in the shadow of death. That in all things thou mayft follow him, of whom the Prophet David fpeaketh, 'The Scepter of thy Kingdom is a right Scepter, thou haft loved Righteousneffes, and hated Iniquity; wherefore God, even thy God hath anointed thee with the Oyl of gladneff, above thy fellows, even Jefus Chrift our Lord. Amen.

The like did the Dukes of Buckingham, and Albemarle, for themselves, and the rest of the Dukes.

So also did the Marquesses of Worcs, and Durc.cheffe.

Next, the Earl of Oxfor did homage after the same manner for himself, and all the rest of the Earls, who attended upon him to signifie their conffems.

After him, Vicecount Hereford did the like for himself, and the rest of the Vicescounts; and then the Drums beat, and Trumpets wounded again, and the People flam’d.

Lastly, Baron Audley in like manner did homage for himself, and all the Baronage, who also accompanied him to the Throne, in telfitication of their Confem; which being hinifhed, Drums, Trumpets, and Shouts followed.

Note, That the Words of Homage were fay’d by every one of the Nobility, that kneel’d down, viz.

I, N. N. do become Your Liege-man of Life, and Limb, and of Earthly Worship; and Faith, and Truth I shall bear unto You, to live, and die, against all manner of Folks: So God me help.

Afterwards the Duke of York, and all the Nobility fingly attended the Throne, and touched the King’s Crown, proumising by that Ceremonie to be ever ready to fupport it with all their power.

During the performing of this Solemn Ceremonie, the Lord High Chauncellour went to the South, Weft, and North-fides of the Stage, and proclaimed to the People the King’s General Parm, being attended by Mr. Carter to the South-side, and by a Gentlemen-Ofiier, and two Heralds to the other two Sides.

And at these three Sides, at the fame time, did the Lord Cormwallis, Treasurer of his Majefly’s Hufpold, fling abroad the Medals, both of Gold, and Silver, prepared for the Coronation, as a Princeely Donaticn, or Largfes, among the People.

The King being thus ehronefled, the Gentlemen of his Chapel began this following Anthem, Behold, O Lord, our Defender, and took upon the Face of thine Anointed.

The Violins, and other Instrumental Masicks, (who were robed in Scarlet Mantles, and placed in a Gallery erected over against them, on the North-side of the Alter) anfwering alternately: at the ending of which Anthem, the Trumfets sounded, and Drums beat again. In which time the King took off his Crown, and delivered it to the Lord High Chamberlain to hold, the Sleeper with the Cofh to Mr. Henry Howard, and that with the Dove to the Duke of Albemarle.

The Epifile (taken out of the Fifth Epifile of St. Peter, the fcrond Chapter, and beginning at the eleven Perfe) was read by the Bishop of Chichefther.

The Goipel (being part of the twenty Second Chapter of St. Matthew, beginning at the fift Perfe) by the Abp. of Ely.

After
After which, the Nicene Creed was begun by the Bishop of London, and sung by the Gentlemen of the Chappel, with Perks, and Chorals, (that, and the rest of the special Melodies, for the Solemnity, being set by Captain Cook, Master of the Children of his Majesty's said Chappel) The Violins, and other Instrumental Melfick, placed in the Gallery over against them, alternately playing.

All which time the King stood by His Throne.

But towards the end of the Creed He took again his Crown from the Lord Great Chamberlain, and put it on his Head; as also the Scepter with the Cross from Mr. Howard, and that with the Dove from the Duke of Albemarle, and prepared for His Decent from his Throne towards the Altar, to receive the Communion.

And, as soon as the singing of the Creed was fully ended, the King descended with the Crown on his Head, and Scepters in both Hands, (the Bishops of Durham, and Bath and Wells, supporting him) with the four Swords naked before, and all the great Officers attending.

In the time of this Proceeding, the Quire sang,

Let my Prayer come up into thy presence as the Incense, and the lifting up of my hand be as an Evening-Sacrifice.

Here the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury retired from the Ceremonies into St. Edward's Chappel, and thence went home, leaving the remainder of his Duty to be performed by the Bishop of London.

At the King's approach to the Altar, the Bishop of Ely delivered unto Him Bread, and Wine, which He there offered, and then returned to the Field-stool, on the South-side of the Altar, near His Chair of State, before which He kneeled down, and laid His Crown upon the Cushion before Him, towards his right Hand; and the Scepter with the Dove, on his left; and gave again to Mr. Howard the Scepter with the Cross, who held it, kneeling on the King's right Hand, the Grand Officers, and the Noble men, with the four Swords naked, and ereth, standing about Him.

Then the Bishop of London said this Prayer.

Bless, O Lord, we beseech thee, these thy Gifts, and sanctifie them unto This holy Offering, &c.

At the end of which, the Lord Cornwallis, Treasurer of the Hounfeld, presented the King with another Wedg of Gold, which goeth under the name of the Mark of Gold. This the King offered into the Bason, kneeling full at his Field-stool, whil't the Bishop of London said the following Prayer,

Almighty God, give thee the dew of Heaven, and the rainfis of the Earth, and abundance of Corn and Wine, &c.

And next pronounced this Blessing;

Bless, O Lord, the vinhous carriage of this King, and accept the Work of His Hands: replenish the Realm with the Blessings of Heaven, of the Dew, of the Water, and of the Deeps.

Then the Bishop proceeded to the Confebra-tion of the Sacrament: which being finished, he first of all received; next, the Dean of Wake-minster; then the Bishop of Bath and Wells; and lastly, the Bishop of Durham.

These four Persons having communicated, Preparation was made for the King's Receiving, who kneeled all this while before His Field-stool.

The Travel was brought thither by Mr. Rumold on the behalf of the Master of the Wardrobe, and prevented to the Bishops of Hereford, and Carlisle, who held it before the King, while He received.

The Bishop of London gave the King the Bread, and the Dean of Westminster the Cup.

As soon as the King had received, this Anthem was begun by the upper Quire,

O hearken unto the voice of my calling, my King, and my God, &c.

In the mean while, the King returned to His Throne upon the Theatre, with the Crown on his Head, and bearing the Scepters in his Hands.

When he came thither, he put off his Crown, and delivered it to the Lord Great Chamberlain, the Scepter with the Cross to Mr. Howard, and that other with the Dove to the Duke of Albemarle.

And then the Bishop of London went on with the Communion, which being finished, the King (attended as before) descended from his Throne crowned, with both the Scepters in his Hand.

The rest of the Regalia (which lay all this while on the Altar, being delivered to the Noblemen, that brought them in the Proceeding to the Church) were carried before him, and thence the King proceeded into St. Edward's Chappel, the Organs playing all the while.

Where being arrived, he took off St. Edward's Crown, and delivered it to the Bishop of London, who immediately laid it upon St. Edward's Altar; all the rest of the Regalia were given into the hands of the Dean of Westminster, and laid there also.

Afterwards the King entered into the Oratory erected in the middle of the Wall, on the backside of the High Altar; and there retired, whil't he was disrobed of St. Edward's Robes by Mr.
Seymor, and Mr. Albemarle, Grooms of the Bed-Chamber, on the behalf of the Lord High-Chamberlain, Mr. Elise, Mr. Progers, Colonel
Philips, and Mr. Chiffin Joffiting.

The Robes were laid on St. Edward's Altar, by the Bishop of Durham; and afterwards de-ivered to the Dean of Westminster to lay up with the Regalia.

After this, the King was arrayed in his Purple Robes, and then came near to St. Edward's Altar, where the Bishop of London stood ready with the Imperial Crown in his hands; and let that upon the King's Head; thenceupon the King took the Scepter with the Cross in his right Hand, with the Globe in his left, and immediately the Proceeding (ordered also by the Herolds) began thence into Westminster-Hall, the same way that he came, and attended after the same manner, saying that the Noble-men, and Bishops, which brought the Regalia to the Abbey-Church, went not now immediately before the King, as they did then; but were ranked in places according to their Degrees, and Confections: all the Noble-men, with their Coronets, and Caps on their Heads. The Kings of Arms marched likewise with their Crowns on.

The Proceeding being entered into Westminster-Hall, the Nobility, and others, who had Tables assigned them, went, and placed themselves therein; but the King, (attended with the Great Officers) withdrew into the Inner Court of Wards, for half an hour.

In the mean time, all the Tables in the Hall were served, viz. before the King’s Service came up; and were placed in this manner:

On the right hand of the King’s Throne, below in the Hall, were set two Tables, one beneath the other: at the upper end of the first near the State, (which had two Side-Tables to serve it) sat the Bishops, and below them the Judges, with the rest of the Long-Robe.

At the second Table, (which had two Side-Board Tables likewise to serve it) sat the Masters of the Chancery, and the Six Clerks.

And here, at this Table, were the Barons of the Cinque-Ports necessitated to sit; although the upper end of the first Table was appointed for them.

The Occasion this: No sooner had the aforesaid Barons brought up the King to the foot of the Stairs in Westminster-Hall, ascending to His Throne, and turned on the left hand (towards their own Table) out of the way, but the King’s Foot-men most insolently, and violently seized upon the Canopy, which the Barons endeavouring to keep, and defend, were by their number, and strength drag’d down to the lower end of the Hall; nevertheless still keeping their hold; and, as not Mr. Owen YORK-Herald been accidentally near the Hall-Door, and seeing the Canopy, caused the same to be hurst, the Foot-men had certainly carried it away by force. But in the interim also, (speedy notice hereof having been given the King) one of Querries were sent from Him, with Command, to imprison the Foot-men, and dismiss them out of His Service, which put an end to the present Disturbance.

These Foot-men were also commanded to make their submission to the Court of Claims, (which was accordingly done by them, the 20th of April following, and the Canopy then delivered back to the said Barons.

Whil’s this Disturbance happened, the upper end of the aforesaid Table was taken up by the Bishops, Judges, &c. and hereupon it came to pass, that the Barons of the Cinque-Ports lost their Places, and were necessitated to sit down at the said second Table, with the Masters of Chancery, &c. where there was Room left by some of the Long-Robe, that late at the Upper-Table.

Upon the left hand of the King’s Throne, below, on the other side of the Hall, was placed likewise a long Table, which reached down near to the Common-Pleas Court, whereat the Nobility dined; and this Table had four Side-Board-Tables to serve it.

And behind this, close to the Wall, at a shorter Table, sat the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, Recorder, and twelve chief Citizens of London, who had also two Side-Tables to serve them.

Lastly, within the Court of Common-Pleas was a Table with one Side-Table to serve it, for the Officers of Arms, whereat they also dined. Each Table was furnished with three Courtes ansireable to that of the King’s, besides the Banquets.

A little before the King returned to Dinner, two Equires of the Body, viz. Ferdinando Marisham, and Henry Norwood, took their Seats upon two little Foot-stools, on either side of the foot of the King’s Chair, (placed in the middle of the Table) and there sat until the King came in to Dinner; when retiring, and performing their Duty in placing the King’s Robes for His better convenience of sitting, they sat down again at the King’s Feet a good part of Dinner time, and until the King gave them leave to rise; He accepting that time of Session in full performance of their Service.

On the right Side of the Throne was erected a Gallery, for the Kings of Arms, Heralds, and Pursuivants; and opposite to that, on the other side, another for the Musicks; and below, on the old Scaffolds, next the Court of Common-Pleas, stood the King’s Trumpeters.
The Proceeding at carrying up of the First Course to the King's Table.

Sir George Barker, Clrks Comptrollers: Sir William Boreman,
Mr. Stephen Box, Clrks of the Green Cloth: Sir Henry Wood,
All four in Black Velvet Gowns, trimmed with Black Silk, and Gold Lace, with Velvet Caps raised in the Head.

William Abbardham Esquire, Cofercer.

Six Serjeants at Arms, two and two.

The Earl Marshal on the left Hand. The Lord High-Steward.
The Lord High-Constable on the right Hand.

All three mounted on Horse-back in their Robes, and with their Coronets on their Heads; having their Horses richly trapped.

Six Serjeants at Arms, two and two.

Comptroller of the Household, Treasurer of the Household, with their White Staves.

Earl of Dorset, Sewer.
Earl of Chesterfield, his Assistant.
The Knights of the Bath, who carried up the Service, two and two to a Dish, which was set upon the Table by the Earl of Lincoln Carver, assisted by the Earl-Sewers.

In the Rear came up three Clerks of the Kitchen, viz. Mr. Leonard Pinkney, Mr. John Clements, and Mr. Henry Firebrace, all futed in Black Fagard Satin Gowns, and Velvet Caps, in fashion like those worn by the Clerks Comptrollers.

Dinner being set on the Table, the King came forth from the Inner-Court of Wards, in his Royal Robes, with the Crown on his Head, and Scepter in his Hand, having the three Swords born naked before Him, and went directly to his Chair at the Table, wherein He sat down to Dinner, the Bishop of London paying Grace. The Banquet and Ewer were brought up and presented by the Earl of Penbrooke and Montgomery, assisted by the Lord Pager, and the Serjeants of the Ewer.

On the King's right Hand, the Noble-men, that carried the three Swords, stood, holding them naked, and erected, all the Dinner-while; at His left Hand stood the Lord High Chamberlain, to whom the King had given the Scepter to hold. And at the Table's end, on the King's left Hand, sat the Duke of York, in his Robes and Coronet.

Soon after Dinner was begun, the Lord Allington carried to the King His first Draught of Drink in a Silver Gilt Cup, being assisted by the Earl of Penbrooke and Montgomery, Viscount Monmouth, and the Lord Pager, his Assistants.
The Office of Cup-Bearer, as also the Eee, having been by the Court of Claims adjudged to him, as being leaved of the Manor of Wymundley in the County of Hertford; and when the King had drank, the said Lord Allington received the Cup for his use.

Next, Thomas Leigh Esquire was brought up to the Table with a Mels of Portage, called Dillegant, this Service being adjudged unto him by the aforesaid Court of Claims in right of the Manor of Addington, in the County of Surrey; whereupon the Lord High Chamberlain presented him to the King, who accepted the Service, but did not eat thereof.

Afterwards, a little before the second Course was ready, Sir Edward Dymock, to whom the Court of Claims had adjudged the Office of the King's Champion, as being leaved of the Manor Servelsby, in the County of Lincoln) entered the Hall on a goodly White Courser, and armed at all Points in Rich Armour, having a Plume of Blew Feathers in his Helm, he there made a stand for some time, and then advanced in manner following, way being made for him by the Knight-Marshal.

First, Two Trumpets.
The Serjeant-Trumpeter.
The Serjeant at Arms.
An Esquire carrying a Target, having the Champion's own Arms depicted thereon.
An Esquire, carrying the Champion's Lance upright.
Mr. Owen York-Herald.
The Earl-Marshal on his left Hand.
The Champion.
The Lord High-Constable on his right Hand.
Both likewise on Horse-back.
1661.

King CHARLES the Second.

At the lower end of the Hall, YORK-Herald proclaimed the Challenge, in these words following,

If any Person of what degree soever, high or low, shall dare, or give any Our Sovereign Lord King CHARLES the Second, of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, Son and Heir of His Our Sovereign Lord CHARLES the First, the King descended, so be right Heir to the Imperial Crown of this Realm of England; or that He ought not to enjoy the same: here is His Champion, who saith, That he listeth, and is a falsë Traytor, being ready in Person to Combat with him; and in this Quarrel will adventure his Life against him, on what day soever he shall be appointed.

Thereupon the Champion threw down his Gantlet, which lying some small time, and no body taking it up, it was delivered unto him again by York-Herald. Then all advanced forward untill the Champion came to the middle of the Hall, where York-Herald made the like Proclamation, and the Gantlet was again thrown down, taken up, and returned to the Champion; who advanced to the foot of the ascending Steps to the State, and at the top of the said Steps, the said Herald proclaimed the said Challenge the third time, whereupon the Champion threw down his Gantlet again, which no body taking it up, it was delivered unto him.

This being done, the Earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, (affisted, as before) presented on the Knee to the King a Gilt Cup with a Cover, full of Wine, which drank to his Champion, and by the said Earl sent him the Cup; and he, after three Reverences, drank it all off, went a little backward, and to a part of the Hall, taking the said Cup for his Fee, according as had been adjudged him by the said Court of Claims.

When this Solemnity was finished, the Kings Herald, and Pursuants defended from their Gallery, and went into the Hall to the lower end of the Noble-men Table, and therealltogether made their Reverence. Thence they proceeded a little further, and there made a second Reverence; and the like Reverence at the Steps ascending to the State, Where all standing still, Carter, Principal King of Arms, cried large English thrice, and proclaimed the King's Style in Latin, French, and English, making Reverence bowing every Style. At the finall of which, they all retired backward into the midst of the Hall, and there, after crying Large again thrice, he proclaimed the King's Style as before. Lastly, they went yet backwards to the end of the said Noble-men's Table, and did the same again; and from thence into the Common-Plains, to Dinner.

Immediately after this, the second Courtie was brought up by the Gentlemens-Pensioners; with the former Solemny.

And the last Dill being carried by Erefinum Smith Esquire, he, having delivered the same to the Table, presented the King with three Maple Cups, on the behalf of Robert Bernham Esquire, who was feized of the Maner of Nether-Bilsington in the County of Kent.

Lastly, the Lord Mayor of London presented the King with Wine in a Golden Cup having a Cover; of which the King having drank, the said Lord Mayor receive it for his Fee.

By this time, the day being far spent, the King having Water brought him by the Earl of Pembroke, and his assistants] washed, and rofe from Dinner before the third Courie was brought in; and, retiring into the Inner-Court of Wards, he there disrobed himself; and from thence he went privately to his Banre, which waited for him at the Parliament-Stairs, and so to the Privy-Stairs at White-Hall, were he landed.

It is a thing very memorable, that, towards the end of Dinner-time, (although all the former part of the day, and also the preceding day, in which the King made his Cessate through London, were the only fair days, that we enjoyed of many both before, and after) it began to Thunder and Lighten very smartly: which, however some few of People were apt to interpret as omenious, and ill-boding, yet it will be no difficult matter to evidence from Antiquity, that Accidents of this nature, though happily they might afterall, and amaze the common Drove of men, were by the most Prudent, and Sagacious, look'd upon as a preservor, and happy presage. And of this, Virgil gives us a very pertinent Example (in the Eighth Book of his Enaida) where Evander, having addrest himself in a Speech to Enneas for aid against the Hetrurians, and he being licentious how to answer his request, mark what Sign was immediately sent from Heaven,

Namque improviso vibratur ab Aegibus fulger Cum solius venit, &c.

For suddenly from Heaven a brandish'd Flarth
With Thunder came, &c.

And presently after the Poet adds,

Osliberique animis alis, sed Troianus Heros Agnosse factum, & Dra promissis Parentis.

While other Blood amaz'd, the Hero knew His Mother's Promise by the Sound that flew.

The fame Author, in another place, mentions the same thing, as a Testimony of Prayers heard, and answered; as when Old Aeneas, seeing the lambent flame upon his Grand-child Julius his head, lift up his Hands to Heaven, and prayed to be for help, and direction, he was thus answered,

Vix eatus erat Senior, subique fragore Intonitus lavum, &c.

Scarce had the grave Sirr spoke, when suddenly it thunder'd prosperous, &c.

For to Intonitus lavum is interpreted by Ser-"www.ing, according to the Maxim of the Ancient Authors, who interpret Thunder from the North, that is, (as they contrary to the common Antiquities, accounted it) the left part of Heaven, for a prosperous Omen.

But, in reference to our present Purposie, we may proceed to a larger Interpretation, and conthat the Heavens, with the Volleys of Thunder, and nimble Flashes of Lightning, seemed to give a Pleadise, and Acclamation, to this Grand and Sacred Solemnity; in like manner as we Mortals use to clofe our greater Triumphs with Fire-Works, Bonfires, and the loud Report of our great Ordnance: this Terrestrial Thunder being but the Imitator, and Counterfeit of the Heavenly Artillery.

And fo I obferve it expounded by Claudian in these Verses,*

Ut sceptrum gessere mans, membriisque vigentes
Apovere togas, Signum datum hisibus
Nube Pater, gratamine facem per inane vacantes Prospera vibrari, sonumus Ommas Nimbri.

As soon as rob'd, and Scepter'd, a loud Noise aloud His Signal Favour thunders from a Cloud, Successful Lightning through Heaven's Arches flies; Both at His Coronation happy Signs.

Thus having travail'd through a HISTORY fraught with Troubles and Confusions, an Unnatural and Intolernble Warr, succeeded by a long time of Distraction and Mis-rule; and now having at length arriv'd to such a point of Settlement and Right reform'd, as promises a long continued Calm and Peaceful Government, We glad to have found such a Convenient Haven, shall here choose to call our Anchor; And though several Things have happen'd from the Coronation to this present time (as the King's Marriage with the Daughter of Portugal, the Transafions of the present Parliament, with other matters sufficiently Memorable, yet in regard we cannot Clofe at a more happy Period, We shall Referve as well something of what is past, as what is yet to come, for a farther Continuation, as likewise the observation of that Method which our Historian ever obferves at the end of every King's Reign, that time only admitting of the said Method. And if the laft Part of our HISTORY, somewhat exceed in bulk what may be thought proportionable to the rest, it will no doubt be in a great measure excus'd by the Consideration of what manner of Times we have had to set forth, an Interval of such Wonders, such strange and Capricious Revolutions as are scarce to be parallell'd by any Age or Kingdom, hoping that the Intricate Turns and Labyrinths of Fortune being now at length run out, the Course and Stream of the History will run more smooth and clear through all the subsequent Years (which God grant may be many and Prosperous) of His present Majesty's Reign; Than whom, never was any Prince likely to prove a more glorious Preserver to those that after him shall Sit at the Helm of State, both in respect of His Innumerable other Virtues and Regal Endowments, and particularly of His Admirable Skill and Understanding in that which is the Bulwark of the Nation; the Improvement whereof so mainly Imparts His own Glory and Renown above all other Princes of the World, and the Reparation and Enrichment of His Subjects, a thing wherein He hath ever lien'd Himself to be most Zealously Concern'd.
